THE FAITHS OF THE WORLD.

HABADIM, a branch of the modern Chasidim or Jewish Pietists in Poland, which was founded in the eighteenth century by Rabbi Solomon, in the government of Mohileff. Their name Habadim is composed of the initial letters of three Hebrew words, denoting wisdom, intelligence, and knowledge. They may not improperly be called Quietists, as their distinguishing peculiarity consists in the rejection of external forms, and the complete abandonment of the mind to abstraction and contemplation. Instead of the baptisms customary among the Jews, they go through the signs without the use of the element, and consider it their duty to disengage themselves as much as possible from matter, because of its tendency to clog the mind in its ascent to the Supreme Source of Intelligence. In prayer, they make no use of words, but simply place themselves in the attitude of supplication, and exercise themselves in mental ejaculations.

HABBA, a sort of garment which the Mohammedans throw over their shoulders after purification, somewhat in imitation of the Jewish Talleth.

HABDALA (Heb. distinction), a ceremony which is considered as dividing or separating the Jewish Sabbath from the other days of the week. It commences after the concluding service in the synagogue. "On their return," says Mr. Allen, "from this service they light a wax candle, or a lamp with two wicks, which is usually held by a child; and the master of the family, taking a glass of wine in his right hand, and a box containing some spices in his left, recites several passages of scripture: "'Behold, God is my salvation: I will trust, and not be afraid; for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and song; he also is become my salvation. Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.—Salvation belongeth unto the Lord: thy blessing is upon thy people. Selah.—The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.—The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour." Thus may it also be unto us.—"I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord."

II.

Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast created the fruit of the vine.' At these words a little of the wine is to be poured upon the floor. Then taking the glass of wine in his left hand, and the box of spices in his right, he says: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast created divers spices.' Here he smells the spices, and presents them to his family that they may have the same gratification. Then standing near the candle or lamp, he looks at it with great attention, and also at his finger nails, and says: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast created the light of the fire.' Then taking the wine again in his right hand, he says: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe! who hast made a distinction between things sacred and profane; between light and darkness; between Israel and other nations; between the seventh day and the six days of labour. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who hast made a distinction between things sacred and profane.' As soon as this benediction is finished, he tastes the wine himself, and then hands it round to all the company." In some places where the Jews happen to be unable to bear the expense of performing the Habdala at home, the Chassan or reader performs it in the synagogue at the close of the Sabbath services. Those who are unable from any peculiarity in their circumstances to attend to this duty either at home or in the synagogue, are allowed to compensate for its performance by privately ejaculating at the close of the last Sabbath service, a short benediction, not mentioning the name of God; "Blessed be He who hath made a distinction between things sacred and profane." Thus the Sabbath terminates, and the people are at liberty to resume their ordinary week-day employments. See SABBATH (JEWISH.)

HADAD. See ADAD.

HADES, a name given among the ancient Greeks and Romans, especially by the poets, to Pluto, the god who was believed to preside over the infernal regions. He is represented as being the son of Chronos and Rhea, the husband of Persephone, and the brother of Zeus and Poseidon. He bore the character of being a fierce, cruel, and inexorable tyrant, dreaded by mortals, who, when they invoked him, struck the earth with their hands, sacrificed black sheep in his honour, and in offering their sacrifices stood with averted faces. The grim Hades shut up the shades of the dead in his dark domains. His wife Persephone shared the throne of the lower world with her cruel husband. And not only did Hades rule over the infernal regions; he was considered also as the author of those blessings which spring from the earth, and more especially of those rich mineral treasures which are contained in the bowels of the earth. The worship of Hades prevailed both Greece and Italy. In Elis, at Athens, and Olympia, temples were built for the worship of this infernal deity. Among the earlier Greek poets, more especially in Homer, the name Hades is assigned to the god, but among the later writers it was applied also to his kingdom. See next article.

HADES, the dwelling-place of the dead, and hence the Septuagint renders by this word the Hebrew Sheol, while in the authorized English version of the New Testament it is generally rendered hell. In the classical writers both of Greek and Roman antiquity the word Hades is almost always used to denote the infernal regions, where the shades of the dead were believed to have their abode. Among the ancient Hebrews it was supposed to be a place of thick darkness, such as is referred to in Job x. 21, 22, "Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death: a land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness." Here the spirits of the dead are supposed to dwell till the resurrection in a state in which they are wholly devoid of thought and sensation. The word Hades in the New, as well as Sheol in the Old Testament, is often used in the most general sense to denote the state of the dead, including the grave as the residence of the body, and the world of spirits as the abode of the soul. In some cases, indeed, both words are employed either in reference to the body or the soul taken separately. From a minute consideration, however, of the various cases in which the word Hades occurs in the New Testament, we are brought to the conclusion that it expresses the state of the dead.

HADITH, a word used by the Mohammedans to express the sayings of Mohammed, and which were handed down by oral tradition from one generation to another. There are said to be six authors of these traditions, among whom are Ayesha the wife of the Prophet, Abû Hureira, his intimate friend; and Ebn Abbas, his cousin-german. The collection of these traditions, called by Khurezmi, amounts to 5,266; and which the Mohammedan doctors allege ought to be committed to memory, and where that cannot be done, they ought to be transcribed.

HADJI, or EL-HRAGG (Arab. pilgrim), a title given to a Moslem who has performed the pilgrimage to Mecca and Mount Arafât. He is not entitled to be called a Hadji until he has gone round the Kaaba at Mecca seven times, kissing the black stone each time. It is also indispensable that he should have visited Mount Arafât, six hours distant, on which Abraham is believed to have offered up his son. See MECCA, (PILGRIMAGE TO).

HAFEDHAI, an idol of the ancient Arabians, usually invoked on obtaining a prosperous journey whether by sea or land.

HAFIZI (Arab. keepers), a name given to Mohammedans who commit the Koran wholly to memory, and are on that account regarded as holy men intrusted with God's law.

HAGIGAH, the sacred feast that took place on the morrow after the celebration of the Paschal Supper, and also one of the two peace-offerings which those Jews who engaged in the passover were required to bring along with them to the solemnity. The peace-offerings behoved to be some beast, bullock or sheep, and they were called also the passover of the herd. These passover offerings were esteemed holy things, and none in their defilement might presume to eat of them.

HAGIOGRAPHIA (Gr. holy writings), the name given to the third division of the Jewish Scriptures, comprising the Book of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, and also the two Books of Chronicles. Besides being called Hagiographa, this class of the Hebrew Scriptures was also called KETUBIM (which see) or Writings, because they were not orally delivered as the Law of Moses was, but were immediately revealed to the minds of their authors who wrote under the influence of Divine inspiration.

HAGIOSCOPE, a word used by English ecclesiastical writers to describe openings made through different parts of the interior walls of the church, generally on either side of the chancel arch, so as to afford a view of the altar to those worshipping in the aisles.

HAICHTITES, a Mohammedan sect who profess to believe in Jesus Christ as well as in Mohammed. They regard Jesus as the true Messiah, and believe that he existed from all eternity, and that he took upon himself a true human body. They believe that he will come again to judge the world at the last day in the same body which he had on earth; that he will destroy Antichrist, and reign forty years, at the close of which the world will come to an end.

HAIR, MARY. See AVE MARIA.

HAIR CUSTOMS CONNECTED WITH. The Jews in ancient times attached great importance to long hair. Accordingly we find that the length of Absalom's hair led to his death, 2 Sam. xviii. 9, "And Absalom met the servants of David. And Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick loughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away." One of the most degrading forms of expressing contempt among the Jews was plucking off the hair. We find Nehemiah (xiii. 25) mentioning this as a punishment inflicted upon those who had contracted irregular marriages, "And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves." "Baldhead" seems also to have been used occasionally as a strong term of reproach. Thus 2 Kings ii. 23, "And he went up from thence unto Beth-el; and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head." Shaving the head is sometimes referred to by the Hebrew prophets as denoting metaphorically affliction, poverty, and disgrace. The vow of the NAZARITE (which see) shows the importance which was attached to the hair as a sacred emblem among the ancient Hebrews. In ancient Greece also the hair was not unfrequently used for superstitious purposes. Thus it appears from Homer that parents were accustomed to dedicate the hair of their children to some god; and when the children had reached adult age, the hair was cut off and consecrated to that same deity. In the account which Virgil gives of the death of Dido, he mentions that the highest lock of her hair was dedicated to the infernal gods. To such practices there seems to be an allusion in Lev. xix. 27, "Ye shall not round the corner of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard."

As an expression of sorrow for the dead, the hair was frequently cut off, and hence we find the prophet Jeremiah declaring, xvi. 6, "Both the great and the small shall die in this land: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them." The same custom appears to have prevailed among the ancient Greeks, and Herodotus speaks of it as a universal practice throughout the world, except in Egypt, where the hair of the head and beard was allowed to grow in seasons of mourning, being at all other times shaved. It was a custom among the Greeks to hang up the hair of their dead at the door to prevent any one from defiling himself by entering the house. Eastern females have always considered the plaiting and adorning of their hair as an indispensable part of their toilette. To this practice we find frequent allusions in Sacred Scripture. Thus Paul strongly condemns it, 1 Tim. ii. 9, "In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array." Peter also adopts a similar strain of reproof, 1 Pet. iii. 3, "Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel." The idolaters who worshipped the heavenly bodies, but more especially the Arabians, in imitation of Bacchus, used to cut their hair equal behind and before, to make their head in the form of a hemisphere, and they likewise shaved the hair of their beards. It was probably in opposition to these practices that the Hebrews were enjoined to let the hair of their heads grow, and not to mar the corners of their beards.

HAIRETTES, a sceptical sect among the Mohammedans, who profess to doubt everything, and to hold their minds in constant equipoise, believing nothing, and maintaining that it is absolutely impossible to distinguish truth from falsehood. On any controverted point, therefore, their usual remark is, "God knows it, we do not." Notwithstanding this sceptical turn of mind, they scrupulously observe the Mohammedan ceremonies and laws, both civil and religious. Members of this sect have occasionally been raised to the dignity of MUFTI (which see), or chief of the Mohammedan law; but it has been alleged that they have been somewhat negligent in performing the duties of that high station, being ready to sign any thing, appending however their usual saying, "God knows what is best." The PETVA (which see) of the Mufti or Sheik-ul-Islam being in many cases of the highest importance, rashness or want of due consideration in signing it may be attended with the most dangerous consequences.

HAÏ-VANG, the god of the sea among the Chinese, answering to the Poseidon of the Greeks, and the Neptune of the Romans. He is represented holding a magnet in one hand, and a dolphin in the other, and with dishevelled hair to indicate the disturbed state of the waters.

HAKEM (EL), SECT OF. See DRUZES.

HAKEMITES, a heretical sect among the Mohammedans, originated by Hakem-ben-Haschem, who made his appearance about the middle of the second century from the Hegira. Being a man of considerable acuteness, he succeeded in attracting a great number of followers. He maintained that God assumed a human form after he had ordered the angels to adore Adam; that he appeared in the shape of several prophets and other great men, princes and kings. He met with great opposition in propagating his peculiar sentiments, and it is said of him that he threw himself into a cistern full of aqua-fortis, in which his whole body was consumed except his hair, which floated on the surface. Before committing suicide, he had taught his followers that he would return to them after death in the shape of an old man mounted on a grey horse, and that in this form he would conquer the whole world, and compel all nations to embrace his religion. In expectation of this event, the sect of the Hakemites is said by some authors to have lasted above five hundred years after his death.

HALAL, what is permitted and sanctioned by the Mohammedan Law.

HALEYON CHURCH, a denomination of Christians which arose in 1832 in Columbia, North America. The members of this sect reject all creeds and confessions of faith. They admit of only one person in the Church, and maintain that the Father cannot be known as a person but as he was pleased to assume personality in his Anointed or Christ. They deny the doctrine of eternal punishment, and hold that the existence both of apostate spirits and impenitent men will cease at the close of Christ's mediatorial kingdom. They deny infant baptism, and their mode of administering the ordinance to adults is peculiar. The persons to be baptized walk down into the water in procession, attended by the congregation, and accompanied with vocal and instrumental music. The ordinance is then dispensed in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom they allege is exhibited in one glorious Person, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The Haleyons devote their children to God, not by baptism, but by dedicating them in prayer, and placing them under the guardianship of the members of the church, who take them into their arms and bless them.

HALDANITES. See BAPTISTS (SCOTTISH). CONGREGATIONALISTS (SCOTTISH).

HALF COMMUNION. See CHALICE.

HALIA, one of the Nereides in the ancient heathen mythology. This was the name also of a goddess worshipped among the Rhodians, as the spouse of Poseidon (which see).

HALIACMON, a river-god of Macedonia, sprung from Oceanus and Thetys.

HALLE (Gr. hals, the sea), a name given among the ancient heathens to sea-nymphs in general.

HALLEL, certain psalms which were accustomed to be sung by the Jews on very solemn occasions. It was divided into the Great Hallel and the Lesser Hallel the former being understood to be Ps. cxxxvi., and the latter comprising six psalms, from Ps. cxlii. to Ps. cxviii. inclusive.

HALLELUJAH. See ALLELUIA.

HALLESIAN CONTROVERSY. See PICTETIC CONTROVERSY.

HALOSYDNE, a surname of Amphitrite and Triton as being salern.

HAMADRYADES, subordinate female divinities among the ancient heathens, who presided over woods and forests. See DRYADES.

HAMET sect of, the followers of Hamet, a Mohammedan prophet, who in 1792 began to teach in the Western Coast of Africa. He rejected the authority of the Caliphs, and by the missionaries which he sought to introduce into the Mussulman world he attracted around him a great number of converts. At length Hamet was killed, and two of his adherents, captives into command, the successful Hamet was taken to a French slave dealer.

HAMMON. See AMMON.

HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE. See CONFERENCE (HAMPTON COURT).

HAMMIL, the angel who was regarded by the ancient Persians as the inspector of the heavens.

HANBALITES, one of the four orthodox sects of the Mohammedans, which derived its name from Ahmed-ebn-Hanbal, who is said to have been so well versed in the traditions of Mohammed, that he could repeat a million of them by rote. This zealous Mohammedan teacher strenuously maintained the eternity of the Koran, and thus brought upon himself the vengeance of the Caliph Al Mutasem, who held the Koran to have been created. The controversy on this disputed point raged for a time with great keenness on both sides, and at length Hanbal, by the command of his antagonist, was imprisoned and scourged. He continued, notwithstanding, to propagate his opinions until his death, which took place towards the middle of the second century from the Hegira. The sect of the Hanbalites, from which the sect of the Wahabees seems to have been derived, prevails principally in the wilder districts of Arabia; its austere tenets being well suited to the simple manners of the Bedouins. In the reign of the Caliph Al Râdi, the Hanbalites, enraged at the wide prevalence of a luxurious spirit, raised a serious commotion in Bagdad, breaking into houses, spilling any wine they discovered, destroying musical instruments, and burning rich garments. Considerable alarm was excited for some time among the inhabitants of the city, and it was not without considerable difficulty that the disturbance was quelled. In these tumults several thousand lives were sacrificed.

HAND (CUSTOMS CONNECTED WITH THEM). The custom of kissing the hand as an act of adoration seems to have existed in very early times. Thus we find a distinct reference to it in Job xxxi. 27, "And my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand." In the East, even at the present, one of the most usual modes of paying respect to a person of superior rank is by kissing his hand and putting it to the forehead. A Mohammedan, when he cannot observe this custom, commonly kisses his own hand and raises it to his forehead. An oath is often taken in Oriental countries by joining hands, and to this practice there seems to be an obvious allusion in Ezek. xxi. 14, "Smite thy hands together," and again verse 17, "I will also smite mine hands together, and I will cause my fury to rest: I the Lord have said it."

One of the most expressive modes also in the East of indicating sorrow and deep humiliation is by putting the hands to the head. Hence we find it said in Jer. ii. 37, "Yea, thou shalt go forth from him, and thine hands upon thine head: for the Lord hath rejected thy confidences, and I thou shalt not prosper in them." The same attitude in token of sorrow is frequently met with on the paintings in the tombs of Egypt. Mr. Roberts also, referring to modern customs in the East, says, "When people are in great distress they put their hands on their head, the fingers being clasped on the top of the crown. Should a man who is plunged into wretchedness meet a friend, he immediately puts his hands on his head to illustrate his circumstances. When a person hears of the death of a relative or friend he forthwith clasps his hands on his head. When boys have been punished at school, they run home with their hands on their head. Parents are much displeased and alarmed when they see their children with their hands in that position, because they look upon it not merely as a sign of grief, but as an emblem of bad fortune."

HANDKERCHIEF (HOLY), a handkerchief said to have belonged to St. Veronica, on which is supposed to have been imprinted the likeness of the face of our blessed Lord. The legend is, that when Christ was led to crucifixion, Veronica, who followed him, put a handkerchief to his face, on which the impress of his features remained. This holy relic is still preserved at Rome, and exhibited for the veneration of Romanists on certain festivals. Dr. Middleton says, that two different holy handkerchiefs exist; the one alleged to have been sent by Christ himself as a present to Agbarus, prince of Edessa, who by letter had requested a picture of him; the other given by Christ at the time of his crucifixion to a holy woman, by name Veronica, upon a handkerchief which she had lent him to wipe his face upon that occasion. Both these handkerchiefs are said to be kept with the utmost reverence, the one in St. Sylvester's church, the other in St. Peter's, where, in honour of this sacred relic, there is an altar built by Pope Urban VIII., with a statue of Veronica, bearing a suitable inscription. It is related by Bower, upon the authority of Mabillon, that Pope Innocent III. composed a prayer in honour of the image imprinted upon the handkerchief, and granted a ten days' indulgence to all who should visit it, and that Pope John XXII. promised no less than ten thousand days' indulgence to every one who should repeat the following prayer, "Hail, holy face of our Redeemer, printed upon a cloth as white as snow; purge us from all spot of vice, and join us to the company of the blessed. Bring us to our country, O Happy Figure, there to see the pure face of Christ." The holy handkerchief is also said to be preserved which wrapped our Lord's face in the grave.

HANDS (IMPOSITION OF). In very ancient times the most usual ceremony adopted in conveying a blessing to another was to lay the hands solemnly upon the head of the individual accompanied with prayer. Thus in Gen. xlviii. 14, we find Jacob laying hands upon the heads of Ephraim and Manasseh, when he gave them his dying blessing. The high-priest also, when he pronounced a blessing upon the people, was wont to stretch out his hands as it were over the heads of the assembled multitude. And when our Lord conveyed a blessing to the Jewish children, we are told, "he laid his hands on them and prayed." According to the Law of Moses, the ceremony to be followed in confessing sin over the head of an animal presented as a sin-offering, was to lay both hands upon the head of the victim. Witnesses also, when charging any one with a crime, laid their hands upon the head of the accused. The same custom was followed by the apostles, as we learn from Acts viii. 17, when they conferred the Holy Ghost on those who were baptized.

The imposition of hands has from a very early period formed an essential part of the ceremony by which priests and ministers have been consecrated and set apart to the sacred office. Thus in Num. xxvii. 18, we are informed that when Moses constituted Joshua his successor he laid his hands upon him. In this solemn act indeed, accompanied with prayer, ordination to the ministry has usually consisted. The manner of performing the ceremony has differed at different times. As a part of the ordination of Christian ministers it has been usually traced to apostolic institution and practice. Three passages of Scripture are generally referred to in support of this ceremony. Thus in Acts viii. 17, mention is made of the apostles laying hands on those whom Philip had baptized; and in Acts xix. 6, Paul is said to have laid his hands on those whom he baptized after John's baptism; and finally, in Heb. vi. 2, imposition of hands is ranked as one of the elementary principles of religion. Hence CHEIROTHESIA (which see), the Greek term for the imposition of hands, is frequently used in the early Christian writers as synonymous with ordination. In the baptism of catechumens in the primitive Christian church, one of the ceremonies practised was the imposition of hands upon the head of the candidate, who stood with his head bowed down in a submissive posture. This was also one of the rites of CONFIRMATION (which see).

HANIFEES, an orthodox sect of Mohammedans, who derived their name from their originator Abu-Hanifa, the first of the Islamicite casuists, who flourished in the second year of the Hegira. He learned the dogmas of the Mohammedan faith and its principal traditions from persons who had lived in the time of the prophet; and though he is now regarded as the chief authority among the Sunnites, he was through life a devoted partisan of the family of A'i. Being a man of inflexible uprightness, he shrunk from accepting the office of judge which was offered to him, and was in consequence thrown into prison. While in confinement he is said to have read the Koran no fewer than seven thousand times. According to D'Ohsson, he was poisoned by command of the Caliph for having in the Ulema or Council of the doctors of the law, resisted the severe punishment which it was proposed to inflict on the citizens of Mosul, A. D. 767. The Hanifees are usually called the followers of reason, because they are principally guided by their own judgment in giving a decision upon any point, while the other Mohammedan sects adhere more closely to the letter of tradition. This and, as we learn from Dr. Taylor, was first established in India; it is now the established faith of the Turks and Tartars, but it has branched into numerous subdivisions.

HANUC'AH. See DEDICATION PLAST OF.

HANUMAN, the Ape-God of the Hindus, son of Pavan, lord of the winds. There is a reference to Hanuman in the Ramayana, an ancient epic poem, in which the monkey general is introduced as heading the Chastites or Nymphs of India, who had come to the assistance of Rama, and the Ariens of the Ganges. In memorial of the effective assistance which he rendered to Rama Vishnu, a small pagoda is erected in his honour within the temples of Vishnu.

HAPHTOROTH, fifty-four sections of the Old Testament prophets, appointed to be read in the service of the Jewish synagogue. The Rabbies say that their forefathers read only the Law until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, who conquered the Jews about B. C. 167, and issued an edict at Antioch commanding the inhabitants of the country to embrace the Pagan religion professed by the conqueror. Besides demolishing the Jewish temple to the worship of Jupiter Olympius, he prohibited the reading of the Law in the synagogues on pain of death. In consequence of this tyrannical prohibition, the Jews substituted a series of selections from the Prophets, which they termed Haphtoroth; and even when the reading of the Law was restored in the time of the Maccabees, the reading of the Prophets was still continued, and has remained in force down to the present day. The Jews in different countries have not in all instances chosen the same passages from the prophets; and there is no evidence to prove that in ancient times the lessons read from the prophets were the same as now. Dr. Adam Clarke remarks, that though the Jews are agreed in the sections of the Law which are read every Sabbath, yet they are not agreed in the Haphtoroth, for it appears in the selections from the prophets, that the Dutch and German Jews differ in several instances from the Italian and Portuguese. It is somewhat remarkable, that while, as we learn from Luke iv. 16—21, the sixty-first chapter of Isaiah was read in the synagogue in the days of our Lord, this and almost all the other prophecies respecting the Messiah are omitted in the modern Haphtoroth. From the custom among the Jews of reading regular portions of the Law and the Prophets in the synagogue, is supposed to have originated the custom in many Christian churches of reading a lesson every Sabbath out of the Old and New Testaments.

HARA, one of the names of SHIVA, which see, the Hindu deity.

HARAM, the term used by the Mohammedan law to denote what deserves a reprimand or punishment, but is not expressly forbidden by the Law. In this sense, HARAM is which see. The word Haram also signifies a sacred thing from which infi-delis are to abstain, as the temple of Mecca or Mohammed's tomb at Medina.

HARBAD, a name substituted by Zoroaster for the Magi of the ancient Persians, and designed to denote the priests of the Guebres or Parsees, or Fire-Worshippers. Certain fixed regulations were laid down as to the appearance and costume of the Harbads. They were required to wear long beards, and conical-shaped caps falling down on their shoulders, and quite covering their ears. Their hair was never cut except as a sign of mourning for a near relative. When performing divine service before the fire, the cap was anciently so made as to cover the mouth of the officiating priest, but the priest of the modern Guebres wears a piece of stuff cut square for that purpose. The cloak or Sudra was of a scarlet colour, with long sleeves, and falling down to the middle of the leg. Round the body was worn a cloth sash or girdle of camel's hair, from which hung down four tassels, intended to remind the Harbad of four established maxims, which he ought never to forget. The first tassel was designed to remind him that he must have one God alone, one omnipotent Being always before his eyes; the second, that he was bound to believe in all the articles of the Magian faith; the third, that he must acknowledge Zoroaster as God's genuine and true disciple; and the fourth, that he must resolve by the grace of God, never to weary of well-doing. These girdles were believed to be of divine institution, and it was required of all the faithful of both sexes to wear them, that by the possession of this invaluable treasure they might overcome the devil and all his works. If, however, any one should happen through inadvertency or mistake to lose his girdle, he must neither eat, drink, speak, nor stir one foot until he has purchased a new one from some Harbad. The man who has lost his girdle has in their view lost his benediction. See PARSEES.

HAREM, the apartment in the East set apart exclusively for the women. It would appear that although polygamy was forbidden by the Law of Moses, the Hebrew kings, especially Solomon, formed to themselves large establishments of wives and concubines. In 1 Kings xxii. 25, we find mention made of the "inner chamber," which is supposed to refer to the harem, the words denoting literally a chamber within a chamber. In the East, the harem is held sacred, so that even the officers of justice dare not intrude therein, unless they have received certain information that a man is within the harem contrary to the law; and if on entering the harem they do not find what they look for, the women may punish and even kill them. The Mohammedan law requires that the faces of women be concealed from the view of men, with the exception of their husbands, fathers, and sons. In Egypt the strictest precautions are taken that no male visitors be allowed to enter the interior of the harem, not even the slaves who are in attendance. "Women," says Mr. Lane, "often pay visits to each other's harems, and sometimes spend whole days in gossip, the display of finery, smoking or story-telling. It is deemed a breach of etiquette for the master of the house to enter the apartment on such occasions, unless his visit be upon some imperative occasion; even then he must give the usual notice of his approach, so that the strange lady may veil and retire." Female existence in the Oriental harem is one monotonous and unvarying scene of indolence and self-indulgence. The women seldom leave their apartments to take exercise in the open air, but reclining on soft divans, they spend their time in gold embroidery, or in trifling amusements, while they pamper their appetites with large quantities of sweetmeats, and a variety of rich dishes, the preparation of which they carefully superintend. In addition to this, by the constant use of relaxing, warm, and vapour baths, they soon grow so large that the symmetry of their forms and the regularity of their features entirely disappear, and nothing of beauty remains but the eyes. "When the moral state of the harem is closely examined," we are told in the Journal of a Deputation to the East, "a sad picture of depravity and misery is discovered. The women are left wholly uneducated, being unable either to read or write; their time is mostly occupied in attending to their toilette, feasting their appetites, frivolous gossip, and domestic squabbles. As respects the intellect, they live and die in a state of mental childhood; and with regard to morals, being without the restraints of either religion or reason, they are wholly abandoned to the sway of the sensual and malevolent passions of our fallen nature. Envy, jealousy, and malice are the natural fruits of this deep moral debasement. The elder women have generally the rule, by custom, over their juniors; fictitious intrigues against one another, acts of tyranny and cruel revenge, are the inevitable consequences of such a social system; so that, could the private and domestic life of the harems be disclosed, the majority of them would be found little pandemonia."

HARIGARA, a word which, when pronounced along with Shiva and Rama, is believed by the Hindus to bring down numberless blessings upon him who utters it. The moment these three sacred words escape from the lips, all sins are cancelled and blotted out, but if they are thrice repeated, the gods are so honoured that they are at a loss to find a recompense equal to the merit. Such privileged persons are no longer obliged to pass into other bodies, but are straightway absorbed in Brahm.

HARIOLI, magicians who are mentioned by Tertullian as waiting on the altars of the heathen to receive their inspiration from the fumes of the sacrifices.

HARISCHANDIS, a sect composed of doms or sweepers in the western provinces of Hindustan. Their name bears an allusion to the Pauranic prince Harischandra, who, becoming the purchased slave of a man of this impure order, instructed his master, it is said, in the tenets of the sect. What these tenets were, however, is not known, and Dr. H. H. Wilson thinks it may be doubted whether any adherent of the sect now exists.

HARKA-RE, a deity worshipped by the ancient Egyptians. He was the son of AMMON (which see), and supposed to be identical with the Grecian HERACLES (which see).

HARLOTS. See PROSTITUTION (SACRED).

HARMONAH, a goddess of the Slemitic nations, corresponding to HARMONIA (which see) of the Greeks.

HARMONIA, a goddess among the ancient Greeks. She was the daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, or, as some allege, of Zeus and Electra. Cadmus, king of Thebes, received Harmonia in marriage, and all the gods of Olympus graced the nuptials with their presence. On that occasion the newly wedded spouse received either from Aphrodite or Athena a fatal necklace, which caused mischief and misfortune to every one who possessed it. After passing through various hands, it was at length dedicated in the temple of Athena at Delphi. Both Harmonia and Cadmus are said to have been changed into dragons, and transferred to Elysium; or as others affirm, they were carried thither in a chariot drawn by dragons.

HARMONIES, works designed to exhibit the narratives of Scripture in chronological order, so as to manifest the harmony or agreement of the statements made by the different writers. Attempts of this kind have been made from an early period after the completion of the canon. Thus Jerome mentions Theophilus of Antioch as having written a harmony of Scripture; but if such a work ever existed, it has long ago perished. Eusebius speaks with approbation of a harmony of the four gospels prepared about the middle of the second century by Tatian, and also of another work of a similar kind by Ammonius, an Alexandrian, in the commencement of the third century. Both harmonies have long ago been lost. Eusebius himself, who wrote in the early part of the fourth century, composed a very celebrated Harmony of the Gospels, in which he arranged the various events narrated by the Evangelists in ten tables, which serve as very useful indices to the four Gospels. A work having in view the object of a Harmony of the Evangelists was written about A. D. 400, by the illustrious Augustin, bishop of Hippo. Various attempts were made to harmonize the Sacred Writings, but more especially the Gospels, from the middle ages onward to the Reformation, but no work of the slightest value has been preserved. From the Reformation down to the present day, several harmonies have appeared both in Britain and on the Continent. Of these Lightfoot, Doddridge, and Macknight have been the most favourably received in our own country, and still more recently Townsend's Old and New Testaments, arranged in Historical and Chronological Order, has been received with a considerable measure of public approbation. The term Harmony is now almost exclusively limited to a chronological arrangement of the narratives as given by the Four Evangelists. In this respect Archbishop Newcome and the Rev. Richard Gresswell have done good service by presenting the parallel passages in a tabular form. Some of the harmonists proceed on the idea that the Evangelists intended to preserve the order of time, while others as strenuously deny that they had any such object in view. In Germany of late years, several carefully prepared harmonies have been published, among which may be mentioned De Wette and Lücke, Matthæi, Clausen, Roediger, Reichel, Overbeck, and Ziegler.

HARMONY SOCIETY, a community of Separatists in North America. Its founder was George Rapp, a Lutheran, who emigrated with a considerable number of followers from the kingdom of Württemberg in Germany. This excellent man, who was born in 1757 at Maulbronn, seceded from the Lutheran church at the age of twenty-five, and gathered around him a few adherents, to whom he officiated as pastor. In the midst of much opposition, and even open persecution, Rapp continued to maintain and to propagate his peculiar sentiments. At length he resolved to seek an asylum in the United States. Thither, accordingly, he went in 1803, accompanied by three friends, and purchased lands in Butler county. In the course of the two following years, about one hundred and twenty-five families joined Rapp and his companions, and in 1805 an association was formed on the model of the primitive church at Jerusalem, mentioned in Acts iv. 34, 35, "Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need." The town which they formed on the principle of having all things in common, was situated about one hundred and twenty miles north of Philadelphia, and so well did the scheme succeed, that in 1815 they sold their property in Butler county, and formed a new establishment on an improved plan in Posey county, Indiana. Here they remained only two years, when they again sold their property and removed to Beaver county, Pennsylvania, where they built a third town called Economy, and devoted themselves with the most commendable industry to agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and by the exertions of the whole community, amounting to somewhere about 4,000, not only are the wants of the members supplied, but a considerable surplus is yearly amassed. No member is allowed to join the community until he has passed through a year's probation, at the end of which he is required to sign a written contract, containing the basis or terms of membership, in which he surrenders not only his property, but himself personally to the community.

He loses in a manner his individuality, and becomes the property of the whole, being lost in the mass, each one living for all, and all for one. The venerable founder of this community, George Rapp, died in 1847. Immediately after his decease, the Society appointed a board of elders, consisting of nine members, seven of whom attend to the internal, and two to the external concerns. Jacob Henrici was chosen to succeed George Rapp as spiritual guide. A vote of six of the nine elders is binding. They can remove any one of the nine, and fill all vacancies.

HARPIES, fabulous birds of remarkable raptacity and swiftness which occur in the legends of ancient heathen mythology. Only one is mentioned by Homer, under the name of Podarge or swift-footed, the spouse of Zephyrus. Any one who was suddenly taken away by death was supposed to have been carried off by the Harpies. Two of these monstrous creatures are spoken of by Hesiod, under the names of Aello and Ocypete, who were so rapid in their motions as to outstrip the winds in their flight. Their residence has been placed either in the islands called Strophades, at the entrance of Orcus, or in a cave in the island of Crete. They are represented as fierce birds, with human heads and long claws. The harpies of Virgil had the face of a woman, and came out of Tartarus. Among the Greeks these creatures personified the tempests. The birds of Stymphalus were no doubt the harpies of some Arcadian tribes.

HARPOCRATES, the god of silence among the ancient Egyptians, said by some to have been the son of Isis; by others, of Isis and Osiris. His statues were usually placed in the temples near to the images of Osiris and Isis, to intimate, as Varro supposes, that the people ought to observe silence, and not divulge that these divinities had ever been mortals. Harpocrates was exhibited under the form of a young man with one finger on his mouth, indicating silence. Egyptians cut his figure upon precious stones, which they carried about with them as amulets. Sometimes he was represented as mounted upon an ostrich, with the sun and moon upon the reverse; at other times he is represented with a lion's head and birds round it.

HARUSPICES. See ARUSPICES.

HARVEST (FESTIVAL OF). The Jews were accustomed in ancient times to observe a peculiar ceremony in honour of the introduction of harvest. On the second day of the passover, or the morrow after the Sabbath, as its first day was called, a sheaf of barley was waved before the Lord as an offering of the first fruits of the harvest in the name of the whole people. This ceremony was accompanied with a special sacrifice. The festival was observed annually according to the arrangements laid down in the law of Moses, Lev. xxiii. 10-14, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then ye shall bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest : and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you : on the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it. And ye shall offer that day when ye wave the sheaf an he-lamb without blemish of the first year for a burnt-offering unto the Lord. And the meat-offering thereof shall be two-tenth deals of fine flour mingled with oil, an offering made by fire unto the Lord for a sweet savour : and the drink-offering thereof shall be of wine, the fourth part of an hin. And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self-same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God : it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings."

HASSAN, the eldest son of Ali, and the second of the twelve Imáms, of the line of Ali. On the death of his father A. D. 661, Hassan was immediately proclaimed Caliph and Imám in Irak; the former title he was forced to resign to Moáwiyah, the latter or spiritual dignity his followers regarded as inalienable. His rival granted him a pension, and permitted him to retire into private life. After nine years spent chiefly in devotion, Hassan was poisoned by his wife Jaadah, who had been bribed to perpetrate the crime by Yezid, the son of Moáwiyah. Hossein having learnt from the physician of the horrid deed, hastened to his brother's death-bed, and entreated him to name the murderer; but the dying prince replied, "O brother! the life of this world is made up of nights that vanish away. Let the murderer alone until we both meet at the judgment seat of God, where justice will assuredly be done." Hassan appears to have been, like his father Ali, a person of amiable and pious dispositions, but at the same time to have been deficient in firmness and decision of character. It is said that when he surrendered the Caliphate A. D. 669 to Moáwiyah, he stipulated that the anathemas pronounced against his father Ali in the mosques should be discontinued, but that he afterwards was weak enough to concede the point so far as to be satisfied with the condition that they should not be pronounced in his presence. Hence one party have named him the disgrace of Mussulmans, while the ardent Schiites call him the young prince of Paradise.

HASSIDEANS. See ASSIDEANS.

HATI, one of the two wolves in the Scandinavian mythology which pursue the sun and moon. The one called Sköll pursues the sun, while the other called Hati, the son of Hrodvitnir, runs before her, and as eagerly pursues the moon that will one day be caught by him.

HATTEMISTS, a sect which arose in Holland in the seventeenth century, deriving its name from Pontian von Hattem, a minister in the province of Zealand. He pushed the Calvinistic doctrine to an extreme length, so as to teach the doctrine of a fatal and unintelligent necessity. He inculcated upon his followers that men were not responsible for their actions, whether good or bad; that religion does not consist in active obedience, but in patient suffering and undisturbed tranquillity of mind. He also alleged that Christ by his death did not satisfy Divine justice, or expiate the sins of men; but that he signified to us that there was nothing in us to offend God, and in this way he made us just. This sect, as well as the kindred and contemporary sect of the VERSCHORISTS (which see), is no longer known by name to exist in Holland, but the extravagant opinions of Von Hattem are not altogether unknown in that country even at the present day.

HAUDRIETTES, an order of Romish nuns hospitaliers at Paris, founded in the reign of St. Louis, by Stephen Haudry, one of the secretaries of that prince. At first it was limited to twelve poor females, but the number gradually increased, and the order was confirmed by several popes. The members of this order afterwards received the name of Nuns of the Assumption. They wear a black habit and a crucifix on their breast. They observe the rule of St. Augustin, and make a vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

HEAD-DRESSES. In ancient times particular forms of head-dresses were considered as sacred, and appropriated to the gods. This is evident from the specimens of the Egyptian monuments in the British Museum. Thus on the figure of Osiris may be seen a species of crown which seems to have belonged to that deity at least, if not to others in the land of the Pharaohs. It consists of a conical cap, flanked by two ostrich feathers with a disk in front, placed on the horns of a goat. Among the Jews, while the turban anciently formed the common head-dress of both men and women, those worn by persons in sacred offices differed in some particulars from the ordinary turban. Thus Josephus says, speaking of the ordinary priest: "Upon his head he wears a cap, not brought in a conical form, nor including the entire head, but still including more than the half of it. It is called a mitre, but its make is such that it resembles a crown. It is made of thick swathes, but the contexture of it is linen, and it is folded round many times, and sewed together, besides which, a piece of fine linen covers the whole cap from the upper part, and reaches down to the forehead, and conceals the seams of the swathes, which would otherwise appear unseemly. This adheres closely to the head that it may not fall off during the sacred service." Again, the same Jewish historian remarks in regard to the high-priest's head-dress: "The high-priest's tiara or mitre was like that of the other priests, only it had another of purple or violet colour above, and a crown of gold of three rows about that, and terminating above in a golden cap, about the size of the joint of the little finger." In front of the mitre was a plate of gold tied with a blue lace, and on the plate were inscribed the words "Holiness to the Lord" in Hebrew characters. The modern Jews wear the TE-

PHILLAX (which see), or frontlets between the eyes, which they imagine to be commanded by the law of Moses. The Mohammedan sects are known by the colour of their head dress. Thus the sect of Ali are distinguished from the rest by their green turbans.

HEALTH, a heathen deity worshipped in ancient times under the Latin names of Sauus or Salus, both of which indicate health. Pausanias asserts the worship of this goddess to have been very common in Greece; and he says that there was an altar for this among other deities in the temple of Amphiaraus. The temple of the goddess of health stood in the city of Rome, on the Mons Quirinalis. The Greeks worshipped this goddess under the name of HYGIEIA (which see).

HEATHENS. See PAGANS.

HEAVEN. This word is frequently used in a strictly material signification as forming a part of the created universe. Thus Gen. i. 1, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." The ancient Hebrews, however, seem to have entertained very strange notions as to the structure of the material heaven, believing it to be a solid arch resting on pillars, and having foundations. Thus Job xxvi. 11, "The pillars of heaven tremble, and are astonished at his reproof." And in other passages the heaven is compared to a curtain, or the covering of a tent, as in Ps. civ. 2, "Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain." The ancient Jews believed that there were several different heavens, the lower, the middle, and the third or higher heavens. The lower heaven they considered as including the clouds and the atmosphere; the middle as being the stellar or starry region; and the third as being the heaven of heavens, or the habitation of God and his angels.

The word heaven, however, is used not only in a material but also in a spiritual sense, to indicate the future abode of the righteous after death. That such a state of happiness exists after death is evident both from reason and Scripture. The belief in a heaven beyond the grave, accordingly, is not limited to Christians, being a recognized article of the creed of Heathens, Jews, and Mohammedans. Among the ancient Greeks and Romans the heaven which they allotted to the good was called ELYSIUM (which see), the precise locality of which was a subject of considerable discussion. Though the writers of classic antiquity, particularly the poets, declared the happiness of souls in Elysium to be complete, some of them believed that the blessed inmates would, many of them, return again to earth, and pass into new bodies, destroying all recollections of Elysian bliss, by drinking of the waters of Lethe, one of the rivers of hell. Eternal blessedness was, in the view of the ancient Pagans, reserved for those only who were distinguished for their exalted virtues, and who were accordingly admitted into the society of the gods, while their idola or simulacra, as the poets alleged, continued to reside in the lower regions. The views of different heathen nations in regard to heaven are well described by Mr. Gross, in his valuable and ingenious work, 'The Heathen Religion in its Popular and Symbolical Development.' "The ancient Mexicans, as it appears from the statement of Kaiser, taught the existence of numerous spirit-abodes, into one of which the innocent shades of children were received; into another,—the sun, the valiant and illustrious souls of heroes ascended; while the corrupt and hideous ghosts of the wicked were doomed to grovel and pine in subterranean caverns. Nine heavens served to circumscribe their fanciful visions and ardent dreams of future bliss. The Greenlanders were contented to predicate the doctrine of but one future Eden, which they located in the abyss of the ocean, and to which skilful fishermen alone might dare to aspire with the confident hope of success. The relentless martial spirit of the Appalachian Indians, proclaimed itself in consigning their cowardly red brethren to the profound chasms of their native mountains, where, overwhelmed by snow and ice, they fell victims to the tender mercy of shaggy and ferocious bears. The aborigines of America were unanimous in their belief in the immortality of the soul, and a happy state hereafter, somewhat similar to the Elysian bliss of the Greeks and Romans; but of a Hades, they know little and speak seldom, and the savage-like Appalachian hell just described, is one of the remarkable exceptions in the general creed. 'All,' writes Doctor Robertson, 'entertain hopes of a future and more happy state, where they shall be for ever exempt from the calamities which embitter human life in its present condition. This future state they conceive to be a delightful country, blessed with perpetual spring, whose forests abound with game, whose rivers swarm with fish, where famine is never felt, and uninterrupted plenty shall be enjoyed without labour or toil. But as men, in forming their first imperfect ideas concerning the invisible world, suppose that there they shall continue to feel the same desires, and to be engaged in the same occupations, as in the present world; they naturally ascribe eminence and distinction, in that state, to the same qualities and talents which are here the objects of their esteem. The Americans, accordingly, allotted the highest place in their country of spirits, to the skilful hunter, the adventurous and successful warrior, and to such as had tortured the greatest number of captives, and devoured their flesh. These notions were so prevalent, that they gave rise to a universal custom, which is, at once, the strongest evidence that the Americans believe in a future state, and the best illustration of what they expect there. As they imagine that departed spirits begin their career anew in the world whither they are gone, that their friends may not enter upon it defenceless and unprovided, they bury together with the bodies of the dead their bow, their arrows, and other weapons used in hunting or war; they deposit in their tombs the skins or stuffs of which they make garments, Indian corn, manioc, venison, domestic utensils, and whatever is reckoned among the necessities in their simple mode of life. In some provinces, upon the decease of a cazique or chief, a certain number of his wives, of his favourites, and of his slaves, were put to death, and interred together with him, that he might appear with the same dignity in his future station, and be waited upon by the same attendants. This persuasion is so deep-rooted, that many of the deceased person's retainers offer themselves voluntary victims, and court the privilege of accompanying their departed masters, as a high distinction."

The heaven of the Hindu is absorption in Brahm, and of the Buddhist, annihilation or Nirvana. The priesthood of the ancient Egyptians taught the immortality of the soul under the name of Palingencia, or a second birth, being a return of the soul to the celestial spheres, or its reabsorption into the Supreme Being, without regard to the doctrine or the necessity of transmigration—a doctrine which was inculcated only upon the illiterate multitudes who could form no conception of the existence of the soul without the body. The ancient Scandinavians held that there were two different heavens; the one, the palace of Odin, which they called VALHALLA (which see), where that august divinity received all who died a violent death; and the other called GIMLI (which see), or the palace covered with gold, which, after the renovation of all things, was to be the everlasting home of the righteous, where they were to enjoy ecstatic and perennial delights. "The heroes," says the Edda, "who are received into the palace of Odin, have every day the pleasure of arming themselves, of passing in review, of ranging themselves in order of battle, and of cutting one another in pieces; but as soon as the hour of repast approaches, they return on horseback all safe and sound to the hall of Odin, and fall to eating and drinking. Though the number of them cannot be counted, the flesh of the boar Sæhrimnir is sufficient for them all; every day it is served up at table, and every day it is renewed again to its original bulk: their beverage is ale and mead; one single goat, whose milk is excellent mead, furnishes enough of that liquor to intoxicate all the heroes. Odin alone drinks wine, the only fermented liquid to the use of which his good taste or his superior dignity invites his attention. A crowd of virgins wait upon the heroes at table, and fill their cups as fast as they empty them."

The Jewish Rabbis teach that there is an upper and a lower paradise or heaven. "Between them," says one writer, "is fixed a pillar: by this they are joined together, and it is called the strength of Zion. By this pillar, on every Sabbath and festival, the righteous climb up and feed themselves with a glance of the Divine majesty till the end of the Sabbath or festival; when they slide down and return to the lower paradise." Both in the upper and the lower paradise there are said to be seven apartments for the residence and reward of the righteous. The inhabitants of these dwellings, in so far as the upper paradise is concerned, are thus described by Rabbiical tradition: "It is stated, that there are seven parties or orders which shall hereafter stand before God, and that each of these orders or parties has its particular abode or dwelling in the upper paradise. The first party or order consists of those who, for the kingdom and honour of God, suffered death, by the government under whose authority they were: as the Rabbi Akiba and his disciples were put to death by the government of Rome. The second order consists of those who have been drowned in the sea. The third is the Rabbi Jochanan Ben Zachai and his disciples. The fourth order consists of those on whom descended a cloud which covered them. The fifth consists of those who have repented: and in the same place as the penitents, stand the perfectly righteous. The sixth order consists of those who never married, and who in all their lives never tasted of sin. The seventh consists of the poor, who exercised themselves in the Bible and Mishna, and in an honest vocation.—Observe, then, that to every order is allotted a distinct abode: and the highest order, beyond which none can go, consists of those who, for the kingdom and honour of God, suffered death from the government under which they lived: as the Rabbi Akiba and his disciples."

The souls of the righteous, according to the Jewish Rabbis, do not ascend to the upper paradise immediately after they have quitted the body, but they are represented as undergoing a previous kind of novitiate in the lower paradise, which is situated midway between this corporeal world and the upper heaven. And even on reaching the purer abodes of the blessed disembodied spirits, are said to be in the habit of revisiting this lower world, and even of occasionally passing to the other apartments of the righteous. Thus the Rabbis affirm: "In paradise, every one has his particular abode, and is not allowed to go out, or ascend to the dwelling of his superior neighbour; for if he do, he is presently consumed by his neighbour's great fire. And thus they are called standers, because they stand or keep to their posts, or allotted places. There are, indeed, some pious ones, but their number is small, who, being worthy of cleaving to the holy and blessed God, are suffered to ascend or descend, to go into the upper and lower places, and to walk in all the quarters, and about all the gates and apartments: and this is a pre-eminence above which there is none: and these, when they walk about in the palaces of the angels, the quarters of paradise, and the dwellings of the other righteous, communicate to them of the lustre of that wisdom which God has abundantly vouchsafed to them."

The Mohammedans believe in "a heaven prepared for the blessed among the faithful, that is, for the professors of the true religion, and followers of the holy prophet Mohammed; in which they shall be with him enjoying perpetual light and all heavenly pleasures, always beautiful, in their full strength and vigour, brighter than the sun, and thought worthy to see face to face the Most High God, and to adore him." They hold also that there are eight heavens or different degrees of happiness. Mohammed undoubtedly held out to his followers a heaven of carnal pleasures, in which the lowest appetites of man should have their full and free indulgence, but at the same time he taught in the Koran that the height of happiness will consist in seeing God face to face; that this pleasure will be the greatest, and make us forget all the other pleasures of Paradise, and amongst others those which are common to men and beasts. Mohammedan writers have allowed sensual pleasures to form a part of the lowest degree of happiness in heaven; others have excluded them entirely from those blessed mansions. The prophets are believed to go to heaven directly; the martyrs are in the throats of birds who live only on the fruits of Paradise; the souls of the common faithful either are about the graves, or in the well Zemzem, or with Adam in the lowest heaven.

HEAVE OFFERINGS, ceremonies observed by the Jews under the Law, the offerings being lifted upwards in token of being presented to the Almighty; and, as was generally the case, being waved towards the four quarters of the earth, hence called a wave-offering, with the view of indicating that He to whom the offerings were presented was the Proprietor of the universe. In a few cases animals were subjected to the ceremony of heaving before they were killed. More commonly, however, it was performed with some particular parts after they were cut up; especially with the breast and right shoulder in all cases of peace-offerings, which were appropriated for the use of the priests by a perpetual statute. Bloodless offerings also were at times presented with the same ceremony, according to the injunction contained in Exod. xxix. 22–23. Before any bread was made of the corn of the land, a cake was first made out of the dough, consisting of a four and twentieth part, which was heaved, and then, as was the case with all heave-offerings, it was given to the priests. The Rabbin called by the name of Therumah or a heave-offering, the oblation which was given to the priests of corn and wine and oil, and whatever else was required to support life. The Hebrews called this payment sometimes the great heave offering, in comparison of the tithe which the Levites paid to the priests, and which was called the heave offering of the tithe.

HEBDOMADARI, a name applied to monks in ancient times by Cassian and Jerome, from their weekly service.

HEBDOMAGETES, a surname of Apollo, because, as some think, sacrifices were offered to this god on the seventh of every month, or as others suppose, because at the festivals in honour of this god the processions were headed by seven boys and seven maidens.

HEBDOMAS MAGNA (Lat. the great week), an appellation given anciently to the week before Easter, which was observed with the greatest strictness and solemnity. The reasons of the observance are fully stated by Chrysostom, as quoted by Bingham: "It was called the great week, not because it consisted of longer days or more in number than other weeks, but because at this time great things were wrought for us by our Lord. For in this week the ancient tyranny of the devil was dissolved, death was extinct, the strong man was bound, his goods were spoiled, sin was abolished, the curse was destroyed, paradise was opened, heaven became accessible, men and angels were joined together, the middle wall of partition was broken down, the barriers were taken out of the way, the God of peace made peace between things in heaven and things on earth; therefore it is called the great week: and as this is the head of all other weeks, so the great sabbath is the head of this week, being the same thing in this week as the head is in the body. Therefore in this week many increase their labours; some adding to their fastings, others to their watchings; others give more liberal alms, testifying the greatness of the Divine goodness by their care of good works, and more intense piety and holy living. As the Jews went forth to meet Christ, when he had raised Lazarus from the dead; so now, not one city, but all the world go forth to meet him, not with palm branches in their hands, but with alms-deeds, humanity, virtue, tears, prayers, fastings, watchings, and all kinds of piety, which they offer to Christ their Lord. And not only we, but the emperors of the world honour this week, making it a time of vacation from all civil business, that the magistrates, being at liberty from business of the law, may spend all these days in spiritual service. Let the doors of the courts, say they, now be shut up; let all disputes, and all kinds of contention and punishment cease; let the executioner's hands rest a little: common blessings are wrought for us all by our common Lord, let some good be done by us his servants. Nor is this the only honour they show to this week, but they do one thing more no less considerable. The imperial letters are sent abroad at this time, commanding all prisoners to be set at liberty from their chains. For as our Lord, when he descended into hell, set free those that were detained by death; so the servants, according to their power imitating the kindness of their Lord, loose men from their corporal bonds, when they have no power to relax the spiritual." Fasting was carried by many Christians to a much greater extent on this week than on any other, some eating nothing the whole week till the morning of the resurrection. Epiphanius says, that during this week the people lived chiefly on dry meats, namely, bread and salt and water, which they only used at evening.

HEBDOME (Gr. the seventh), a festival observed by the ancient Greeks in honour of Apollo, on the seventh day of every month, because one of them happened to be the birthday of the god. The festival was celebrated chiefly at Athens, when hymns were sung to Apollo, and the people walked in procession, carrying sprigs of laurel in their hands.

HEBE, the female attendant and cup-bearer of the gods, according to the ancient heathen mythology. She was the daughter of Zeus and Hera, and Homer in his Odyssey represents her as having been the wife of Heracles. She was worshipped at Athens under the name of Hebe, and at Rome under the corresponding Latin name of Juventas, both names signifying youth.

HEBON, a god anciently worshipped in Sicily in the shape of a bull. See BULL-WORSHIP.

HEBREWS, a name given to the descendants of Abraham according to the flesh. It was derived, as some think, from Heber or Elber, the father of Peleg, and the son of Salah, who was the grandson of Shem. Others, however, founding their idea on the meaning of the word Heber, which signifies one that passes, or a pilgrim, have derived the term Hebrews from the circumstance that Abraham and his family passed or journeyed from the other side of the Euphrates into Canaan. In reference to the name Hebrew, we may remark, that a peculiar expression occurs in Phil. iii. 5, where the apostle Paul speaks of himself as a "Hebrew of the Hebrews." In assuming such an appellation, the apostle probably meant to intimate that he was of pure unmingled Hebrew lineage, without the slightest admixture of Gentile blood. See JEWS (ANCIENT).

HECAERGE, a surname of ARTEMIS (which see).

HECAERGUS, a surname of APOLLO (which see). Servius speaks of a person of this name who was a priest of both Apollo and Artemis.

HECATÆA, apparitions mentioned in a strange story related by Eusebius. He gives an account of a magical statue of HECATE (which see) of a very extraordinary composition. It was said to be made by order of Hecate herself. They took myrrh, incense of Arabia, styrax, and certain animals called ascalabota, which some interpret to be lizards, others rats, and others moles; they reduced them all to powder, and made of them a paste which they moulded into the figure of Hecate. All those who exercised magic arts invoked this goddess. The ceremonies were performed at midnight by a riverside, under a tree called lotus, by a person in an azure-coloured garment, who was to dig a deep hole in the ground, and then cut the throat of an ewe-lamb, and burn it on a pile of wood over the hole, all the while pouring out honey and calling on Hecate. All being rightly done, certain apparitions called Hecatæa were seen which changed themselves into various shapes.

HECATE, an ancient heathen goddess, said to be the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. She is said to have been sent in search of Persephone, to whom, when she was found, she became the constant attendant and companion, thus becoming a goddess of the infernal regions. In her capacity as a ruler in Tartarus, she had charge of the souls of the departed. Sometimes she is represented as having three bodies, and at other times three heads, but always accompanied by Stygian dogs. The worship of Hecate prevailed in different parts of Greece, but more especially at Athens and Argos, where small statues in honour of this goddess were kept inside the houses, or in front of them, and also at points where two cross roads met.

HECATOMB (Gr. hecaton, an hundred, and bous, an ox), a sacrifice among the ancient Greeks, of a hundred oxen, offered only upon very extraordinary occasions. Herodotus mentions such a sacrifice as having been offered by Clisthenes. Instead of being limited to oxen, however, the word is sometimes applied to denote the sacrifice of a hundred animals of any sort. Others again regard it as occasionally used to denote simply a large sacrifice of any kind, a definite being used for an indefinite number. Pythagoras is said to have offered a literal hecatomb in token of joy and gratitude, that he had discovered the demonstration of the forty-seventh proposition of the First Book of Euclid, viz., That in a right-angled triangle, the square of the hypotenuse is equal to the square of the other two sides. From the word hecatomb, was probably derived the name of the Greek month Hecatombaion, which commenced on the first new moon after the summer solstice, and thus corresponded to the latter part of June and the first part of July, according to our reckoning.

HECATOMBÆA. See HERÆA.

HECLA, a volcanic mountain in Iceland, which was believed by the natives in their Pagan state to be the mouth of the infernal regions.

HEGELIANS, the followers of one of the latest and most eminent philosophers of Germany. The philosophy of Hegel is strictly rationalistic in its character, religion with him being not a matter of emotion and sentiment, but strictly of reason and thought. He regarded thought as the point of union between the human nature and the divine. "With him," says Morell, "God is not a person, but personality itself, i. e. the universal personality, which realizes itself in every human consciousness as so many separate thoughts of one eternal mind. The idea we form of the Absolute, is to Hegel the Absolute itself, its essential existence being synonymous with our conception of it. Apart from, and out of the world, therefore, there is no God; and so also, apart from the universal consciousness of man there is no Divine consciousness or personality. God is with him the whole process of thought, combining in itself the objective movement, as seen in nature, with the subjective, as seen in logic, and fully realizing itself only in the universal spirit of humanity. With regard to other theological ideas, Hegel strove to deduce philosophically the main features of the evangelical doctrine. He explained the doctrine of the Trinity by showing that every movement of the thinking process is, in fact, a Trinity in Unity. Pure independent thought and self-existence answers to the Father—the objectifying of this pure existence answers to the Son, God manifested in the flesh; while the Spirit is that which proceedeth from the Father and the Son, the complete reunion of the two in the church. Hegel's Christology, again, agrees in the main ideas with the evangelical doctrine, except that his attempt to deduce the whole from philosophical principles gives to it a complete air of rationalism. He views the idea of redemption as the reunion of the individualized spirit of man with the Spirit of eternal truth and love. By faith we become one with God, forming a part of himself, members of his mystical body, as symbolized in the ordinances of the Church. This view of the Christian doctrines has been more fully developed by Strauss, who has entirely denied a historical truth to the New Testament, and made the whole simply a mythological representation of great moral and spiritual ideas. On the doctrine of immortality, Hegel has said but little, and that little by no means satisfactory. However the depth and comprehensiveness of his system may charm the mind that loves to rationalize upon every religious doctrine, it can, assuredly, give but little consolation to the heart, that is yearning with earnest longings after holiness and immortality."

In the view of Hegel, the absolute religion to which all the others are only preparatory stages is Christianity. In the God-Man is manifested the unity of man with God. In the mind of mankind God evolves himself, and thus it is that mankind's knowing of God is God's knowing of himself. The revelation of absolute knowledge is the very essence and design of Christianity, according to the system of Hegel, and hence he held in utter contempt all mere emotional religion. Thus, referring to the system of Schleiermacher, he declares, "If religion in man be founded on feeling only, this feeling can be correctly defined only as the feeling of dependence; and hence the dog would be the best Christian, for he has this feeling most strongly developed in himself, and lives chiefly in this feeling. The dog has even cravings for salvation when his hunger is appeased by a bone."

During his life, the doctrines of Hegel were ably supported by a few faithful and devoted followers, particularly by Daub, Heinrichs, and Marheineke; but it was after his death in 1831 that a school of Hegelians assumed to itself a decided place in the literature of Germany. In the outset of their career as a philosophico-religious sect, the first and chief effort of this body of profound thinkers was to establish the accordance of the system which their master had bequeathed to them, with the doctrines of Christianity as laid down in the Bible. In connection with this main subject, the first point of controversy which arose referred to the question, whether immortality in the sense of a personal existence after death had ever been taught by Hegel. The disciples of the Hegelian school now split into two parties, the orthodox and the unorthodox party. The former included Gabler, Göschel, Rosenkranz, and Schaller. The latter was headed by Strauss, the celebrated author of Das Leben Jesu, the Life of Jesus, a work which, published in 1835, denied the historical existence of the God-man, and pushed to its farthest limits the idea of Hegel, that not Christ but mankind was the Son of God. In boldness of statement the disciple far outran the master. He attempted to prove that the Christ of the Gospels is historically impossible, and can only be understood as a myth. Professing as Strauss did to follow in the steps of Hegel, the 'Life of Jesus' no sooner appeared, than it called forth from all quarters of Germany the loudest denunciations, not only against its author personally, but against the whole Hegelian school to which he belonged. Strauss was followed by the Tübingen school, including Baur, Teller, and Schweigler, who laboured to show that all the books of the New Testament, with the exception of five, were the fabrications of the second century. Feuerbach went still farther, and exerted his utmost ingenuity to show that theology was only a reflection of anthropology, and all religion only a dream. Thus was the absolute idealism of Hegel pushed by his followers to the extreme of infidelity, and no-religion. But at this point matters reached their crisis, and as might have been expected, a decided reaction took place. The ablest theologians of Germany entered the field of conflict in defence of the revealed truth of God. Neander, Tholuck, Lücke, Hoffmann, and Elbrard, with a host of others, replied to Strauss and the Tübingen school so effectively, that the whole religious aspect of Germany has within the last fifteen or twenty years undergone a complete revulsion in favour of evangelical Christianity.

HEGIRA (Arab. flight), the grand era from which all Moslem time is reckoned. It dates from the 16th July A.D. 622, being the precise period at which the prophet Mohammed fled with his followers from Mecca to Medina, that he might escape the persecution of the Koreishites. On account of rivalries in commerce, the inhabitants of Medina were jealous of those of Mecca, and no sooner therefore did the prophet arrive in their city, than they professed themselves his followers, and Mohammed seizing the opportunity declared his mission, and took up his residence in the town. This was in the fourteenth year after he had proclaimed himself a prophet, during the reign of Heraclius in Constantinople, and Khosro Parvis in Persia. The Medinese were delighted to receive the prophet, and forthwith changed the name of their city from Yatrib to Medinet-al-Nabi, which signifies the city of the prophet.

convent, the abbot or archimandrite of a monastery in connection with the Greek church.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, a "Form of Instruction," as it was originally called, drawn up by Caspar Olevianus and Zechariah Ursinus in 1562, for the use in the first instance of the Reformed Church of the Palatinate, but afterwards received throughout nearly the whole of the Reformed Churches. This excellent catechism, which was also called the Palatine Catechism, was the model on which the Westminster Divines formed the Shorter Catechism of the Presbyterian churches in Britain. In later times the Heidelberg Catechism was translated into almost all the modern languages, and many commentaries were written upon it. It is divided into 129 questions, and it consists of three principal parts: 1. Concerning the misery of man in consequence of sin; 2. Concerning the redemption from that state; and 3. Concerning man's gratitude for that redemption. The Heidelberg Catechism is a recognized symbolic standard by the Dutch Reformed Church both in Holland and America.

HEIDELBERG CONFESSION, a confession drawn up by Bullinger, and published by order of the Elector Palatine A. D. 1564. It appeared at first in Latin, and afterwards a German translation was prepared by the author himself. Though designed originally for the use of the Reformed Churches in the Palatinate, it came to be generally recognized by the Calvinian churches both in Germany and France.

HEIDRUN, a she-goat, which in the ancient Scandinavian mythology is said to stand above Valhalla, or the heaven of heroes, and to feed on the leaves of a very famous tree called Læraeth. From the teats of this she-goat flows mead in such abundance, that every day a vessel large enough to hold more than would suffice for all the heroes, is filled with it.

HEIFER, a young cow anciently sacrificed by the Jews in the temple of Jerusalem. It is called in Num. xix. 2, by a term which in the original signifies "the red heifer." Special and minute directions were given in the Law of Moses in reference to the sacrifice of this animal. A heifer wholly red was to be selected, without one single spot of any other colour, "free from blemish, and on which the yoke had never yet come." This animal was to be brought to the priest, who was to slay her without the camp. Having slain the heifer, he was to dip his finger in the blood, and to sprinkle it seven times before the tabernacle; after which he was to burn the carcass, and taking cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet wool, to cast them into the flames. The ashes were then to be gathered up, (see ASHES,) and laid in a clean place for the use of the congregation, by the sprinkling of which ashes in water, it became a water of separation. This peculiar ceremony is supposed by some to have been intended as a reproof to the superstitions of idolatrous nations. But such a view of the matter can scarcely be maintained, when we consider that cows never were sacrificed by the Egyptians, being considered as sacred to Isis. In connection with the red colour of the heifer, Sir William Ousely has shown, that almost all over the East, idols were painted or smeared with red. It has been supposed that a red heifer was sacrificed every year by the Jews, and its ashes distributed over all the towns and cities of Israel. Maimonides, however, denies this, and states, "Nine red heifers have been sacrificed between the delivering of this precept and the desolation of the second temple. Our master Moses sacrificed the first; Ezra offered up the second; and seven more were slain during the period which elapsed from the time of Ezra to the destruction of the second temple; the tenth, King Messiah himself shall sacrifice; by his speedy manifestation he shall cause great joy. Amen: May he come quickly." See IDOLATRY.

HEIMDALL, the porter or sentinel of the gods among the old Scandinavians. His province was to watch at one of the extremities of the bridge BI-FRÖST (which see), for fear the giants should make use of it to get into heaven. "It was a difficult matter," says Mallet, "to surprise him; for the gods had given him the faculty of sleeping more lightly than a bird, and of discovering objects by day or night farther than the distance of a hundred leagues. He had also an ear so fine that he could hear the very grass grow in the meadows and the wool on the backs of the sheep. He carried in the one hand a sword, and in the other a trumpet, the sound of which could be heard through all the worlds." The Prose Edda thus describes him: "One of them (the deities) is Heimdall, called also the White God. He is the son of nine virgins, who were sisters, and is a very sacred and powerful deity. He also bears the appellation of the Gold-toothed, on account of his teeth being of pure gold, and also that of Hallinski-thi. His horse is called Gulltopp, and he dwells in Himinbjörg at the end of Bifröst. He is the warder of the gods, and is therefore placed on the borders of heaven, to prevent the giants from forcing their way over the bridge. He requires less sleep than a bird, and sees by night, as well as by day, a hundred miles around him. So acute is his ear that no sound escapes him, for he can even hear the grass growing on the earth, and the wool on a sheep's back. He has a horn called the Gjallar-horn, which is heard throughout the universe." In the confusion of the last times, Loki and Heimdall fight and mutually kill each other.

HEL, a term which in the Scandinavian mythology is synonymous with the hell or hades—the lower regions of other creeds, with the important exception, however, that it does not imply either a place or a state of punishment.

HELA, the goddess of Death among the ancient Scandinavians. She was said to have been banished into the lower regions, where she has the govern ment of nine worlds, into which she distributes those who are sent to her. Eating and drinking appear to have been observed in the hall of Hela, much in the same manner as in that of Odin. In the Alvis-mal, mention is made of a kind of corn which grows in the infernal regions, and it is stated that the inhabitants are regaled plentifully with supplies of meal. The regions over which Hela ruled were reserved for those that died of disease or old age. Her palace was Aegish; her table Famine; her waiters were Slowness and Delay; the threshold of her door was Precipice; her bed Care; she was livid and ghastly pale; and her looks inspired horror. Hela, who thus ruled over nine worlds in Niflheim, was the daughter of Loki, the contriver of all mischief, and the disgrace of gods and men.

HELENA, the daughter of Zeus and Leda, and being possessed of remarkable beauty, she was said to have been carried off by Theseus to Attica. She was delivered by the Dioscuri, who conveyed her to Sparta, where amid numerous suitors she became the wife of Menelaus. Afterwards she was seduced and carried off by Paris to Troy, thus giving rise to the Trojan war.

HELENA'S ST. DAY, a festival in the Romish church, celebrated on the 18th of August in honour of the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great. This female saint is said to have discovered the wood of the true cross at Jerusalem, some two hundred and fifty years after the total destruction of that city by the Romans.

HELICONIDES, a name given to the Muses of ancient Greece, from Mount Helicon, where there was a sanctuary dedicated to their worship.

HELIOGABALUS, an ancient Syrian deity, alleged by Dio and Herodian to be the Sun, the name being said to be derived from the Greek word helios, the sun. The symbol of this god was a large stone or rock, rising up in the form of a mountain; and at Rome he was worshipped under the form of a pyramidal stone. The Roman Emperor Elagabalus was in his early days a priest of this Syro-Phœnician Sun-god; and even after he had ascended the throne of the Cæsars, he demanded that his favourite god should take the precedence of all the gods of Rome, and even of Jupiter himself.

HELIOS, the Sun or the Sun-god of ancient Greece, the son of Hyperion and Theia. He is represented as riding in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds round the world. He is often confounded with Apollo, who is sometimes represented with rays round his head. Wherever Helios was worshipped, sacred flocks of oxen are mentioned in connection with this god, and in Sicily in particular, which was anciently sacred to him, he is said to have had large flocks of sheep and oxen. Temples to the worship of Helios are said to have existed in Greece at a very early period, and in later times in a great variety of different parts of Greece, more especially in the island of Rhodes, where the celebrated Colossus was an image of Helios or the Sun. The animals offered in sacrifice to this god were white, and especially white horses were used for this purpose. Of the animals, the cock was considered as particularly sacred to Helios. The worship of the Sun was practised also among the ancient Romans, not however under the name of Helios, which was peculiar to Greece, but under that of Sol, (which see).

HELL. Both in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures there are two words, Sheol and Hades, which are sometimes translated "hell," but which denote the world of departed spirits in general; while there are other two words similarly translated—Tartaros and Gehenna—which signify the place of eternal punishment reserved for the wicked after death. The existence of a hell as well as of a heaven, of a place of everlasting misery as well as of a place of everlasting happiness, forms an essential part of every religious creed. The Amenti of the ancient Egyptians, the Putala of the Hindus, and the Orcus of the Romans, refer to a future state; but the doctrine of a future punishment is found embodied in all religious systems, whether Christian, Heathen, Jewish, or Mohammedan.

The Christian Scriptures describe hell as a place of torment, the bottomless pit, the worm that never dies, the fire that never shall be quenched. The eternity of hell's torments is placed on precisely the same footing as the eternity of heaven's bliss. Thus "The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." Some have ventured to deny the eternal duration of the punishment of the wicked, but the same word which is used in the Bible to express the duration of the misery of the wicked, is employed also to express the duration of the happiness of the righteous; and we have no reason to believe that the inspired writers would use the same word to express ideas essentially different from one another. The Jewish Rabbis, as we have seen in the article HEAVEN, believe in an upper and a lower heaven, and in the same way they believe that there is an upper and a lower hell. Some of them suppose that hell was created before the world, while others assign its formation to the second day of creation, and thus they account for no declaration being made concerning the work of that day that it was good. The usual appellation which the Rabbis give to hell is Gehennom, to which the Talmud adds seven other names, said to be applied to seven mansions into which hell is divided. It is further alleged, that "in hell there are seven dwellings or divisions; and in each division six thousand houses; and in each house, six thousand chests; and in each chest six thousand barrels of gull." A high rabbinical authority affirms each of the divisions of hell to be as far in depth as one can walk in three hundred years. The whole extent is thus described in the Talmud: "Egypt is four hundred miles in length, and the same in breadth. Egypt is equal in extent to a sixth part of Ethiopia; Ethiopia to a sixth part of the world; the world to a sixth part of the garden in Eden; the garden to a sixth part of Eden; Eden to a sixth part of hell. The whole world, therefore, in respect of hell is but as the cover of a caldron; and the extent of hell is inadequately expressed even by this comparison."

A Rabbinical writer, quoted by Mr. Allen in his 'Modern Judaism,' says of the first division: "In it there are many caverns, and in them are fiery lions: and when a man falls into one of those caverns, the lions devour him: and when he is consumed, he appears again, as perfect as if he had not been touched by the fire: and they who are thus restored, are afterwards thrown into the fire of every cavern in the first division.—In it are ten of the seventy nations: and among them is Absalom.—An angel beats every one with a fiery whip,—and they are thrown in and consumed with fire. Then are brought forth others, whom he likewise beats; and they are thrown into the fire. And thus are all of them served, till all have had their doom. Last of all, Absalom is brought forth, in order to his receiving the same punishment. But then is heard a voice from heaven, saying, Beat him not, neither burn him; because he is one of the sons of my beloved, who said at mount Sinai, All that the Lord hath said, we will do. This process of beating and burning is said to be repeated seven times in the day, and three times in the night; but Absalom is declared to be exempted from it all. The same writer proceeds to describe each of the six other infernal mansions as containing ten of the seventy nations who undergo the same punishments, and one or more wicked Israelites who enjoy the same exemption as Absalom. Such is the manner in which rabbinical justice dispenses vengeance to the Gentiles, and impunity to wicked Israelites. The Talmud declares, that the fire of hell has no power over the sinners among the Israelites. Another oracle says: Hereafter both the Israelites and the people of the world shall go down to hell: and the people of the world shall be consumed and destroyed; but the Israelites shall come out again unhurt."

Many of the Jews believe in hell, not as an eternal dwelling-place of the wicked, but, to the Israelites at least, as a place of temporary purgatorial punishment; and the Rabbis teach that the prayers of a son are of powerful efficacy in delivering his father's soul from hell. The repetition of the KODESH (which see), also, a certain prayer in the daily morning service, is powerful in accomplishing the same end. Very wicked people are believed by some Rabbis to be annihilated. The torments of hell, whether they be temporary or eternal in the view of Jewish writers, are at all events alleged to have seasons of intermission. Thus Menasseh says, "Even the wicked, of whom it is said that they descend into hell, and ascend not from thence, enjoy rest on the Sabbath. The Sabbath is therefore called 'a delight,' because thereon those above and below are both delighted. Another writer says: the Sabbath is to the wicked in hell a day of rest.—But for this they receive a double punishment on the sixth day. Another says, that they have every day, at each time of prayer, morning, evening, and night, an hour and half of rest. Wherefore they rest, in the whole, every day, four hours and half.—They likewise rest twenty-four hours, every Sabbath; which, added to the other, make fifty-one hours of rest in the week."

According to the teaching of various Rabbis there are three kinds of punishment in hell—heat, cold, and the perturbation of the soul. The heat they suppose to be occasioned by a violent fire, which, in the opinion of some, "is not properly a body that can receive its sustenance from wood and other combustible matter reducible to ashes, but God maintains and feeds it, and keeps it shut up in a place; as he has placed millions of angels in heaven." The punishment is said by some to be increased by changing its character, the unhappy victim being plunged at one time in scorching flames, and at another in freezing cold. To these material torments are also added the anxieties and devouring anguish of a guilty conscience.

The Mohammedans, like the Jews, divide hell, which they term Gehennom, into seven portions, but they are not agreed as to the inhabitants of its several districts. The most common opinion in regard to them is, that the first division, Gehennom, properly so called, is destined for those worshippers of the true God who have not acted up to the principles of the faith which they professed; the second division, called Lodha, is for the Christians; the third, named Hothama, is for Jews; the fourth, denominated Säir, is destined for the Sabæans; the fifth, called Sacur, is for the Magians or Guebres; the sixth named Gehim, will receive Pagans and idolaters, while the seventh, the severest place of punishment in the lowest depths of the abyss, is named Hooviat, and reserved for the hypocritical professors of religion. A guard of nineteen angels keep watch over each of these apartments. Instead of the seven divisions, one Mohammedan commentator says, that hell has seven gates, by which he allegorically intimates seven sins: 1. Avarice; 2. Gluttony; 3. Hatred; 4. Envy; 5. Anger; 6. Luxury; and 7. Pride. Another says that these gates are seven members by which men commit sin.

The Mohammedans believe that the punishment of those in the district of Gehennom will not be eternal, but that after their crimes are expiated by purgatorial flames, they will be admitted into paradise. Between heaven and hell they believe there is an intermediate place called ARAF (which see).

The Hindus believe in a graduated scale of future punishments as well as rewards; the less wicked being sunk into a lower position in the next birth—the more wicked being sent down to one or other of innumerable hells, to reappear, however, on earth, in mineral, animal, and vegetable forms before they rise to the human,—the most wicked of all being doomed to experience the misery and woe of perdition till the time of the dissolution of all things.

According to the system of the Buddhists there are eight principal narakas, or places of torment, all of them situated in the interior of the earth, and so enclosed that there is no possibility of escape from it. The following description of the Buddhist hell is given by Mr. Spence Hardy in his 'Manual of Buddhism':

'Under the great Bô tree, at the depth of 100 yojanas, is the roof of Awichi, the flames from which burst forth beyond the walls, and rise to the height of 100 yojanas. These are 16 narakas called Osupat, exterior to Awichi, four on each side. The distance from the centre of Awichi to the outermost part of the Osupat narakas is 19,400 gows, and at this part they verge upon the great sea. By the power of the beings who suffer in Awichi, the doors of the Osupat narakas are continually opening and shutting. The flames proceeding through the doors, when they are thus thrown open, burst upon the waters of the sea, to the distance of many yojanas, and thus cause a vacuum. Towards this vacuum the water of the sea is continually drawn, in a powerful manner, and with great noise and tumult, so that any ship coming near would be undoubtedly destroyed. This naraka is called Awichi, from a, negative, and wichi, refuge, because it affords no way of escape; it allows of no intermission to its misery.

'There is also the hell called Lókántarika, which is the intervening space between every three sakwalas. In this world, there is above neither sun, moon, nor light; and below there is water, extremely cold. The darkness is incessant, except in the time of a supreme Buddha, when occasionally the rays proceeding from his person, and filling the whole of the 10,000 sakwalas, are seen; but this appearance is only for a moment, like the lightning, no sooner seen than gone.

'The inhabitants of Sanjīwa live 500 years, each year being the same length as a year in Chāturmaharājika, so that their age is 160,000 kēlas of the years of men. In Kālasūtra the age is 1,296,000 kēlas of years. In Saṅghata it is one prakōti and 368,000 kēlas. In Rowrawa, it is eight prakōtis and 2,944,000 kēlas. In Maha Rowrawa, it is sixty-four prakōtis and 3,568,000 kēlas. In Tāpa, it is 530 prakōtis and 8,416,000 kēlas. In Awichi it is an entire anta kalpa.'

The hell or infernal regions of the ancient heathens was a mighty kingdom over which Pluto reigned, and within its vast domains included the whole subterranean world. Four rivers, Acheron, Styx, Cocytus, and Phlegethon, must be passed by the dead before they find an entrance to the gloomy realms of the shades below. According to the description of Virgil the regions of this kingdom were five in number. The first or preparatory region was the shade of all kinds of disasters, distresses, discord, and war, and next to these came, harpies, giants, and all kinds of monsters of every description. The second region was that of the waters through which flowed the Styx. The third was Erebus, in which Virgil places infants, persons condemned to death without cause, suicides, and those who had fallen in war. This region was watched by Cerberus, the three-headed dog; and here was erected the judgment-seat of Minos, who assigned to each one of the shades its special residence. The fourth region was called Tartarus, where dwelt those who had been guilty of great crimes. The fifth region was Elysium, the abode of the blessed.

In the Scandinavian mythology the wicked first pass to Hel, which seems simply to denote the abode of the dead, and thence to Helheim or Nifheim, which is represented as being the dwelling-place of HELA (which see), in the ninth world. This, like Valhalla, was not an eternal but a temporary place of residence, and in a remote futurity the inhabitants of both regions will be consigned by Alfadir, either to Ginli or to Nastroud, both of which will be eternal.

HELLENISTS, a name applied to the Grecian Jews who lived in Egypt and other countries where the Greek language was spoken, thus being distinguished from the Hebrews, properly so-called, who used the Hebrew tongue. It was in the time of Alexander the Great that the Jews began to divide themselves into Hebrews and Hellenists. They became acquainted at this era with the language, literature, and philosophy of the Greeks. The Greek translation of the Seventy was accomplished at this time, and synagogues were rapidly multiplied in all parts of the world. Thus, in a most remarkable manner, was preparation made for the diffusion of that blessed Gospel which should come from the Jews. No less important was the change which now took place upon the character and habits of the Jews themselves. Their literature had even from the remotest periods of their history been of a peculiar and almost exclusive nature. By the influence, however, of the language and literature of Greece, which at this period began to be largely felt, the foundation was laid of a new epoch in Jewish literature, which received the name of Hellenistic. Thus arose the Alexandrian school of philosophy, which, by combining Grecian with the Oriental modes of thinking, led to the diversified forms of Gnosticism which formed so characteristic a feature in the aspect of Christianity during the first two centuries after the Christian era.

HELLOTIA, a festival celebrated at Corinth in honour of Athena, and also in Crete in honour of Europa.

HELLOTIS, a surname of Athena at Corinth, supposed to be derived from Hellotia, a daughter of Timander, who, having taken refuge in the temple of Athena, when Corinth was burnt down by the Dorians, was destroyed, along with her sister, in the temple. A short time after this disaster, the plague broke out at Corinth, and it was declared by the oracle that the pestilence should not cease until a tem ple was erected in honour of Athena Hellotis. The term Hellotis was also used as a surname of Europa in Crete.

HELMSTADIAN CONTROVERSY, a name given to the controversy raised by Calixtus in the seventeenth century, from Helmstadt, the place where it originated. See CALIXTINS.

HELVETIC REFORMED CHURCHES. Christianity was first introduced into Helvetia or Switzerland, in the seventh century, by St. Gall, a native of Ireland. This pious monk was educated at Bangor near Belfast, under Columbanus, and was one of twelve Irish monks who left Ireland about A. D. 599, with the view of diffusing a knowledge of Christian truth on the continent of Europe. For twenty years these zealous Irish missionaries laboured in Burgundy, and at the end of that period, through the opposition of the Pagans in that district, Columbanus was driven into exile, accompanied by St. Gall. Ascending the Rhine, they entered Switzerland about A. D. 610, and took up their residence at the head of the lake of Zurich. Here the natives were wholly under the influence of Pagan idolatry, and St. Gall, burning with zeal, set fire to the Pagan temple of the district, casting the idols into the lake. This, as might have been anticipated, instead of gaining over the people to the side of Christianity, only roused their indignation against the missionaries, and the result was, that St. Gall and his companions were compelled to seek refuge in flight. Passing through the canton of St. Gall, they formed a settlement at Bregentz, at the eastern extremity of the lake of Constance. Taught by past experience that the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God, the monks conducted their mission here with zeal, tempered with prudence, and, accordingly, they met with some measure of success. At the end of two years, however, through the influence of the Pagan part of the population, they were banished from this place also. Columbanus and his companions, discouraged by the treatment they had experienced in Switzerland, quitted the country, and retired to Italy, leaving St. Gall behind so sick as to be unable to be removed. On recovering from his illness, he repaired with a few adherents to a sequestered spot, where he erected the monastery of St. Gall in the canton of the same name. Here he spent the rest of his days in works of piety and devotion, while from his monastery the light of Christianity was diffused over the surrounding country. St. Gall lived to a very advanced age, and died at Arbon A. D. 640.

After the death of Gallus or St. Gall, several of his scholars continued to labour for the conversion of the Swiss, founding monasteries, and sending forth missionaries to impart to the people a knowledge of Divine truth. Several monks also in succession came from Ireland, through whose exertions a Helvetic church was formed, strictly Romish in its character, and yielding implicit submission to the Papal power. Paganism gradually lost its hold of the country, and Christianity, in the form of Romanism, was substituted in its place.

Matters continued with little variation in this condition down to the sixteenth century. For some time before that period, however, peculiar circumstances had been gradually undermining the influence of the Pope in Switzerland. Though strongly and enthusiastically attached to their native land, the Swiss people had, from want of employment in their own country, been in the habit of enlisting extensively in the service of foreign countries. Brave, hardy, and persevering, they were highly prized as soldiers, and they had often determined the fortune of war on the battle fields of northern Italy. In his contentions with other nations, the Pope frequently found it necessary to solicit the support of the thirteen cantons; and the more effectually to accomplish his purpose, he was in the habit of liberally distributing among the people indulgences and church benefices. The natural consequence of this indiscriminate distribution of church patronage was, that the clerical order became rapidly degraded, and that intense reverence which the Swiss church and people had so long entertained for the see of Rome was now much diminished. The Swiss governments assumed a much more independent bearing towards the Pope, and as Gieseler well remarks, "the evil of foreign enlistment, which was perpetually denounced by patriots as the ruin of Switzerland, brought with it its own cure, by helping to prepare the ground for the reformation of the church."

The Reformation in Switzerland, though contemporaneous with that in Germany, was entirely independent of it, and proceeded from forces peculiar to the Helvetic church. D'Aubigné divides it into three periods, in which the light of the Gospel is seen to emanate from three different centres, all of them, however, within the Swiss cantons. "From 1519 to 1526 Zurich was the centre of the Reformation, which was then entirely German, and was propagated in the eastern and northern parts of the confederation. Between 1526 and 1532 the movement was communicated from Berne: it was at once German and French, and extended to the centre of Switzerland from the gorges of the Jura to the deepest valleys of the Alps. In 1532 Geneva became the focus of the light; and the Reformation, which was here essentially French, was established on the shores of the Lemman lake, and gained strength in every quarter."

The main instrument in commencing and carrying forward the work of Reformation in Switzerland was Ulrich Zwingli, a man eminently qualified, in many respects, to take the lead in this great movement. Possessed of a strong and clear judgment, his ardent love of truth, and an earnest zeal for its propagation, combined with a coolness, caution, and fearless intrepidity of the most remarkable kind, marked him out as well fitted to take rank with such illustrious men as Luther and Calvin. Zwingli was born at Willisau, a village on the lake of Zurich, on the 1st of January 1484. The first ten years of his life were spent in the house of one of his uncles, from which he passed to the care of Binslius, a teacher of considerable reputation at Basle. Here he made remarkable progress in his studies, and distinguished himself by his superior talents and attainments. He was now removed to Berne, where he studied under Henry Lupulus, an eminent professor of the belles lettres. While thus engaged at Berne, the Dominicans wished to persuade Zwingli to join their order, and with this view they prevailed upon him to come and reside in their convent. The step, however, met with the decided disapproval of his father, who exhorted him forthwith to leave Berne, and proceed to Vienna. Thither, accordingly, Zwingli went, and devoted himself to the study of philosophy.

Having spent two years at Vienna, Zwingli returned to Basle, where, though not yet eighteen years of age, he took upon him the charge of a school, studying theology at the same time under Thomas Wytterbach, who did not conceal from his pupils the errors of the Church of Rome, but boldly exposed them, and inculcated a spirit of free inquiry altogether unfettered by human authority. To the predilections of this able theologian, Zwingli in after life was accustomed to acknowledge his deep obligations. After having studied for four years longer with great diligence and assiduity, he was created Master of Arts. His preparatory studies being now completed, he preached his first sermon in A. D. 1506, and was the same year chosen by the community of Glarus to be their pastor. Thus invested with a sacred character, and called to the discharge of most responsible duties, Zwingli not only continued the study of the Latin classics, but devoted himself zealously to the careful examination of the Sacred Scriptures. From the writings of the fathers of the church also, more especially those of Augustine, Ambrose, and Chrysostom, he drew much information, both as to the doctrines and practices of the early church. Thus the ecclesiastical abuses which Rome had introduced became obvious to his mind, and he hesitated not, while expounding the Scriptures from the pulpit, to expose faithfully and boldly the innovations which, in the course of centuries, had been ingrafted upon the simplicity and purity of the primitive ages of Christianity. As yet he was quite devoted to the Pope; he received from him a pension as an influential preacher, and publicly approved of the support rendered by the Swiss to the Holy See. Gradually, however, his opinions began to undergo a remarkable change, more especially as to some of the leading points of the Christian system. His studies being much directed to the Word of God, he arrived at the settled conviction that the Holy Scripture is the sufficient and only rule of faith and obedience. This was the first step taken towards emancipation from the yoke of Rome.

The fame of Zwingli as a preacher and a divine from this time rose higher every day. In A. D. 1513 he set himself to the study of the Greek language, and entered with zeal into the examination of the New Testament in the original. His sermons were now characterised by a remarkably simple and Scriptural style. But Zwingli, while he sought to acquit himself as a faithful minister of Christ, took a lively interest in the public affairs of the time. He was both a Christian and a patriot, and he could not look without the deepest concern upon the unnatural position in which a large portion of his countrymen had at this period placed themselves, by engaging to fight on the side of France. He therefore raised his voice, as he had some years before used his pen, against pensions and foreign enlistments. Such a step, though thoroughly conscientious on his part, drew down upon him the indignation of a large portion of the people among whom he laboured. In these circumstances he readily availed himself of an invitation, which he received in A. D. 1516, to remove from Glarus, where he had laboured so successfully, to another sphere of usefulness, as preacher in the abbey of Einsiedeln, in the canton of Schwytz. Here he continued his studies, both in polite literature and theology. His eyes were opening more and more to the abuses of the church to which he belonged; in common with many others, he was deeply impressed with the necessity of a Reformation: but instead of inveighing openly against the errors of the system, Zwingli and his friends vainly hoped that in due time the church would reform herself, and thus supersede the necessity of any movement from without. Meanwhile, within his own limited sphere, he used all his influence to correct glaring abuses. Thus he succeeded in persuading the administrator of the convent to efface an inscription, which was placed over the entrance of the abbey, to the effect, "that here plenary remission of all sins is obtained;" the worship hitherto paid in the convent to saints and angels was discouraged; relics and other instruments of superstitious devotion were destroyed; the nuns were required to read the New Testament in the German language, and their attention was specially directed to the scriptural method of salvation through Christ alone.

Zwingli, however, while he thus laboured quietly to correct some of the most flagrant and palpable errors of the Romish church, came at length to the firm impression that the time had now arrived to make a public avowal of his sentiments. Availing himself, therefore, of the opportunity of the anniversary of the consecration of the abbey, when vast crowds were assembled, he took occasion to denounce the substitution of mere external ceremonies in place of the life of God in the soul, as an unscriptural and soul-destroying error. "Cease to believe," said he, "that God resides in this temple more than in any other place. What ever region of the earth you may inhabit, he is near you, he surrounds you, he grants your prayers, if they deserve to be granted; but it is not by useless vows, by long pilgrimages, or offerings destined to adorn senseless images, that you can obtain the divine favour: resist temptation, repress guilty desires, shun all injustice, relieve the miserable, console the afflicted, these are works pleasing to the Lord. Alas! I know it; it is ourselves, the ministers of the altar, we who ought to be the salt of the earth, who have led into a maze of error the ignorant and credulous multitude. In order to accumulate treasures sufficient to satisfy our avarice, we put vain and useless practices in the place of good works; and the Christians of these times, too docile to our instructions, neglect to obey the law of God, and think they can make atonement for their crimes, instead of renouncing them. 'Let us live according to our desires,' say they, 'let us enrich ourselves with the goods of our neighbour; let us not fear to stain our hands with blood and murder; we shall find easy expiations in the favour of the church.' Senseless men! Do they think to obtain remissions for their lies, their impurities, their adulteries, their homicides, their treacheries, by prayers recited in honour of the Queen of Heaven, as if she were the protectress of all evil doers! Undeceive yourselves, erring people. The God of justice suffers not himself to be moved by words which the tongue utters and the heart disowns. Imitate the holiness of the lives of those saints at whose feet you come hither to prostrate yourselves, walk in their footsteps, suffering yourselves to be turned aside neither by dangers nor seductions; this is the honour you should pay them. But as to yourselves, in the day of trouble, put your trust in none but God, who created the heavens and the earth with a word: invoke only Christ Jesus, who has bought you with his blood, and is the sole Mediator between God and man."

The die was now cast; the Reformer had taken his position. His audience of course were divided in opinion. Some were convinced by his arguments, but not a few left the place of worship denouncing the preacher as a heretic and traitor to his church. The monks of the neighbouring convents, naturally anxious to prevent the new doctrine from spreading among the people, strove to depreciate the character and misrepresent the motives of Zwingli. But all their efforts were unavailing. The preacher of Einsiedeln was still in connection with the Romish church; he was looked upon by the highest authorities in the church as a man not only of eminent talents, but of irreproachable character, and so high did he stand in favour with the papal Legate even at this time, that in a document dated 1st September 1518, he was appointed by that dignitary, chaplain to the Pope.

The intrepid reformer was not to be hindered in his work, either by desire of the favour or dread of the frowns of men. In the very same year, accordingly, when he was thus honoured by a dignity of the church, he openly from the pulpit of the convent warned his hearers against a trafficker in indulgences, the Franciscan Bernhardin Samson, who made his appearance in Switzerland. Nor did his zeal in the cause of ecclesiastical reform stand in the way of his promotion. On the contrary, he had been only a year in Einsiedeln when he was pressed to accept the office of Lent priest in the great Minster of Zurich. The offer was tempting, but before accepting the office, he stipulated that he should not be confined in his preaching to the lessons publicly read, but should be allowed to explain every part of the Bible. The stipulation was conceded, and on the 1st of January 1519, he entered upon his new office in the spirit of a zealous and determined advocate of reformed principles. In his mode of preaching he departed widely from the universal practice of his time. Instead of confining his sermons to certain passages appropriated to the festivals and different Sundays in the year, he revived the practice of the Fathers in expounding whole books of the Bible in regular order.

At the commencement of the ministry of Zwingli in Zurich, the bull of Pope Leo X. for the sale of indulgences had been published throughout Christendom. Luther's protest against this monstrous abuse had been heard not in Germany alone, but in other countries also. Zwingli was no stranger to what was passing around him, and although he had already lifted his voice against indulgences in the convent of Einsiedeln, yet when Samson in the fulfilment of his mission came to Zurich, the intrepid Swiss Reformer denounced the unhallowed traffic in no measured terms, and loudly censured the corruptions of the clergy and monks. It was no small encouragement to Zwingli that the opinions which since 1516 he had openly promulgated, were now preached by Luther in another country, and that the Reformation was no longer an event to be desired, but an event which was actually in progress. Switzerland, like Germany, was now in a state of religious excitement, the adherents of the reformed opinions were daily on the increase, while the monks and clergy warmly deprecated the slightest attempt at innovation on the existing order of things. The Papal Legate then at Zurich tried to gain over the Swiss Reformer. But Zwingli resigned his pension from Rome in 1520, declaring, that no earthly consideration would prevent him from preaching the gospel.

Through the influence of Zwingli, and the effect of his preaching upon the minds of the people, many of the ceremonies prescribed by the church began to be disregarded, and to fall into disuse. So rapidly, indeed, did the principles of the Reformation make progress throughout Switzerland, that Erasmus, in a letter which he wrote in 1522 to the president of the court of Mechlin, declared, "that the spirit of reform had so much increased in the Helvetic confederacy that there were 200,000 who abhorred the see of Rome."

The civil authorities of the country became alarmed at the extent to which the people carried their disregard of the injunctions of the church. The fast of Lent, which had been kept with the utmost strictness, was now neglected by some of the townspeople of Zurich, and on the complaint of several priests they were committed to prison. When examined by the council they maintained as they had been taught by Zwingli, that fasting during Lent was an ordinance of man altogether unsanctioned by the Word of God. The bishop of Constance accordingly sent a commission to Zurich to enforce observance of the ceremonies. The zeal of the Reformer was now roused, and deeming it to be an imperative duty to vindicate those who were subjected to persecution for reformed principles, he published a tract on the subject of the Lenten fast, as being an unscriptural innovation of the Church of Rome. In vain did the superior clergy remonstrate against the new doctrines; they spread rapidly among the people. A second tract from the pen of Zwingli followed a few months after the publication of the first, and to exhibit the freedom with which he exposes ecclesiastical abuses a few passages may be cited from it, which may serve as a specimen of the spirit and style of the Swiss Reformer: "You defend human traditions," says he, "by asserting that the writings of the first disciples of Christ do not contain all that is necessary to salvation, and in support of your opinion you quote John xvi. 5. 12, 'I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now;' but recollect that Jesus here speaks to his apostles, and not to Aquinas, Scotus, Bartholus, or Baldus, whom you elevate to the rank of supreme legislators. When Jesus adds, immediately after, 'Howbeit when the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth,' it is still the apostles whom he is addressing, and not men who should rather be called disciples of Aristotle than of Christ. If these famous doctors added to Scripture doctrine what was deficient, it must be confessed that our ancestors possessed it imperfect; that the apostles transmitted it to us imperfect; and that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, taught it imperfect! What blasphemy! Yet do not they who make human traditions equal or superior to the law of God, or pretend that they are necessary to salvation, really say this? If men cannot be saved without certain decrees of councils, neither the apostles nor the primitive Christians, who were ignorant of those decrees, can be saved. Observe whither you are tending! You do not all your ceremonies as if they were essential to religion; yet it exercised a much more extensive empire over the heart when the reading of pious books, prayer, and mutual exhortation, formed the only worship of the faithful. You accuse me of overturning the state, because I openly censure the views of the clergy; no one respects more than I do the ministers of religion, when they teach it in all its purity and practise it with simplicity; but I cannot contain my indignation when I observe shepherds who, by their conduct, appear to say to their flock, 'We are the elect, you the profane; we are the enlightened, you the ignorant; it is permitted to us to live in idleness; you ought to eat your bread by the sweat of your brow; you must abstain from all sin, while we may give ourselves up with impunity to every kind of excess; you must defend the state at the risk of your lives, but religion forbids us to expose ours.' I will now tell you what is the Christianity that I profess, and which you endeavour to render suspected. It commands men to obey the laws, and respect the magistrate; to pay tribute and impositions where they are due; to rival one another only in beneficence; to support and relieve the indigent; to share the griefs of their neighbour, and to regard all mankind as brethren. It further requires the Christian to expect salvation from God alone, and Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Master and Saviour, who giveth eternal life to them who believe on him. Such are the principles from which, in the exercise of my ministry, I have never departed."

In addition to the subject of the Lenten fast, Zwingli called the attention of the Zurichers to the gross abuses which had sprung up in Switzerland from the celibacy of the clergy, and in a private letter to the bishop of Constance he strongly urged the removal of this human ordinance. Instead of listening, however, to the respectful remonstrances of the Reformer, the bishop began to persecute several of the clergy who had made themselves prominent in supporting the new opinions. Reproaches and calumnies of every kind were now heaped upon Zwingli and his friends. They were branded with the appellation of Lutheran heretics, and accused of holding opinions hostile to the See of Rome. Controversies of the most violent description now arose between the contending parties, and the most unseemly disputes often took place during divine service on the Sabbath. Such a state of matters was deeply distressing to the mind of Zwingli. He was afraid that the people might begin to lose all respect for religion, and that the most injurious consequences might result to the morals of the community. He appeared accordingly before the great council of Zurich, and respectfully requested that a public conference should be held at which he might have an opportunity of defending himself and his doctrines. The wish of the Reformer was acceded to, and a conference was arranged between the two parties, to take place on the 29th January 1523, when both were appointed to set forth their respective doctrines, and to support them by Holy Scripture alone.

In preparation for the proposed conference, Zwingli published and distributed extensively sixty-seven propositions embodying the chief doctrines he had preached. The most important of them were these: "That the gospel is the only rule of faith, and the assertion erroneous that it is nothing without the approbation of the church, that Christ is the only head of the church; that all traditions are to be rejected; that the attempts of the clergy to justify their pomp, their riches, honours, and dignities, are the cause of the divisions in the church; that penances, and other satisfactory works, are the dictates of tradition alone, and do not avail to salvation; that the mass is not a sacrifice, but simply the commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ; that meats are indifferent; that the habits of monks savour of hypocrisy; that God has not forbidden marriage to any class of Christians, and consequently it is wrong to interdict it to priests, whose celibacy has become the cause of great licentiousness of manners; that excommunication ought only to take place for public scandals, and be pronounced by the church of which the sinner is a member; that the power which the Pope and bishops arrogate to themselves, is the effect of pride, and has no foundation in Scripture; that God alone has power to forgive sins; that to give absolution for money is to become guilty of simony; that the Scripture says nothing of such a place as purgatory; that the opus operatum, or the assertion that grace is necessarily derived from receiving the sacraments, is a doctrine of modern invention; that no person ought to be molested for his religious opinions, it being the duty of the magistrate to stop those only which tend to disturb the public tranquillity; and that the word of God acknowledges none as bishops and priests but those who preach the gospel."

The conference took place on the day appointed in the presence of the council of two hundred, the greater part of the nobility, and a large assembly of the people; and so successfully did the Swiss Reformer defend his doctrines against Faber the vicar-general, who was his chief and almost sole opponent, that the council closed the proceedings by passing the following decree: "That Zwingli having neither been convicted of heresy nor refuted, should continue to preach the gospel as he had done hitherto; that the pastors of Zurich should rest their discourses on the words of Scripture alone; and that both parties should abstain from all personal reflections." The publication of this decree gave a powerful impulse to the progress of the Reformation in Switzerland. The doctrines of Zwingli were generally embraced throughout the canton of Zurich, and spreading from one district to another, chiefly through the labours of the Swiss Reformer and his friend Leo Judæ, who came to Zurich in the beginning of 1523, the minds of the people were every day becoming more alienated from the Romish church, and more favourable to the reformed cause.

The Pope meanwhile seemed to take little or no interest in the important religious movement which was carrying forward among the Swiss. Zurich was the only canton which steadfastly refused to join the league with France, and still supplied the Papal army with efficient soldiers; while the rest of the cantons lent their support to France, and treated the Pope's legate with such determined hostility, that in Zurich alone could he reside with safety. In these circumstances Hadrian, who at that time filled the Papal chair, felt unwilling to take active measures in opposition to the reform movement in Zurich, and contented himself, even while the controversy was at its height, with despatching a flattering letter to Zwingli, entreating him to employ his influence in retaining on the side of the Pope a canton which had already done good service in the cause of the church. The Reformer had taken his ground, and he was resolved to maintain it. Backed by the Council of Zurich, he proceeded to rectify some of the more obvious ecclesiastical abuses. Nuns were allowed to leave their convents; several of the clergy, in defiance of the law of celibacy, entered into the married state; a German baptismal service was introduced in the city, and a new and more suitable constitution was given to the cathedral chapter. The citizens of Zurich had now become warm friends of the Reformation, and in their zeal they assembled and pulled down a crucifix which had been erected at the gate of the city. A tumult followed, and several of the ringleaders were apprehended and brought before the council, who, however, were divided in opinion as to the extent of punishment which ought to be inflicted upon the offenders. Before giving sentence, therefore, they resolved to summon a second conference on the worship of images and the sacrifice of the mass. This conference took place on the 28th of October 1523, nearly nine hundred persons being present. All the bishops and cantons of Switzerland had been invited, but only Schaffhausen and St. Gall sent delegates. The discussion terminated as in the first conference in favour of the Reformers, but the council came to the resolution that while they considered the worship of images as unscriptural, and the mass as no sacrifice, they would leave the ancient order of things for a time undisturbed until the people were more thoroughly informed on the disputed points. Meanwhile they liberated the prisoners whose trial had given rise to the conference. The bishop of Constance, ever zealous in supporting the doctrines of the Church of Rome, published a defence of the worship of images and the sacrifice of the mass. To this Zwingli replied in an able and conclusive treatise against these two leading doctrines of Romanism. So impressed were the council with the force of the arguments adduced by the Reformer, that they resolved to make open concessions to the desire so generally expressed for reform, and accordingly the shrined pictures in the churches were allowed to be closed up, and every priest was left free to celebrate mass or not as he chose. In the course of a few months more an order of council was issued decreeing the abolition of images in all places of public worship. This was followed by the rapid disappearance of all the objects and usages of superstition, and the substitution of a simple and Scriptural mode of worship. On Monday, Third day 1525, the Lord's Supper was celebrated in its original simplicity in the great minister of Zurich. Monasteries were suppressed and changed into schools and almshouses.

After Zurich had begun the work of Reformation in Switzerland, Schaffhausen and Appenzell openly joined the party. The other cantons, particularly Schwytz, Uri, Unterwalden, Lucerne, Friburg, and Zug, entered into a league "with all their power, so help them God, to stand by the old faith and banish the new; also to have no fellowship with its adherents." For some time matters assumed a very threatening aspect. A civil war seemed to be impending, which, however, was at this time happily averted.

About the period at which we have now arrived, the cause of the Reformation was not a little impeded in its progress, both in Switzerland and Germany, by a keen dispute which arose among the Reformers themselves on the subject of the bodily presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Supper. For a few years Zwingli had privately entertained and even publicly promulgated opinions on this subject contrary alike to those taught by the Church of Rome, and by the principal leaders of the Reformation. The expressions used by our blessed Lord, "This is my body," he maintained to be figurative in their character, and to imply nothing more than that the sacramental bread was a symbol or emblem of Christ's body. The Lord's Supper was thus in his view a simply commemorative ordinance. The same explanation of the words of institution was given by Geolampadius of Basle, who professed to have derived his opinions on the point from the writings of Augustin. Transubstantiation, or the actual conversion of the sacramental elements into the real body and blood of Christ, was then, as it still is, the recognized doctrine of the Church of Rome. On this subject, therefore, the Swiss Reformer was so completely at variance with the teaching of the church to which he belonged, that he felt no small difficulty and delicacy in explaining the matter to the people. While meditating on the best mode of developing his sentiments, he had a dream which he thus relates: "I tell the truth, and moreover what I have to tell is so true, that my conscience compels me, against my will, to reveal what the Lord has bestowed upon me; for I am well aware to what jests and insults I shall in consequence expose myself. I say then, that at break of day, in a dream, I appeared to myself to have a religious debate with my former opponent, and at length to have become so completely tongue-tied, as to have lost the power of saying what I knew to be true. This inability seemed to distress me exceedingly, and in five dreams in the night sometimes deeper still, as far as I am concerned, I relate but a worded man, although it is by no means a light matter which I have learnt by this dream—thanks be to God for whose glory alone I reveal these things. When in this perplexity I thought I saw a man whether he was black or white I do not remember, for I am telling only my dream who said to me, 'Stupid man that thou art, canst thou not answer as in Exodus xii. concerning the paschal lamb, This is the Lord's passover.' I immediately awoke, rose, consulted the passage in the Septuagint, and made use of it in my sermon that day with so much success, that those who had formerly entertained doubts on the subject of the Lord's Supper, immediately yielded to the conviction which it produced."

To promote the progress of Divine truth, not in Zurich alone, but throughout Switzerland generally, Zwingli established a new academy, one of the fundamental rules of which was, that, in the theological department, the teaching of the professors should be solely based on the Old and New Testaments. The benefit of this institution was felt not only during the lifetime of its founder, but has extended down even to the present day, many able and accomplished theologians having received their instruction within its walls.

In Switzerland, as in Germany and the Netherlands, the Reformation was hindered not a little by the extravagant excesses of the Anabaptists. A body of these fanatics having come to Zurich, succeeded in gaining over two learned men, Grebel and Manzius, and directed all their energies towards depreciating Zwingli, and diminishing his influence among the people; alleging that they alone were the true church, and that all those in connection with the reformed churches were unregenerate. They further insisted on the baptism of infants as invalid, on the necessity of adult baptism in all cases, and on re-baptization as the criterion of the genuine members of the Church of Christ. The council made every attempt to settle these disputes in an amicable manner. Under their authority Zwingli held private conferences with their leaders, desirous, if possible, to convince them of their errors. All, however, was unavailing, and the Reformer found it necessary publicly to censure their conduct, and to warn the people against them. Roused to madness by this public condemnation of their doctrines, they rushed to the city in crowds, with ropes round their waists, and branches of willow in their hands, pouring torrents of abuse upon Zwingli, and uttering the most fearful execrations against him. They re-baptized people in the public streets, proclaimed themselves to be the elect ones, and threatened to destroy all who should oppose them.

Amid the commotions which ensued, Zwingli exerted all his influence with the council to prevent them from using coercive measures against the Anabaptists, hoping by gentle means to reclaim them from the error of their ways. A small fine at first was the penalty imposed upon them for re-baptizing, and this being ineffectual, some of them were apprehended and committed to prison. Such moderate measures, however, had little effect in restraining these misguided men from disturbing the peace of the city.

The council accordingly proceeded to take still more stringent steps, and issued an edict forbidding them under pain of death to re-baptize any person within the territories of Zurich. In the face of this decree, Manzius persisted in re-baptizing a number of people; whereupon, being apprehended, and declaring his determination to act in defiance of the law, he was publicly executed on the 5th of January 1527. This decided step, on the part of the civil authorities, which had not been taken without earnest remonstrances against it by Zwingli, had the desired effect in checking the excesses of the Anabaptists, and putting an end to the tumults they had raised.

The reformed doctrines were now professed generally throughout most of the cantons of Switzerland. In Berne especially, they had been extensively received. The old superstitions were fast disappearing; the Romish cathedrals and churches were almost wholly deserted; and the sermons of the reformed preachers were listened to by crowded and eager audiences. A proposal was made to abolish the mass, and to make a public avowal of adherence to the Reformation. Before doing so, however, the council summoned a convocation of the clergy of the canton for the purpose of inquiring whether the doctrines of Zwingli appeared to them consonant with Scripture. Zwingli, along with several Swiss and German divines, attended the convocation, which was held towards the close of 1527; and so successful were the reformed in defending their principles, that, with the sanction of the council of Berne, the reformed worship was established throughout the whole canton. The Romish cantons, perceiving that the Reformation was rapidly gaining ground, took alarm, and anxious to repress the growing tendency towards a revolt from Rome, commenced a system of oppression and persecution, expecting thereby to reclaim those who had quitted the communion of the church. The cantons of Zurich and Berne were resolved to maintain their ground in the face of all opposition, and they were quite prepared, if necessary, to defend themselves in open war. The calamity of a civil war, however, was obviated in the meantime by the mediation of the neutral cantons, and a treaty of peace was signed on the 25th of June 1529, which was favourable to the reformed throughout all the cantons of Switzerland.

One of the most grievous sources of discouragement to the friends of the Reformation arose about this period from the controversy on the subject of the Lord's Supper, and the separation thereby effected between the Saxon and Swiss Reformers. The doctrine of the bodily presence of Christ in the Supper had been established in the Romish church since the first Lateran council, in A. D. 1215, and to this ancient doctrine Luther, for a time, firmly adhered. The first who commenced the controversy was Carlstadt, (see CAROLOSTADIANS), who poured forth from Basle his indignation against Luther, in a succession of writings directed against his doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Luther had so far differed from the Romish church as to deny the opus operatum, or necessary efficacy of the sacrament, and to reject transubstantiation, but he had maintained the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in and with the sacramental elements. Dr. Carlstadt, on the contrary, maintained the Lord's Supper to be nothing more than a commemorative rite, and the elements simply symbols of the body and blood of Christ. Zwingli had long held this doctrine in secret, and now, therefore, he openly avowed his sympathy with the views of Carlstadt. Erasmus was understood to be inclined to the same opinion.

This controversy was conducted on both sides with great ability and power. In refutation of Carlstadt Luther wrote against the celestial prophets in 1525, while Bugenhagen directed his work on the same subject against Zwingli, who defended his doctrine in several works, followed by Œcolampadius, who had imbibed the same sentiments. In a preface which Luther prefixed to Agricola's translation of the Swabian Syngamma into German, the great Saxon Reformer first encountered the Swiss party, and from that moment a strife arose of the most bitter and exasperated kind, between Luther and Zwingli, who ought to have been united in the bonds of a common brotherhood against a common foe. Nor was the Swiss doctrine of the Lord's Supper confined to Switzerland; it had many supporters also in the south of Germany. For several years the Reformed churches were agitated to a lamentable extent by the unhappy controversy which had thus arisen, and it was not till 1529 that serious attempts were made to reconcile the contending parties. The Landgrave of Hesse was the most active in resorting to healing measures. Being himself an ardent friend of the Reformation, he was deeply distressed at the alienation and estrangement which had taken place of the two leaders of the movement from each other. With the view of bringing about a friendly conference on the disputed point, he prevailed upon Luther and Zwingli to meet at Marburg, accompanied by a few friends on each side. The meeting was held at the request of the Landgrave, but led to no satisfactory result, the two Reformers being at the close of it as far as ever from agreeing on the point in dispute. An attempt was made, however, to reconcile them personally, but while Zwingli entered readily into the proposal, it was sternly declined by Luther, who expressed his astonishment that Zwingli should lay claim to be regarded as his Christian brother, when they differed on a point so momentous. Before the conference terminated, however, fourteen articles were drawn up by the Swiss and German divines jointly, containing the essential doctrines of Christianity, which they signed by common consent. The disputed point of the Eucharist was left meanwhile in abeyance, both parties agreeing to exercise mutual charity and forbearance towards each other. Once more did the Landgrave endeavour to persuade the two great Reformers to recognize one another as brethren. Zwingli held out the hand of reconciliation, but Luther was inexorable.

The effect of the discussion upon the mind of the Landgrave was, that he gave a decided preference to the doctrines of Zwingli. In vain did both Luther and Melancthon endeavour by correspondence to convince him of the truth of consubstantiation. The Diet of the empire convened at Augsburg in 1530, and while the Lutherans presented their opinions to the Diet, the Zwinglians also gave in their confession of faith which had been drawn up by Martin Bucer, and was called the Tetrapolitan Confession, from the four towns, Strasburg, Constance, Meiningen, and Lützel, by which it was presented. The only point in which the two confessions differed from each other respected the doctrine of the bodily presence of Christ in the Supper; the followers of Zwingli maintaining the simply symbolic character of the elements. At the same Diet the Swiss Reformer presented his own private confession, which contained these words on the subject of the Lord's Supper: "I believe that in the holy eucharist or supper of thanksgiving, the real body of Christ is present to the eye of faith, that is, to those who thank the Lord for the benefits conferred on us in Christ his Son, acknowledge that he assumed a real body, truly suffered in it, and washed away our sins in his own blood; and thus the whole that Christ has done is, as it were, present to the eye of their faith. But that the body of Christ, in substance and reality, or that his natural body is present in the Supper, and is received into our mouth, and masticated by our teeth—as the papists, and some who look back to the flesh-pots of Egypt represent—that I not only deny, but unhesitatingly pronounce an error, and contrary to the Word of God." He subjoins elaborate proofs from Scripture, reason, and the Fathers, in support of these views. To this confession Eck, the Romish divine, replied; and Zwingli defended himself in a letter addressed to the Emperor and the Protestant princes.

Whilst the Swiss Reformer was thus engaged in refuting the doctrine of consubstantiation as taught by Luther, his mind was much occupied in devising means for promoting the progress of the Reformation in Switzerland. Both in private and in public he was indefatigable in his labours for the advancement of the good cause. Nor were the enemies of the Reformation indifferent to the inroads which were daily making on the kingdom of darkness; but they were resolved to make a determined effort to crush the Protestant cause. The Diet of Augsburg had published a decree condemning the Protestants, and also the Sacramentarians, as they called the Zwinglians, and enjoining a strict conformity to the Church of Rome in all points. In consequence of this intolerant decree, the Protestant princes of Germany assembled at Smalkald in December 1530, and bound themselves to defend their religion against all opposition from whatever quarter. The Emperor Charles V. was alarmed at this union; but being busily engaged in foreign wars, he left the Protestants to the free exercise of their religion throughout his whole dominions.

The doctrines of the Reformation had now diffused themselves throughout almost every town and village of Switzerland. A speedy and complete triumph seemed now to await the cause of truth and religious freedom. But at the very time when the hopes of success were at the highest, Zwingli commenced a course of acting which savoured more of the politician than the Reformer. He had evidently set his mind upon the overthrow of Charles V. and the substitution of a more popular sovereign in his place. With this view he listened to proposals for an alliance between Francis I., the king of France, and the Swiss republics. This line of policy began to alienate from Zwingli many of his warmest and steadiest friends. Even the Landgrave of Hesse drew towards Luther, and sought to check the Swiss Reformer. The five Romish cantons, enraged at the progress of Reformed principles, were eager to find some excuse for ridding themselves of the treaty of Cappel. Hitherto they had been restrained from proceeding to open violence by the superiority both in numbers and force of the Protestant cantons; but having, in the meantime, made ample preparations, they were now determined to make open war. Everything now assumed an alarming aspect; the tone of the Five Cantons became every day more threatening, and Zwingli passed from one place to another proclaiming the necessity of a new Helvetic Constitution, involving an armed confederacy of the friends of the Reformation in every part of Switzerland. In this critical state of matters, the Protestant cantons held a Diet at Aran on the 12th of May 1531, when a middle course was adopted on the suggestion of the deputies from Berne. "Let us close our markets," said they, "against the Five Cantons; let us refuse them corn, salt, wine, steel, and iron: we shall thus impart authority to the friends of peace among them, and innocent blood will be spared." This proposal was resisted by Zurich, headed by Zwingli, that canton expressing a decided preference for war. The Bernese proposition, however, prevailed, and the consequences to the Five Cantons were of the most disastrous description. Famine, and its invariable attendant, disease, spread among the inhabitants despondency and death. Closely shut up in their mountains, all communication with them was intercepted by Zurich and the other allied cantons. Still the Romish cantons were intlexible. "We will never permit," said they, "the preaching of the Word of God, as the people of Zurich understand it." In vain were they reminded that by persecuting the reformed they were violating the treaty of peace. Holding a Diet at Lucerne they came to the resolution of waging war in defence of the church and the holy see. Having finished their preparations accordingly, they took the field on the 6th of October 1531.

Cappel, about three leagues from Zurich, was the point at which the army of the Five Cantons was concentrated. Alarmed at the intelligence of the arrival of the enemy, the militia of the canton were hastily assembled, and Zwingli accompanied them as chaplain to the scene of action. A battle ensued, fought with the utmost bravery on both sides, but the Zurichers being at length overpowered by numbers, were thrown into confusion and completely defeated. In the heat of the action Zwingli fell mortally wounded, and in a short time expired, exclaiming as he lay in the agonies of death, "What matters this misfortune? They may indeed kill the body, but they cannot kill the soul." Thus died the great Reformer of Switzerland, leaving behind him an imperishable name.

This victory at Cappel was hailed by the Romanists as a sure precursor, in their view, of the restoration of the Papal authority, not in Switzerland alone, but throughout all Europe. Their expectations, however, were doomed to be disappointed; the cause of the Reformation had in it a vital energy which no opposition of man could possibly destroy. Meanwhile the Zurichers were deeply discouraged by the reverses which they had sustained; and with no other stipulation than that their faith should be preserved, they concluded a peace with the Five Cantons.

The Church of Rome now succeeded in regaining the ascendancy in those very parts of Switzerland where her sway had been most indignantly disowned. "The wind of adversity," says D'Aubigné, "was blowing with fury: the evangelical churches fell one after another, like the pines in the forest whose fall before the battle of the Goubel had raised such gloomy presentiments. The Five Cantons, full of gratitude to the Virgin, made a solemn pilgrimage to her temple at Einsidlen. The chaplains celebrated anew their mysteries in this desolated sanctuary; the abbot, who had no monks, sent a number of youths into Swabia to be trained up in the rules of the order, and this famous chapel, which Zwingli's voice had converted into a sanctuary for the Word, became for Switzerland, what it has remained until this day, the centre of the power and of the intrigues of the Papacy.

"But this was not enough. At the very time that these flourishing churches were falling to the ground, the Reform witnessed the extinction of its brightest lights. A blow from a stone had slain the energetic Zwingli on the field of battle, and the rebound reached the pacific Ecolampadius at Basle, in the midst of a life that was wholly evangelical. The death of his friend, the severe judgments with which they pursued his memory, the terror that had suddenly taken the place of the hopes he had entertained of the future—all these sorrows rent the heart of Ecolampadius, and soon his head and his life inclined sadly to the tomb. 'Alas!' cried he, 'that Zwingli, whom I have so long regarded as my right arm, has fallen under the blows of cruel enemies! He recovered, however, sufficient energy to defend the memory of his brother. 'It was not,' said he, 'on the heads of the most guilty that the wrath of Pilate and the tower of Siloan fell. The judgment began in the house of God; our presumption has been punished; let our trust be placed now on the Lord alone, and this will be an inestimable gain.'" Ecolampadius declined the call of Zurich to take the place of Zwingli. 'My post is here,' said he, as he looked upon Basle."

How often in the history of the Christian church has the truth of the proverb been realized, that "man's extremity is God's opportunity." The death of Zwingli, followed by that of Ecolampadius, appeared at first as if it were the death blow of the Swiss Reformation. But at that very moment, when all seemed to be lost, was God preparing to commence a work of Reformation in Geneva, which should so effectually operate on the whole Helvetic territory, as to revive and finally establish the Reformed church in that country. Calvin may be considered as having succeeded to the authority of Zwingli in Switzerland. When the Swiss Reformer fell on the field of Cappel, Geneva was still under the power of Rome, but scarcely a year passes when William Farel is found preaching the gospel in that ancient city with acceptance and power, and in a few years more John Calvin arrives to complete what Farel had begun. The doctrine and discipline of the Reformed communion, as modelled by Calvin, (see GENEVA, CHURCH OF,) was received by the Helvetic Reformed Church generally. Zurich and Berne for a time adhered both to the tenets and form of government which Zwingli had established; but such was the prudence and powerful influence of the French Reformer, that he succeeded in overcoming their prejudices, and in effecting a union among the Helvetic churches. The doctrine of Zwingli on the subject of the eucharist, as being nothing more than a commemorative rite, and of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, as being merely symbolical or figurative, was now abandoned, and the doctrine of Calvin received, which acknowledges a real, though spiritual, presence of Christ in the sacrament, which is realized by the believer alone. The doctrine of predestination also, though resisted by Berne and Zurich for a time, was at length accepted by the Helvetic church, and a union effected between the Swiss churches and that of Geneva.

Purity of doctrine, however, did not continue long to characterize the Reformed churches of Switzerland. Socinus, the originator of the Socinian heresy was himself a member of the Swiss church, and even professed to receive the Helvetic confession. And even during the lifetime of Calvin, Servetus, in Geneva itself, denied openly the divinity of Christ. During the last two centuries, the Helvetic Reformed Church, while it has maintained its ground against Popery, has given way to an influx of Arianism, Socinianism, and Rationalism, which has reduced its influence among the Reformed churches of the Continent far below what might have been expected from its earlier history. Irreligion and infidelity have so completely pervaded Switzerland, even in its Protestant cantons, that a recent traveller of the highest intelligence and integrity, Mr. Samuel Laing, remarks, "The Swiss people present the remarkable social phenomenon of a people eminently moral in conduct, but eminently irreligious; at the head of the moral scales in Europe for ready obedience to the law, for honesty, fidelity, and sobriety—at the bottom of the scale for religious feeling, observances, or knowledge." The full extent of this description, however, is scarcely borne out by the fact, that when the local authorities of Zurich, in 1839, appointed Dr. Strauss, the infidel author of 'Das Leben Jesu,' to a professorship of theology, the people, assisted by some of the clergy, rose in a mass to oppose his instalment, and so violent was the tumult, that even blood was shed.

Religion, it must be confessed, is at a low ebb in Switzerland generally, and although a revival is no doubt going forward at Geneva, chiefly through the influence of the Evangelical Protestant Church, this extends little farther than a few of the larger towns. The Evangelical Society of Geneva is no doubt effecting a good work in their own country, as well as in France, but much yet remains to be accomplished before the Helvetic Reformed Church will be able to assert anything like a conspicuous place among the Protestant churches of Europe.

HELVETIC CONFESSION. The first Helvetic Confession was published six years after the presentation of the Lutheran and Tetrapolitan Confessions to the Diet of Augsburg. At a meeting of the Swiss divines held at Basle in 1536, it was resolved to draw up a confession, not only on the disputed point of the eucharist, but embodying the general articles of the Reformed faith. The task was committed to Bullinger, Leo Judæ, and three others. That which generally receives the name of the Helvetic Confession is, however, the larger one, called 'Expositio Simplex,' drawn up at the request of the Elector Palatine, and composed by Bullinger. It was put forth, first in Latin, and afterwards in a German translation made by the author himself. It consisted of thirty chapters, and was adopted not only in Switzerland, but also in Germany and Scotland, as well as by the Polish, Hungarian, and French Reformed churches. It was translated into French by Theodore Beza.

HELVIDIANS. See ANTIDICA-MARIANITES.

HEMERESIA, the soothing goddess, a surname of ARTEMIS, which see, under which she was worshipped in Arcadia.

HEMERO-BAPTISTS (Gr. Daily Baptists), a Jewish sect mentioned by Epiphanius, which derived its name from practising daily ablutions, which they looked upon as an essential part of religious duty. They are said to have agreed with the Pharisees in doctrine, with the single exception, that like the Sadducees they denied the resurrection. It is not improbable that those who blamed the disciples of our Lord for eating with unwashed hands (Mark vii. 1—8), may have belonged to this sect. The name Hemero-Baptists is also given, in consequence of their frequent washings, to the MENDEANS (which see), or Christians of St. John.

HEMIPHORIUM. See COLLOBIUM.

HEN, spirits among the TIVOIS in China. They are the souls of the intermediate class of men who are neither good nor evil. The Emperor puts his country under their protection, and he deposes them or degrades them if they neglect their duty. They are in general friendly to men, and though invisible they perform many good offices for him.

HENOTICON, a formula of concord drawn up A. D. 482 by the Greek Emperor Zeno, through the influence of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople. This document was designed to put an end to the dissensions which the Monophysite controversy caused both in church and state. In the Henoticon, or Deed of Union, the emperor explicitly recognized the creed of the Nicene and Constantinopolitan councils as the only established and acknowledged creed of the church. This creed, he says, was received by that council of Ephesus which condemned Nestorius, whom, along with Eutyches, the emperor declares to be heretics. He also acknowledges the twelve chapters of Cyril of Alexandria to be orthodox, and declares Mary to be the mother of God, and Jesus Christ to possess two natures, in one of which he was of like substance with the Father, and in the other of the same substance with us. Thus without naming the council of Chalcedon, he fully recognized its doctrines, and called upon all true Christians to unite on this basis. In this way the emperor hoped to maintain the truth, and yet to secure peace between the contending parties. In Egypt the object of Zeno was fully gained, but the bishops of Rome opposed the Henoticon as casting a slight upon the last general council; and Pope Felix II. went so far as to excommunicate Acacius, at whose instigation the deed had been drawn up. The other patriarchs of the Eastern church sympathized with Acacius, who anathematized in his turn the Latin Pope, ordering his name to be erased from the diptychs or sacred registers of the church. Thus the Oriental and Occidental churches continued in open hostility with one another for thirty-four years, until at length the former church gave in her formal adhesion to the canons of the council of Chalcedon.

HENRICIANS, a Christian sect which arose in the twelfth century, deriving their name from their leader Henry, a monk of Cluny, and a deacon, who came from Switzerland. In the retirement of his monastery, he had devoted himself to the study of the New Testament, and drawing his knowledge of Christianity from the pure unsullied fountain of the Word of life, he imbibed an earnest desire to sally forth into the world and proclaim the truth to his fellowmen. Leaving the solitude of the cloister, therefore, he went out a preacher of repentance in the habit of a monk, and barefoot. The first scene of his missionary labours was the city of Lausanne, where, in the spirit of John the Baptist, he called upon the people to repent and turn to the Lord. After preaching here for a time, he proceeded into France, where, gathering around him a goodly number of earnest and devoted associates, he formed them into an apostolical society. These men, usually denominated Henricians, went before their master, bearing in their hands the banner of the cross, and calling upon men to follow the cross of Christ. For a time the preaching of Henry was limited to repentance, but waxing bolder and more zealous as he proceeded in his mission, he began unsparingly to expose the vices of the clergy and the errors of the dominant church. His preaching was so powerful and awakening, that it was said a heart of stone must have melted under it.

The effect of the discourses of this remarkable man is thus noticed by Neander: "On Ash-Wednesday of the year 1116, two of Henry's spiritual society arrived with the banner of the cross at the city of Mans; they came to inquire whether their master might visit the city as a preacher of repentance during the season of Lent. The people who had already heard so much of him, were now anxiously expecting the time when he would make his personal appearance. The bishop of the city at that time, Hildebert, a pupil of Berengar of Tours, one of the more discreet and pious bishops, received the two messengers in a very friendly manner, and as Henry was not known as yet to be guilty of any heresy, as only his mighty influence on the people was everywhere extolled, the bishop rejoiced at the opportunity of securing a preacher like him for his people during the Lent. And being then about to start on a journey to Rome, he gave directions to his archdeacon that he should allow Henry to preach without molestation. The latter soon won the same great influence here as he had done everywhere else. Among the clergy themselves there was a division. The higher clergy were prejudiced against him on account of his method of proceeding; the younger clergy of the lower class, who were less tied to the church system, and had nothing to fear from Henry's invectives, could not resist the impression of his discourses, and the seed of the doctrines which he scattered among them, continued to spring up for a long time after him. They became his adherents, and prepared a stage for him, on which he could be heard by the entire people. One effect of his preaching soon began to manifest itself. He chained the people to himself, and filled them with contempt and hatred towards the higher clergy. They would have nothing to do with them. The divine service celebrated by them was no longer attended. They found themselves exposed to the insults and gibes of the populace, and had to apply for protection to the civil arm."

The oppositions which Henry encountered from the clergy only attracted the people the more towards him. Multitudes both of the poorer and the wealthier classes took him as their spiritual guide in all things. No wonder that when Hildebert returned from his journey to Rome, he found the affections of the people of his diocese entirely alienated from him, and his episcopal blessing, which had formerly been so eagerly courted, now treated with contempt. Henry had obtained an overwhelming influence over them. The bishop, with a meekness and prudence well fitted to win respect, instead of inveighing with bitterness against this powerful rival in his people's affections, contented himself with simply directing Henry to leave his diocese and betake himself to some other field. The zealous monk made no resistance, but forthwith directing his steps southward, made his appearance in Provence, where Peter of Bruis, a monk of similar spirit, had already laboured before him. Here he developed still more clearly his opposition to the errors of the Church of Rome, and drew down upon himself the bitter hostility of the clergy. At length the archbishop of Arles succeeded in apprehending him. Having secured the person of Henry, the Romish dignitary had him conveyed before the council of Pisa, which was held in 1134, under the presidency of Pope Innocent II. This council pronounced him a heretic, and condemned him to confinement in a cell.

In a short time the reforming monk was set at liberty, when returning to the former scene of his labours in the South of France, he resumed his mission as a determined opponent of the reigning evils of the dominant ecclesiastical system. All classes flocked to hear him, and such was the effect of his preaching, after labouring for ten years in the districts of Toulouse and Alby, that Bernard of Clairvaux, in a letter to a nobleman urging him to put down the heretics, plainly confesses, "The churches are without flocks, the flocks without priests, the priests are nowhere treated with due reverence, the churches are levelled down to synagogues, the sacraments are not esteemed holy, the festivals are no longer celebrated." So rapidly did the sect of the Henricians make way among the population generally, that Bernard was obliged to confess, "Women forsake their husbands, and husbands their wives, and run over to this sect. Clergymen and priests desert their communities and churches; and they have been found sitting with long beards among weavers."

The alarming progress of this reforming sect did not escape the anxious notice of the See of Rome. Pope Eugene III. happening to be at this time resident in France, thought it necessary to take active measures for the suppression of the Henricians. With this view he dispatched to the districts where they chiefly abounded, a legate accompanied by the abbot Bernard, whose ability and high character might produce it was supposed, a favourable impression upon the minds of the people. But even the holy abbot of Clairvaux utterly failed in the object of his mission; the followers of Henry successfully repelled his arguments by apposite quotations from the Sacred Scriptures. Foiled in all their attempts to reconcile these sectaries to the dominant church, the clergy had no alternative left them but to have recourse to violent measures. Henry, accordingly, was once more seized and brought before the council of Rheims, which was held in that city in 1148. The archbishop of Rheims, who was his principal accuser, being averse to proceed to extremities, dissuaded the council from inflicting capital punishment, and by his advice Henry was simply condemned to imprisonment during life, with a meagre diet, that if possible he might be brought to repentance. Soon after his committal to prison he died, and the sect which bore his name disappeared, only, however, to give place to other sects holding the same principles, and animated by a similar spirit, who, in an almost unbroken series, continued till the period of the Reformation to lift their solemn protest against the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome. See APOSTOLICALS, PETROBRUSIANS.

HEPHESTEA. See LAMPADEPHORIA.

HEPHESTUS, the god of fire in the ancient Greek mythology. He was said to be the son of Zeus and Hera, and in the Roman mythology is known by the name of Vulcan. Born in Olympus, he was dropped from thence by his mother, or as is sometimes alleged, cast down by his father. An entire day was spent in passing from heaven to earth, and in the evening Hephestus landed on the island of Lemnos in the Ægean Sea. As the deity who presided over fire, he had a palace in Olympus, which was fitted up with a smith's forge, where he constructed thunderbolts for gods, and weapons and armour for mortal men. Later Greek and Roman writers represent his workshop as not in Olympus, but in the interior of some volcanic island, for example, in Sicily, where he was supposed to have his forge under Mount Ætna, where, assisted by the Cyclopes which see, he prosecuted his arduous labours. Hephestus is represented as having taught men the arts of life, and at a very ancient period he appears to have been a household god among the Greeks, small statues to his honour being placed near the hearth. His worship was sometimes combined, as at Athens, with that of Athena, and festivals were held in honour of both on one and the same day.

HERA, one of the principal goddesses of the ancient heathen mythology. Sometimes she is described as the sister, and at other times as the wife of Zeus. She was worshipped principally at Argos and Samos. On the occasion of her marriage with the king of Olympus, all the gods are represented as having attended, bringing with them presents in honour of the bride, and among the rest Ge presented the gift of a tree with golden apples, which was guarded by the Hesperides in a garden at the foot of Mount Athos. By her marriage with Zeus, she was raised, according to the later writers, to the exalted honour of being the queen of Heaven, but the union is said not to have been of the happiest description, so that she found it necessary to borrow the girdle of Aphrodite to win the love of her husband. She was the mother by Zeus of Arca, Hebe, and Hephaestus. Hera was the goddess of marriage and of childbirth. Her worship seems to have prevailed throughout Greece from a very ancient period, and she is generally believed to have been the goddess of nature. Among the Romans she was worshipped under the name of Juno.

HERACLEIA, a festival anciently celebrated at Athens every five years, in honour of the Grecian deity HERACLES (which see).

HERACLEONITES, a Christian sect which arose in the second century, professing in a modified form the doctrines of the Valentinian school of Gnostics. Clement and Origen make a number of quotations from the writings of Heracleon, from which it would appear that instead of interpreting the Gospel of John, on which he wrote a commentary, in the plain literal signification, he sought to find a profound meaning, warped, however, by his decided partiality for theosophic speculation. A specimen of the style of this Gnostic writer's expositions of Scripture is selected by Neander from Heracleon's interpretation of John iv. 5—26, containing our Saviour's conversation with the woman of Samaria: "With the simple facts of the history, Heracleon could not rest content; nor was he satisfied with a calm psychological contemplation of the Samaritan woman in her relation to the Saviour. His imagination immediately traced in the woman who was so attracted by the words and appearance of Christ, the type of all spiritual natures, that are attracted by the godlike; and hence this history must represent the entire relation of the pneumatici to the Soter, and to the higher, spiritual world. Hence the words of the Samaritan woman must have a double sense,—that of which she was herself conscious, and that which she expressed unconsciously, as representing the whole class of the pneumatici; and hence also the words of the Saviour must be taken in a two-fold sense, a higher and a lower. True, he did not fail to understand the fundamental idea contained in the Saviour's language; but he allowed himself to be drawn away from the principal point, by looking after too much in the several accompanying circumstances. 'The water which our Saviour gives,' says he, 'is from his Spirit and his power. His grace and his gifts are something that never can be taken away, never can be exhausted, never can pass from those who have any portion in them. They that have received what is richly bestowed on them from above, communicate of the overflowing fulness which they enjoy, to the everlasting life of others also.' But then he wrongly concludes, that because Christ intended the water which he would give to be understood in a symbolical sense, so too the water of Jacob's well must be understood in the same symbolical sense. It was a symbol of Judaism, inadequate to the wants of the spiritual nature—an image of its perishable, earthly glory. The words of the woman,—‘Give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw,’—express the burthensome character of Judaism, the difficulty of finding in it anything wherewith to nourish the spiritual life, and the inadequacy of that nourishment when found. When our Lord afterwards bade the woman call her husband, he meant by this her other half in the spiritual world, the angel belonging to her;—that with him coming to the Saviour, she might from the latter receive power to become united and blended with this her destined companion. And the reason for this arbitrary interpretation is, that ‘Christ could not have spoken of her earthly husband, since he was aware, that she had no lawful one. In the spiritual sense, the woman knew not her husband—she knew nothing of the angel belonging to her; in the literal sense, she was ashamed to confess that she was living in an unlawful connection.’ The water being the symbol of the divine life communicated by the Saviour, Heracleon went on to infer that the water-pot was the symbol of a recipient spirit for this divine life on the part of the woman. She left her water-pot behind with him; that is, having now a vessel of this kind with the Saviour, in which to receive the living water she came for, she returned into the world to announce that Christ was come to the psychical natures.”

HERACLES, the most illustrious of all the herogods of heathen antiquity. His worship has prevailed very extensively among all nations both of the East and the West. Homer makes him the son of Zeus by Alcmene, the wife of Amphitryon, king of Thebes. He is said to have been born B.C. 1280. He became remarkable for his bodily strength, and is chiefly noted for the twelve labours which he successfully achieved. These were 1. The contest with the Nemean lion and its slaughter with his own hands. 2. The destruction of the Lernean hydra with its nine heads. 3. The wounding and carrying off of the stag of Ceryneia in Arcadia. 4. The taking of the Erymanthian boar. 5. The cleaning of the stables of Augeas in one day. 6. The putting to flight of the Stymphalian birds. 7. The catching of the Cretan bull. 8. The fetching to Mycenæ of the mares of Diomedes. 9. The carrying off of the girdle of Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons. 10. The fetching of the oxen of the monster Geryones. 11. The plucking and carrying away of the golden apples of the Hesperides. 12. The fetching of Cer-berns from the infernal regions. Besides these Heracles is said to have performed many other feats of strength and courage, and among the rest he fought against the giants and defeated them. After his death he was worshipped throughout Greece as a god, and numerous temples erected to his honour, while festivals were established in commemoration of him, called HERACLEIA (which see). Among the ancient Romans this deity was worshipped under the name of Hercules, his worship having been introduced into Italy by Greek colonies, and thence conveyed into Gaul, Spain, and Germany.

Among the ancient Egyptians, Sir Gardner Wilkinson mentions Hercules as one of the twelve secondary deities, under the name of Goni, or rather Som. He is a beneficent deity, connected closely with the good god Osiris. “Like Osiris,” says Mr. Gross, “he is an emanation of the supreme and immortal divinity, and Anun, the primeval source of light, is his illustrious sire. To him his eyes are steadily directed from the zodiacal mansion of Aries; and, submissive to his parental behest, he diligently pursued the sidereal path pointed out to him as the sphere of his actions, and the bright domain of his power. Hercules is emphatically the propitious power, manifested in the blessings which the prolific waters of the Nile disseminate over Egypt. When it is asserted of him that he gagged or strangled Antæus, the son of Poseidon and the earth, the meaning is, that he overcame, or at least effectually resisted, the destructive sand-showers of this ill-willed giant of the desert, by the opposing flood of the Nile, and the introduction of canals into the Delta, especially towards the Libyan desert, and making them of such a width that the stifling winds of that arid and arenaceous region could no longer drive the sands across the ample channels. Steadily persevering in the execution of a laudable enterprise, he opposed an additional barrier to the devastating encroachments of the obnoxious and justly dreaded sands, by opening numerous ducts for the purpose of irrigation; and by thus wisely intersecting Lower Egypt with a seasonable and healthful aqueous circulation, he happily succeeded in still more effectually vanquishing Antæus, the surly, mischievous monarch of sand-plains and sand-storms. Hercules alone, the puissant god, and invincible wrestler, could accomplish labours at once so extensive, so arduous, and so useful: no wonder that mythic fame accorded to him the honour of sustaining the weight of heaven upon his Atlas shoulders! His name and daring still survive in the record of the Heracleon canal. Numerous cities bore his name and commemorated his deeds; and they were all situated at the mouth of the Nile, or on the banks of the canals: thus proclaiming to future ages that next to the Nile, Hercules was the most munificent dispenser of water to the often thirsty, ay, parched land of Egypt; the most renowned hero-god; and the illustrious prototype of the Jewish patriarch's viceregal son, whose name and merits rank among those of the earliest and most successful patrons of internal improvement. In reference to Egypt, he is therefore properly named Canbus, or the god of the waters, and the Canebian and the Heraclidean mouths of the Nile, are synonymous phrases."

Hercules seems to have been worshipped from a very early period in Phœnicia, and children are said to have been sacrificed to him in the Phœnician colonies of Carthage and Gades, down even to the time of Constantine. Artists usually represent this deity under the figure of a strong muscular man, clothed in the skin of a lion, and carrying or sometimes leaning on an enormous club.

HERACLITEANS, the followers of Heraclitus, a Greek philosopher, and a native of Ephesus, who flourished about the end of the fifth century before Christ. The fundamental principle of his physical philosophy was, that fire was the origin of all material phenomena; but in addition to the physical world he acknowledged a spiritual and intellectual world. Sextus Empiricus has preserved fragments of the writings of Heraclitus, which show that he founded his intellectual philosophy on the basis of a common or universal reason, thus reminding us of the eclectic system of Cousin in the present day: "Universal and divine reason, according to him, is the criterion of truth. That which is universally believed is certain; for it is borrowed from that common reason which is universal and divine; and, on the contrary, every individual opinion is destitute of certainty. . . . Such being the character of reason, man remains in ignorance so long as he is deprived of the commerce of language; it is by means of this alone that he begins to know. Common reason, therefore, rightly claims deference. Now this common reason being nothing but the picture of the order of the universe, whenever we derive anything from it, we possess the truth; and when we interrogate only our own individual understanding, we fall into error."

Heraclitus in his philosophy distinctly recognized a God, and seems to have endeavoured to found a school which should avoid the excesses of idealist pantheism on the one hand, and materialist atheism on the other.

HERÆA, festivals celebrated in honour of HERA, which see, in various towns of Greece. Argos appears to have been the original seat of the worship of this goddess, where there were three temples erected to her honour, and her festivals were celebrated every fifth year. The ceremonies of the Heræa were commenced with a procession of young men clothed in armour, who marched to the temple of Hera, preceded by one hundred oxen, and hence the festival received the name of Heortambra. The high priestess accompanied the procession riding in a chariot drawn by two white oxen. On reaching the temple the festal ox was sacrificed, and the flesh of the oxen distributed among the people. As celebrated at Samos, the Heræa differed somewhat from the same festival at other places in Greece, the procession consisting not only of young men in armour, but of maidens and married women in splendid dresses. At Elis again the festival was celebrated chiefly by maidens, and conducted by sixteen matrons, who wore the peplos or sacred robe for the goddess. One of the principal parts of the festival consisted in a race of the maidens in the stadium, the prize being a garland of olive-branches, and part of a cow, which was sacrificed to Hera.

HERANASKHIA, Singhalese, herana, a novice, and sikka, a rule or precept, a formulary required to be committed to memory by the Buddhist priest, while still in his novitiate. It is written in Ehi, a dialect of the ancient Singhalese, and contains a number of rules or obligations under which the young priest professes to con-.

HERBS BITTER. At the original institution of the pasover, the Jews were commanded to eat the paschal lamb with bitter herbs. The Mishna and Maimonides mention five sorts of bitter herbs, any one or all of which might be eaten. According to some Jewish writers, chicory, wild lettuce, and horse-hound were among the herbs which were intended to be used at the Passover, and Forskal tells us, that the Jews in Egypt eat the lettuce along with the paschal lamb. The modern Jews generally use as bitter herbs some lettuce, chervil, parsley, celery and wild snecory or horseradish. See PASSOVER.

HERCULES. See HERACLES.

HERCYNA, a surname of Demeter, under which she was worshipped at Lebadeia in Boeotia.

HERCYNA, a goddess of the internal regions, worshipped at Lebadeia in Boeotia. She was a daughter of Trophonius, and a temple was erected to her containing the statue of a maiden carrying a goose in her hand. In this temple, which was reared on the banks of a river bearing her name, Hereyna was worshipped along with Zeus.

HERESIARCH (Gr. ruler or head of a heresy), the principal leader of a heretical sect, or the author of a HERESY (which see.) The ancient Christian Church always set a mark of infamy upon heresiarchs, making a distinction between them and those that followed them; allowing the latter sometimes to continue in the clerical function on giving evidence of repentance, but usually degrading the former without hope of restitution. This distinction was observed in the case of the Donatists, Donatus, who was proved to be the author of the schism, being alone condemned.

HERESY (Gr. hæresis, choice), a term which seems to have been originally applied to the selection of one opinion, or set of opinions, in preference to another. Hence, by a very easy and natural transition it came to denote a particular school or sect which maintained any particular class of opinions. In this sense the word heresy was used by the later Greek as well as by the Roman writers in speaking of different schools of philosophy. It was also employed by the Hellenistic Jews to express the leading sects which existed among their countrymen, and hence we find Josephus speaking of the three heresies of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. In early times Christianity was called by the Jews the heresy of the Nazarenes; and by the apostles, as well as the early Fathers, a man who was not a true orthodox Christian was designated a heretic. In process of time, when the errors of men came to be added to, or even substituted for, the truths of the Word of God, the term heresy came to be restricted in its signification to any partial or erroneous view of Divine truth held by a man who professed to believe in Christianity.

Almost innumerable heresies have arisen in the course of the history of the Christian Church, and so varied are the modifications of error which have sprung up in the very bosom of the church itself, that the origin and progress of heresy have become an important and almost indispensable department of ecclesiastical history. The advantages which accrue from this part of the theological study are thus briefly noticed by Dr. Welsh: "It is of the greatest consequence, for example, in the controversy with unbelievers. The little success that Christianity has met with in the world, the divisions and heresies which have torn and afflicted the Church, and the frequent abuses and flagrant enormities which have often rendered the history of Christianity a melancholy record of the follies and vices of man, have been urged by infidels as arguments against the idea that our religion could be divine. We are able in so far to obviate this difficulty on general grounds, and to argue, that as it forms no valid objection to the doctrines of natural religion, that they have been rejected by multitudes of the human race altogether, and that they have exerted little influence upon many who have professed to receive them; so the doctrines of revelation may be true, notwithstanding the limited extent to which their influence has reached. But we may proceed farther, and draw an argument in support of the truth of Christianity from the very corruptions which have impeded its progress and marred its beauty. Though our Saviour confidently predicted the ultimate triumph of his cause, he was far from declaring that its success would be immediate and universal. And the minute accuracy with which Christ and his apostles described, not only the opposition which the Christian cause was to experience from its enemies, but also the greater evils to which it would be subjected from those who should pretend to embrace it, may be considered as a convincing evidence of the divinity of our religion. But the objections may take another form in the hands of the infidel and Roman Catholic, as implying an essential defect in the record, and the necessity of an addition to the written word in the decisions of an infallible church. To meet these views, an acquaintance with the different sects that have appeared in the world is necessary; as by such acquaintance alone we are enabled to show, that wherever, in any essential question, men have erred from the truth, the cause is never to be found in any obscurity in the Scriptures, while differences upon points of minor moment are not repressed even by an infallible church. An acquaintance with the heresies is of great importance, from the remarkable fact in regard to many of the doctrines of our Confessions and Creeds, that while the germ of them is to be found in the works of the most ancient Christian writers, and though substantially they were always embraced by the Church, yet the full and distinct statement of them has generally been first occasioned by the existence of errors of an opposite description. Not that any thing essentially new has been discovered, but that the attention of the Church has been directed to those portions of holy writ that relate to such questions, by which means the nature and bearing of Christian doctrine have been more fully and more accurately evolved. Thus the spurious gospels forged by the Gnostics, and the false glosses made by them of the true gospels, first prepared the way for a right exegesis. Thus also the doctrine of the Trinity, though received by the Church from the earliest times, was never set forth in all its fulness till the Patripassian, Sabellian, Arian, and Macedonian heresies, brought the various passages of Scripture under the notice of minds solemnised by the subject, and sharpened in the controversy which was carried on. In like manner, the Apollinarian, Nestorian, and Eutychian errors led to a more definite explanation of the doctrines of the incarnation. And the same illustrations might be given respecting the doctrines of original sin, justification by faith, and others."

The different heresies which from time to time have sprung up in the Christian Church are minutely considered in the present work under their respective names, but it may not be without advantage to the reader if we give a rapid view in this article of the history of heresy in the different phases which it assumed during the successive centuries which elapsed from the Christian era down to the Reformation in the sixteenth century. The heresies which have arisen from that period onward to the present have been simply revivals of old errors, either in their original grossness, or in a somewhat modified form.

In its earliest development Christianity appeared in the closest connection with Judaism, the one, in fact, being the complement of the other. Both our Lord and his apostles habitually recognized this truth in all their teachings, making their appeal in explanation as well as vindication of the Christian system to the Jewish or Old Testament Scriptures. The consequence was, that first converts to the belief of Christianity were drawn from two very different classes of men, Jews and Gentiles, whose respective opinions and prejudices gave rise to no slight conflict and jarring of sentiment among the members of the Christian Church. The Jewish converts, in their intense devotion to the Mosiac institutions, were most unwilling to allow them to be superseded by the more spiritual doctrines and observances of Christianity. Many of them, accordingly, even during the first century, instead of contenting themselves with retaining circumcision, and the practice of some other Jewish ceremonies, were so unreasonable as to insist on the observance of Jewish rites by the Gentile converts also. Had this been acceded to by the church generally, it would have proved an insurmountable barrier with multitudes to the profession of the faith of Christ. So important, indeed, was the removal of this obstacle to the conversion of the Gentiles, that it was made the subject of a special revelation to the Apostle Peter, who was charged by a vision from heaven to make the offer of the gospel to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews. Notwithstanding, however, this plain and explicit intimation of the Divine will on the matter, the Judaizing party continued resolutely to urge upon their fellow-Christians the perpetual obligation of the law of Moses. A controversy arose at Antioch on this keenly disputed point, and so bitterly was it conducted by both parties, that it had well nigh given rise, even at that early period, to a schism in the church. The apostles and elders, however, held a meeting at Jerusalem on the subject, and the result of their deliberations was, that circumcision was declared not to be binding, and nothing farther was demanded from the Gentile converts than the abstaining "from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication," regulations somewhat similar to those which were required from proselytes of the gate. This decision of the brethren at Jerusalem was attended with the best effects, not only upon the Christians at Antioch, among whom laxity now prevailed, but upon the church at large. The Nicolaitans alone appear to have acted in literal opposition to the decree at Jerusalem, eating things offered to idols, and indulging in fornication. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, A. D. 70, and the consequent dispersion of the Jews, proved in a great measure the deathblow of the Judaizing tendency in the church generally, although we find remains of the same spirit in the sect of the Nazarenes, who adhered to the ritual of the law of Moses. Of this sect the Ebionites appear to have been a branch who held that, along with faith in Christ, circumcision and the ceremonial law ought to be retained. They used only the gospel of Matthew, and celebrated both the Jewish and Christian Sabbaths.

The heresies of the first century, however, were not limited to those which had their origin in the Judaizing tendency; there were others of an equally serious character which sprang out of the systems of Gentile philosophy which then prevailed both in the Eastern and Western nations. Hence arose a mixed system of opinions which partook partly of the idealist and mystical, and partly of the sensualist and practical. Simon Magos and his disciple Menander appear to have drawn their heretical opinions from these Gentile sources. Thus they taught that Jesus did not really suffer, nor even possess a true body upon earth, but was merely a shadowy representation and a figure. The Cerinthians, on the other hand, maintained that Jesus had a true human nature at his birth, but nothing divine; that he was simply the son of Joseph and Mary, and that his divinity consisted in the communication of the Spirit at his baptism.

During the second century the church overflowed with heresies no longer of a strictly Jewish, but of a thoroughly Gentile character, being chiefly drawn from the idealistic system of the Grecian Plato, and the mystical theosophy of the Oriental philosophers. We refer, of course, to the different schools of the Gnostics, which see, all of which agreed in maintaining the necessary antagonism of mind and matter, so that the Demiurgus, who formed the material world, was viewed as essentially inferior to the great God who created the spiritual world. Hence man is dualistic in character, because dualistic in constitution. He possesses a material body which is corrupt and doomed to perish, while he has a soul or more ethereal framework, which must either perish or be saved. The body being thus in their view from its very nature corrupt, many of them doubted whether the body of Christ was a true body, or whether it was not rather a phantom which deceived the eyes of men. Others attempted to compromise the matter, by alleging that it was truly visible, not however from its own nature, but simply by the will of God. They taught that the soul of man, when freed from the body at death, is carried to the highest planetary region, and there detained along with the soul of Christ, but that the mind, separated from the soul, traverses the whole planetary spheres, and is at length conveyed to heaven far above all the planets, thence passing to the Pleroma, where the soul of Christ dwells in unalloyed bliss. The Cerdonians so far differed from the Gnostics generally as to introduce the doctrine of a dualistic principle of all things, which was afterwards revived in several different forms. The belief in the existence of a good and an evil principle was coupled with the idea, that this world was created by the evil principle, and thus it was attempted to account for the introduction of moral evil. Marcion attached himself to Cerdo, but differed from him in various particulars. Thus he rejected the Old Testament as the work of an evil, or at least of an imperfectly good spirit. He believed the body of Christ not to have been real, but imaginary.

There were several heresies which arose in the second century in regard to the person of Christ; some going so far as openly to deny his divinity, among whom was Theodotus of Byzantium, the first probably who dared to avow Christ to be nothing more than a man. The Artemites revived this heresy. To this century belong the Montanists, a fanatical and enthusiastic sect, who from the extravagant nature of the tenets which they maintained, gained considerable favour at this early period of the history of the church, when the minds of Christians were earnest and susceptible. It was firmly maintained by the Montanists that a true prophetic gift still existed in the church as in the days of the apostles, that extraordinary motions of the Spirit were still experienced by Christians, and that internal revelations were imparted which conveyed additional information to that which is contained in the written Word. Montanus arrogated to himself, and to all his followers, including women and children, the privilege of those supernatural motions and revelations of the Spirit.

A remarkable dissension broke out in the course of this century between the Eastern and Western churches in regard to the time when the Easter festival ought to be celebrated by the Christian church. The Eastern or Asiatic churches maintained that the proper period for its celebration was the day when the Jews observe the passover. The Western churches, on the other hand, asserted with equal firmness that the Lord's Day, immediately following the Jewish passover, was the proper time for observing Easter. Both churches, after much contention, adhered tenaciously to their own opinions. See EASTER.

The third century was marked by the appearance of a heresy which was of a strictly Oriental type, and was in many respects allied to the opinions of the Gnostics. Manes, the founder of this system, which from him received the name of the Manichean heresy, taught, that there were two original principles diametrically opposed to each other, the purest light, which he called God, and a dark matter which was the source of all evil, and which he believed to be endowed with a soul and life. In regard to the Divine Being, the Manicheans held that from God proceeded two spirits of the same substance and Divine nature with himself; but not equal to him. These were the Son and the Holy Spirit; the former inhabiting the sun and moon; the latter, the air. From the same Supreme God emanated the Æons, pure spirits infinite in number, but forming a kingdom over which God presided. From the mixture of light and darkness originated the world, and also man. Manes assumed to be an apostle, alleged that he had seen visions, and been translated to heaven, where he learned his peculiar tenets. He rejected the Old Testament, but admitted the New, with many interpolations and corruptions, adding his own gospel, and other apocryphal books.

Not long after this century had commenced, Noetus of Smyrna gave forth the heretical sentiment in reference to the nature of the Godhead, that it consists of only one person. The same heresy was revived after the middle of the century by Sabellius, from whom it received the name of the Sabellian heresy. A similar set of opinions was afterwards taught by Paul of Samosata, who more directly opposed the deity of Jesus Christ, and in consequence of his heretical views he was condemned in two councils held successively at Antioch. A dissension occurred in this century, also, on the subject of ecclesiastical discipline. Novatus at Carthage, in opposition to Cyprian, the bishop of that city, seemed to deny the right of the church to exclude even delinquents from her communion. Novatian at Rome, on the contrary, held that none should be admitted into the communion of the church who had fallen into gross sin. Novatus, having been condemned at Carthage, fled to Rome, and adopted the opinions of Novatian, with whom he formed a separate sect, which maintained that the Church of Christ ought to be pure and free from all stain, and, therefore, that any individual who had once openly transgressed could no longer be a member of the church. The Novatian heresy lasted for several centuries. From this dissension on church discipline arose another controversy concerning the baptism of heretics, which continued till the first Nicene council in the following century.

The Arian heresy disturbed the peace of the church throughout the greater part of the fourth century. It originated in the teaching of Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, who denied the eternal deity of the Son of God, and maintained that he was created by the Father before the foundation of the world. Arius was excommunicated by Alexander his bishop, but the heresy still continuing to spread, the Emperor Constantine, who had embraced the Christian faith, summoned the first council of Nice A. D. 325, at which the eternal deity of the Son and his consubstantiality with the Father were distinctly recognized. By this council, at which the emperor himself presided, the heresy of Arius was condemned, and he himself sent into banishment. In a short time, however, matters underwent a complete change. Arius, aided by his friends, secured the favour of the emperor, and he was in consequence recalled. The favour shown to Arius and his party did not terminate with the life of Constantine; it continued also during the reign of Constantius, his son and successor. Valens also strongly inclined to Arian views, and it was not till the death of that prince, and the succession of Theodosius the Great, that the church was delivered from the Arian heresy, and restored to its former harmony and peace.

The Arian party split up into different and even conflicting sects. The pure Arians held that the Son was of a totally different essence from the Father, and the Semi-Arians urged that he was of a similar essence; while the orthodox or Athanasian party maintained that he was of the same essence with the Father. In the course of this century Photinus revived the Sabellian heresy, which alleged that there was only one person in the Godhead and that Jesus Christ was a mere man, in whom God dwelt as he did in the prophets. This heretic was condemned and removed from his bishopric A. D. 351. Apollinarius, a bishop of Laodicea, taught about this time that in Jesus there was a divine nature and a human body, but he denied his human mind or soul. He maintained, also, that from the Divine Spirit and the human body of Christ, there was formed a divine nature, and hence he is often termed the father of the Monophysites.

Nor were the heresies of this century limited to the person of Christ, they extended also to the person of the Spirit. Thus Macedonius, a Constantinopolitan bishop, denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, alleging that he was a created being, and subordinate to the Son. This heresy was condemned in the second general council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, and at this time there was added to the Nicene creed, a clause containing the doctrine of the true and eternal deity of the Holy Spirit. Thus the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed was so framed as to convey the orthodox doctrine both on the person of the Son and on the person of the Spirit. In the course of this century a schism took place in an important section of the church, that of North Africa, founded on the question as to the true constitution of the Christian church; the point of dispute being whether a church, by the admission of unworthy persons into her communion, forfeited the title of a Church of Christ. The party which held the affirmative side of this question was headed by Donatus, from whom his followers received the name of Donatists.

In the commencement of the fifth century the Pelagian heresy arose, which denied original sin as extending from Adam to his natural posterity; and, consequently, denied also the necessity of Divine grace to renew and purify the heart. This heresy, which was promulgated by Pelagius and his friend Celestius, was speedily condemned, and those who held it proscribed. Augustin, bishop of Hippo, was the principal opponent of Pelagianism. There were some, however, who, without going so far as Pelagius, did not entirely agree with the opinions of Augustin. These, who received the name of Semi-Pelagians, while they admitted that man was in part corrupted by original sin, still held that by God's grace it might be corrected and overcome. Acts of faith and obedience they attributed partly to the will of man, and partly to the grace of God. In a very short time this modified form of Pelagianism was also reprobated by the church.

During this century Nestorius broached in the East his heretical opinions. He taught that a distinction ought to be drawn between Christ and God dwelling in Christ as in a temple; that from the moment of the conception in the womb of the Virgin, there commenced an intimate union between Christ and God, and that these two persons presented in Jesus Christ one aspect, but that the union between them was one of will and affection. Nestorius was keenly opposed by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, and a council being called A. D. 431, Nestorius was deposed, in the first instance, but on the arrival of the Eastern bishops, Cyril himself was deprived of his episcopal office. In opposing the Nestorian heresy, Eutyches fell into a contrary error, that of maintaining that Christ was possessed of only one nature, his human nature being absorbed in the Divine. Hence the Eutychian was likewise called the Monophysite heresy. After the fourth general council at Chalcedon, the Eutychians continued to increase in numbers; and, therefore, the Emperor Zeno, A. D. 482, proposed the Henoticon or Unitive Edict. This attempt, however, to unite the conflicting parties in the church, however well meant on the part of Zeno, was without effect, and, accordingly, the Henoticon was repealed by his successor Justin.

The Donatist schism, which had rent asunder the church in North Africa during the fourth century, still continued during the fifth, with this difference however, that the Donatists themselves split up into different sects. The religious dissensions, and even civil commotions, which this unhappy schism had so long caused, attracted the attention of the Emperor Honorius, who summoned a meeting of the contending parties, and the Donatists being foiled in argument, were commanded to join the church.

In the sixth century the Monophysite heresy gradually declined, chiefly through the exertions of the Emperor Justinian, who greatly favoured the council of Chalcedon, and put in force its decrees. From the name of one of their leaders the Monophysites were also called Jacobites. At length they divided into different sects bearing different names. The heresies which Origen had taught in the third century and which had led to his deposition and banishment, caused no small dissension in the church, even at this remote period. For nearly 150 years after the death of this eminent man, who, to a fanciful and allegorical style of interpreting Scripture, added an ardent love of combining philosophy with religion, the members of the Christian church were much divided in opinion concerning the true character of his views. Many eagerly called for the public condemnation of his works; and, accordingly, A. D. 400, a sentence, condemnatory of the writings of Origen, was pronounced by the synod of Alexandria. After a truce, which lasted nearly 140 years, the war against the memory of Origen again broke out, for A. D. 511, his dogmas were once more solemnly condemned. In the fifth general council, the condemnation of the works of Origen was again repeated.

During the seventh century the Manichean, Nestorian, and Jacobite heresies still continued to agitate the church, and in addition to these the Monothelite heresy sprang up, which asserted that, in the constitution of Christ's person, there was only a natural will. To silence the adversaries of this sect, the Emperor Heraclius promulgated, A. D. 639, an Exposition of Faith, setting forth the double nature of Christ, but his single will. In 680, however, the sixth general council met at Constantinople, and condemned this heresy.

The commencement of this century was marked by two events of a most remarkable kind, which had an intimate and vital bearing on the history of the Christian church—the appearance of Mohammed, the Arabian prophet, who promulgated that peculiar system of religion which, down to the present day, has maintained so powerful a sway over so large a portion of the human race—and the assumption of the title of Universal Bishop by the bishop of Rome, thus arrogating authority over the whole visible Church of Christ upon the earth.

For several succeeding centuries some of the principal heresies, to which we have already adverted, disturbed the peace of the church, especially in the East, amidst the civil commotions by which the Greek empire was so long distracted. No new heresy for a time was promulgated, except perhaps the Paulician, which, without almost a single novel tenet, embodied the worst points of the Gnostic and Manichean heresies. The Paulicians prevailed very extensively in the East during the ninth and tenth centuries. In the eleventh century, Roscellinus, a presbyter in Gaul, invented a new form of error, alleging that the Three Persons in the Godhead were as distinct as three spirits and three angels, but that they, nevertheless, possessed only one will and power. This tenet, however, was no sooner condemned by the Sussian council, than in A. D. 1092 Roscellinus publicly revoked it.

For several centuries darkness had been gradually spreading over the church, and in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the purity of the Christian faith had almost entirely disappeared amid the unintelligible follies and puerilities of the schoolmen. Men of high intellect and profound learning, an Aquinas, a Scotus, an Anselm, and others, shone out, no doubt, as lights amid the darkness; but even these men of might were feeble, and almost without the slightest perceptible influence, amid the ignorance and gross corruption which prevailed around them. This was emphatically the dark age of the Christian church, when religion was nothing but a name, and the church a nonentity. From time to time signs of life began to appear. Sects arose, the Bogomiles, the Cathari, the Henricians, and others, which, amid the errors and excesses into which they ran, protested loudly against the vices of the clergy, and the corruptions of the dominant church. The zeal of these well-meaning men was met only by persecution, and the truth which they preached was pronounced a heresy. At length, in the fourteenth century, the Lollards in England, and in the fifteenth the Hussites in Bohemia, raised the standard of open revolt from the haughty oppression of the Romish church and clergy, and made their appeal from the canons of the church to the declarations of the Word of God—an appeal which met with no other reply than the fire and the faggot.

The sixteenth century came, and with it the Reformation, when Luther boldly affixed to the church of the castle of Wittenberg his ninety-five Theses against the sordid heresy of Rome on the sale of indulgences. The audacious monk was denounced from the Vatican as a heretic after many fruitless attempts to make him recant. Setting at nought, however, all the Papal fulminations which year after year were launched against him, Luther went forward with his great mission, joined by Melanethon, Zwingli, Calvin, and others, and thus were founded those churches which everywhere throughout the world to this day bear the name of Protestant, thus holding up their sustained and solemn protest against the Church of Rome as a heretical church, while she in turn retorts the charge, declaring the churches of the Reformation to be both heretical in doctrine, and guilty of the heinous sin of schism, rending asunder the Church of God.

HERETICS, those who hold such opinions as are considered to amount to heresy. In the ancient history of Christianity every man was accounted a heretic who rejected any point belonging to that form of doctrine which was acknowledged and set forth by the church. Hence his sin was regarded as greater or less according to the importance of the doctrine denied, and the circumstances attendant on the denial. But against heretics generally, laws were passed by the church subjecting them to peculiar ecclesiastical censures. And from the time of Constantine, when Christianity was first adopted as the established religion of the Roman Empire, to Theodosius the younger and Valentinian III., various penal laws were enacted by the Christian emperors against the heretics as being guilty of crime against the welfare of the state. Thus in both the Theodosian and Justinian codes, they were styled infamous persons: all intercourse was forbidden to be held with them; they were deprived of all offices of profit and dignity in the civil administration, while all burdensome offices, both of the camp and curia, were imposed upon them; they were disqualified from disposing of their own estates by will, or accepting estates bequeathed to them by others; they were denied the right of giving or receiving donations, of contracting, buying, and selling; pecuniary fines were imposed upon them: they were often proscribed and banished, and in many cases scourged, before being sent into exile. In some particularly aggravated cases, sentence of death was pronounced upon heretics, though seldom executed in the time of the Christian Emperors of Rome. Theodosius is said to have been the first who pronounced heresy a capital crime. This sanguinary law was passed A. D. 382 against the Eneerites, the Saccophori, the Hydroparastate, and the Manicheans.

In the course of the period during which the laws were passed, to which we have now referred, there were also many prohibitory enactments formed expressly against heretical teachers. Thus they were forbidden to propagate their doctrines publicly or privately; to hold public disputations; to ordain bishops, presbyters, or any other clergy; to hold religious meetings and assemblies; to build conventicles or avail themselves of money bequeathed to them for that purpose. Slaves were allowed to inform against their heretical masters, and to purchase their freedom by coming over to the church. The children of heretical parents were denied their patrimony and inheritance, unless they returned to the Catholic church. Finally, the books of heretics were ordered to be burned.

Such were the civil enactments against heretics which disgraced the otherwise valuable Theodosian and Justinian codes.

In the eye of the church heresy was accounted one of the most heinous crimes that a Christian could possibly commit, being nothing less than a voluntary apostasy from the faith. His sin was visited therefore with a sentence of formal excommunication, and as long as he continued impenitent, he was debarred from the very lowest of the privileges of the church. The council of Laodicea, by a decree, prohibited heretics from entering the house of God. This was by no means, however, a generally recognized law, as the common practice of the church appears to have been to encourage heretics to frequent one part of her service, that which was allowed to penitents and catechumens. All members of the church, however, were strictly prohibited from joining with heretics in any of their religious offices, more especially in their churches, under pain of excommunication. But the laws of the church went still further in these early times, when the principles of an enlightened toleration were scarcely if at all understood. Thus no Christian was allowed to eat at a feast or converse familiarly with heretics. No one was permitted to receive their eulogia or festival presents. No one was allowed to read or retain their writings, but was enjoined to burn them. Marriage, or any near alliance with a heretic, was forbidden, unless on condition that a pledge was given of their return to the Catholic church. As long as they continued in heresy, their names were erased from the diptychs of the church; and if they died in heresy, no psalmody or other solemnity was used at their funeral; no oblations were offered for them, or any mention ever after made of them in the solemn service of the church. It is remarkable to what an extent the ancient church seems to have carried her abhorrence of the heretic. In the exercise of her ecclesiastical discipline, the testimony of a heretic was inadmissible in the church courts. A law was passed forbidding the ordination of such as were either baptized in heresy, or fell away after they had been baptized. They were allowed to be received as penitent laymen, but not to be promoted to any clerical office. This arrangement, however, was not universally observed. The council of Nice dispensed with it in the case of the Novatians, and the African church in the case of the Donatists. Christians were forbidden to bring any cause, just or unjust, before a heretical judge, under pain of excommunication.

The length of time to which the excommunication of a heretic extended was very much dependent on the peculiar circumstances of the case. The council of Eliberis appointed a period of ten years, provided the heretic repented and confessed his sin. In the case, however, of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, who suffered themselves to be rebaptized by heretics, the council of Rome under Felix ordered them to be denied communion even among the catechumens all their natural lives, and to be only allowed lay communion at the hour of death. Heresiarchs or first founders of heresies were always treated more severely than their followers; and those who complied with heretical errors by force or compulsion were punished with much more leniency than those who of their own free will rejected the doctrines of the church. A difference was also made between those heretics who retained the regular form of baptism, and those who set it wholly aside or corrupted it in any essential part. The former were to be received only by imposition of hands, confessing their error; but the latter were to be received only as heathens, having never been truly baptized, and therefore requiring to be baptized anew in order to their admission into the Christian church. And yet amid all this severity on the part of the ancient church, she was slow to pronounce any man a heretic, even though entertaining dangerous error; the name being reserved for those who persisted in the maintenance of heretical opinions after a first and second admonition by the church, thus adding contumacy to their error.

HERETICS (BAPTISM OF). In the second half of the third century, a question arose in reference to the baptism of heretics, which excited considerable agitation in the Christian church. The point in dispute was simply this, Ought a heretic who had been baptized in his own sect, to be re-baptized in case of his returning to the bosom of the orthodox or Catholic church? There having been no rule laid down on the subject, the practice of the church had been different in different countries. In Asia Minor and the adjoining countries, the baptism of heretics had been regarded as null, and therefore those heretics who sought admission to the church were re-baptized. In the Roman Church a precisely opposite practice had prevailed; baptism in the name of Christ or of the Trinity being regarded as valid, by whomsoever, and under whatsoever religious views it may have been administered. Heretics, therefore, who came over to the Church of Rome were regarded as baptized Christians, and only the rite of confirmation was administered by the bishop, that the Holy Spirit might render efficacious the baptism they had received.

Towards the close of the second century, the attention of the Christian communities in Asia Minor began to be called to the subject, and the majority declared in favour of adhering to the old principle. The point was again agitated at a somewhat later period, and the same principle was confirmed by two councils, one held at Iconium, and the other at Synnada in Phrygia. This led to the discussion of the controverted point in other countries. Tertullian wrote a treatise in the Greek language supporting the view of the Asiatic in opposition to that of the Roman church. The North African church was divided on the question, but both parties still continued in brotherly fellowship with one another. Stephanus, however, a Roman bishop, attaching to the controversy more importance than it deserved, issued a sentence of excommunication, A. D. 253, against the bishops of Asia Minor, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Cilicia. Cyprian, the bishop of Carthage, proposed the disputed point for discussion at two councils, held in that city A. D. 255, both of them deciding in favour of the views of Cyprian, that the baptism of heretics was invalid. Stephanus, the Roman bishop, on learning that the decision of the North African council had been in opposition to his own, wrote a haughty indignant letter to Cyprian, and refused to give an audience to the bishops who had been sent as delegates from the council. The bishop of Carthage, however, was not a man to be easily overcome. He assembled at Carthage another and a larger council A. D. 256, which confirmed the views already expressed by the North African church, in opposition to the Roman bishop. Thus the North African and the Asiatic Churches were agreed in their views on the baptism of heretics, and Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, was disposed to favour the same party, making an exception, however, in the case of the baptism of Montanists, which he could not consent to put on a footing with the baptism of other heretics. Stephanus continued to fulminate his anathemas, but without effect, and the opposition gradually died away, both parties retaining their respective opinions.

The true state of the question as between the two parties cannot be better stated than in the words of Neander: "There were two points of dispute. In respect to the first, the Roman party maintained that the validity of baptism depended simply on its being administered as instituted by Christ. The formula of baptism, in particular, gave it its objective validity; it mattered not what was the subjective character of the officiating priest, who served merely as an instrument in the transaction; it was of no consequence where the baptism was administered. That which is objectively divine in the transaction could evince its power, the grace of God could thus operate through the objective symbol, if it but found in the person baptized a recipient soul; that person could receive the grace of baptism, wherever he might be baptized, through his own faith, and through his own disposition of heart. But Cyprian brings against his opponents a charge of inconsistency, from which they could not easily defend themselves. If the baptism of heretics possessed an objective validity, then, for the same reason, their confirmation must also possess an objective validity. 'For,' says Cyprian, 'if a person born out of the Church, (namely, to the new life,) may become a temple of God, why may not also the Holy Spirit be poured out on this temple? He who has put off sin in baptism, and become sanctified, spiritually transformed into a new man, is capable of receiving the Holy Spirit. The Apostle says, "As many of you as are baptized, have put on Christ." It follows, then, that he who may put on Christ, when baptized by heretics, can much more receive the Holy Spirit, which Christ has sent; as if Christ could be put on without the Spirit, or the Spirit could be separated from Christ.'

"The other party maintained, on the other hand, that no baptism could be valid, unless administered in the true Church, where alone the efficacious influence of the Holy Spirit is exerted. If by this was understood merely an outward being in the Church, an outward connection with it, the decision of the question would be easy. But what Cyprian really meant here, was an inward subjective connection with the true Church by faith and disposition of heart. He took it for granted that the officiating priest himself, by virtue of his faith, must be an organ of the Holy Spirit, and enabled, by the magical influence of his priestly office, duly to perform the sacramental acts, to communicate, for example, to the water its supernatural, sanctifying power. But when the matter took this shape—was made thus to depend on the subjective character of the priest—it became difficult, in many cases, to decide as to the validity of a baptism, which must be the occasion of much perplexity and doubt;—for who could look into the heart of the officiating priest?

"But the Roman party went still farther in their defence of the objective significance of the formula of baptism. Even a baptism where the complete form was not employed, but administered simply in the name of Christ, they declared to be objectively valid. Cyprian maintained, on the other hand, that the formula of baptism had no longer significance, when not in the full form instituted by Christ. We perceive here the more liberal Christian spirit of the anti-Cyprian party. The thought hovered vaguely before their minds, that everything that pertains to Christianity is properly embraced in the faith in Christ.

"Cyprian himself, however, did not venture to limit God's grace by such outward things in cases where converted heretics had already been admitted without a new baptism, and had enjoyed the fellowship of the church, or died in it. 'God,' he observes, 'is great in his mercy, to show indulgence and not exclude from the benefits of the Church, those who have been received into it informally, and thus fallen a leap. A remarkable case of this sort is narrated by Dionysius of Alexandria. There was in the church of Alexandria a convert Heretic, who lived as a member of the Church for many years, and participated in the various acts of worship. Happening once to be present at a baptism of catechumens, he remembered that the baptism which he himself had received in the sect from which he was converted, probably a Gnostic sect, bore no resemblance whatever to the one he now witnessed. Had he been aware that whoever professes a Christ in faith, possesses all that is necessary to his growth in grace and to the salvation of his soul, this circumstance could not have given him so much uneasiness. But as this was not so clear to him, he doubted as to his title to consider himself a real Christian, and fell into the greatest distress and anxiety, believing himself to be without baptism and the grace of baptism. In tears, he threw himself at the bishop's feet, and besought him for baptism. The bishop endeavoured to quiet his fears; he assured him that he could not, at this late period, after he had so long partaken of the body and blood of the Lord, be baptized anew. It was sufficient that he had lived for so long a time in the fellowship of the Church, and all he had to do was to approach the holy supper with unwavering faith and a good conscience. But the disquieted man found it impossible to overcome his scruples and regain his tranquillity. So destructive to peace of conscience were the effects of such tenacious adherence to outward things, of not knowing how to rise with freedom to those things of the Spirit, which the inward man apprehends by faith!"

While Stephanus recognized the baptism of heretics as valid, he did not avoid the laying on of hands as significant of penitence. The African bishops, on the other hand, restricted this rite to the lapsed, and appealed to the custom observed by the heretics themselves in confirmation of their view. At an after period in the history of the North African church, we find the Donatists insisting on the rebaptization of heretics. At the Reformation, when both Roman Catholics and Protestants charged each other with heresy, both parties were agreed, as they have ever since been, upon the disputed point of heretical baptism. The Roman Catholics, in accordance with the views which their church had always avowed on the subject, were compelled to acknowledge the validity of Protestant baptism, while the Protestants, on the other hand, have always maintained that baptism to be a Christian ordinance, and, with the exception of a few dissenters, have never doubted of rebaptizing those who have been converted to the Protestant faith.

HERMÆ, a name originally the ancient Greeks to the person and the statue which they used to represent their deity. The first mention of statues of this kind was probably that of HERMÆS which see, and hence the name Hermæ was applied to all those statues which were the personification of which is mentioned by Pausanias to the Athenians. Statues of this description, having no other part of the human body developed but the head and the sexual organs, were generally placed in front of the houses, where they were worshipped by the women. They stood also before the temples and public places, as well as at the corners of the streets and high roads, some of which travellers describe as still to be seen at Athens. The Romans used them as termini or landmarks, sometimes in the original form of rude ins-shapen stones, and at other times with the bust of eminent men resting on them. In this latter form the name Hermæ was generally compounded with that of the deity, whose figure it served to support. Hence the names of Hermathena, Hermeros, Hermærodes, and so forth.

HERMÆA, festivals dedicated to the ancient heathen deity HERMÆS (which see), and celebrated in different parts of Greece. The boys at Athens usually took an active part in the religious ceremonies, combining them with games and amusements of various kinds. In Crete and other places the Hermæa were characterized by excesses somewhat similar to the Roman Saturnalia.

HERMANDAD, societies in Spain which were wont to supply victims to the INQUISITION (which see).

HERMANUBIS, an ancient Egyptian deity, a son of Osiris and Nephthys, and usually represented as a human being with a dog's head. It was regarded as a symbol of the Egyptian priesthood, engaged in their inquiries into the mysteries of nature.

HERMAPHRODITE'S Gr. Hermes, Mercury, and Aphrodite, Venus, one of those compound deities which among the ancient heathens formed a part of the worship of nature. This divinity was represented by Pausanias as a Hermæ, conjoined with a symbol of fertility, and in after times as a divinity, the head, body, and breasts being those of a female, and the lower parts those of a male. Hence the word "hermaphrodite" in our language is used to denote the combination of the male and the female in one.

HERMATHENA. See HERMÆ.

HERMENEUTÆ (Gr. interpreters), a class of officers in the ancient Christian church, mentioned by Epiphanius, whose employment it was to translate from one language into another, in those churches where the people spoke different languages. They were also required to assist the bishop in translating the correspondence of the church when necessary. This officer might be chosen from among the laity when no suitable person among the clergy could be found to discharge its duties, and when chosen he took his place among the clergy. Such officers might probably be required in the churches of Palestine, where some spoke Syriac, and others Greek; and also in the African churches, where some spoke Punic or Phœnician, and others Greek. Thus all who attended Divine worship were enabled through the interpreters to understand both the portions of Scripture read, and the discourses preached.

HERMERACLEA. See HERMÆ.

HERMEROS. See HERMÆ.

HERMES, one of the most celebrated of the gods of ancient Greece. He was said to be the son of Zeus and Maia, and to him is usually ascribed the invention of divine worship and sacrifices. He was also the inventor of the lyre and other musical instruments, and thus became intimately associated with Apollo, the god of music, whose oxen, however, he was charged with having stolen at a former period of his life. Thus Hermes came to be regarded as the patron of thieves, while he was also the protector of flocks, and enjoyed the high distinction of being the winged messenger of the gods, who taught men the use of speech, and the noble art of persuasive eloquence. As an appropriate return for this last-mentioned gift, the tongues of animals which had been sacrificed were presented on his shrine. He was the god of prudence, sagacity, and skill, the guardian of travellers, and the god from whom success in expeditions of every kind was alone to be expected, and accordingly statues in honour of Hermes were placed in the most conspicuous places on the public roads, that travellers might have no difficulty in paying their homage to him, and asking his protection. This divinity was recognized also as the god of commerce, and the regulator of games of chance. The ancient games of the Greeks, particularly those which required bodily exertion, were supposed to be under the patronage of Hermes. Indeed, so varied were the offices assigned to him, that some writers have alleged that several gods of this name existed in ancient Greece. The worship of Hermes seems to have been first celebrated in Arcadia, then in Athens, and in the course of time throughout every part of Greece; temples and statues being everywhere erected to his honour, and festivals kept by his votaries under the name of HERMÆA (which see). By the Romans this god was worshipped under the name of Mercury. The animals sacred to him were the dog, goat, and cock.

As early as the time of Plato, the Greek Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Thot; and when pagan philosophy began to be mingled up with Christianity in the form of New Platonism, this Egyptian Hermes was looked upon as the author of all knowledge and wise inventions among men. Hence he received the high appellation of Hermes Trismegistus, or the thrice greatest. Clemens Alexandrinus mentions as extant in his time, that is in the second century, forty-two books of Hermes, containing all knowledge human and divine. Jamblichus asserts that Hermes was the author of 20,000 works, and Manetho even speaks of 36,525, being the same number as that which he assigns to his several dynasties of kings. The works which are still extant, bearing the name of Hermes, have probably been the production of the New Platonists, intended as they obviously are to expound and to vindicate the doctrines of that philosophical school.

HERMIANS, an early Christian sect of which Augustin speaks as refusing the use of baptism by water. Their rejection of water baptism was grounded on the statement of John the Baptist, as to the difference between his baptism and that of Christ, "I indeed baptize you with water, but he that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." The baptism, therefore, which the Hermians regarded as the only true Christian baptism, was not by water but by fire; and as supporting this view, they alleged that the souls of men consisted of fire and spirit, and thus a baptism by fire was more accordant with their true nature. No distinct account occurs in the ancient writers of the mode in which baptism by fire was celebrated, but Clemens Alexandrinus states that some when they had baptized men in water, made also a mark upon their ears with fire, thus combining as they imagined water-baptism and fire baptism together. There seems also to have been a sect, who, when they went down into the water to dispense baptism, made fire to appear upon the surface of the water, and this they called baptism by fire. But in what precise way the Hermians dispensed their fire-baptism we have no means of ascertaining.

HERMITS. See ANCHORETS.

HERMOD, the son of Odin, the messenger of the Ases, and the Mercury of the Scandinavians.

HERMOGENIANS. Although there is no evidence of a distinct sect having ever existed under this name, yet from the prominence which must have been given to the opinions of Hermogenes in the end of the second and beginning of the third centuries, by the circumstance that Tertullian dedicated a treatise to their refutation, it was unpardonable to omit all reference to the anti-Gnostic system of the Carthaginian painter. This bold speculator felt himself utterly unable to sympathize with the prevailing opinions of his day. The questions which chiefly occupied his mind were the creation of the universe, and the existence of moral evil. In reference to the former, the Gnostic theory of emanations he felt to be quite unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it implied that material objects emanated from a Spirit, and sinful beings from a Being essentially holy. Neither did Hermogenes conceive that the difficulty was at all removed by the ordinary explanation that all things sprang from the creative power of God. This necessitated in his view a complete correspondence between the moral character of the creature and that of the Creator, such as is not found actually to exist. To account for the existence, therefore, and the continuance in the universe of the discordant elements of spirit and matter, holiness and sin, he devised a theory which he supposed would solve the great physical and moral difficulty, viz., that both the inconsistent principles were eternal. God existed as the active principle, and chaotic matter as the passive. To bring the two into contact so as to accomplish creation, he supposes God to be possessed of an eternal formative power over matter, in the exercise of which he is sovereign and uncontrolled. The resistance which matter gave to the formative power of God was the source Hermogenes conceived of all the imperfection and evil which exists in the universe; and this state of things would at last remedy itself, that part of matter which yielded to organization ultimately separating from that part which resisted it. Such was the theory by which Hermogenes imagined that he overturned the doctrines of the Gnostics in reference to creation and moral evil. From a tract, which though lost, Tertullian is known to have written, 'On the Soul,' in opposition to Hermogenes, it would appear that the speculative artist must have broached peculiar views on that subject also. What his sentiments were cannot now be known.

HERODIANS, a Jewish sect referred to in the New Testament, about whose character and opinions, however, considerable difference of opinion exists among the learned. It is generally supposed to have derived its name from Herod the Great, king of Judea, and appears to have been rather political than religious in its objects, having in view the support of Herod and his family, and the continued subjection of Palestine to the Roman government. The Herodians may have also agreed with Herod in conniving at many of the heathen practices which prevailed in the country, raising statues to the Emperors, and instituting games in honour of them. To this idolatrous tendency our Lord may perhaps refer in the caution which he gives to his disciples in Mark viii. 15, against the leaven of Herod. In matters of religion they seem to have been Sadducees, for what Matthew calls the leaven of the Sadducees, Mark terms the leaven of Herod. They were a kind of half Jews, who, while they professed the Jewish religion, occasionally conformed to the customs and practices of the Pagans. Many of the ancients suppose that the Herodians actually believed Herod to be the Messiah, applying to him some of the Old Testament prophecies, and particularly that of Micah, "And thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, that is to be ruler in Israel." Whatever a amount of truth there may be in the statements which are made concerning this sect, it is plain at all events, that the sect of the Herodians existed in the time of our blessed Lord, and joined with the other Jewish sects in opposing him.

HERO WORSHIP. Next to the worship of nature, the most ancient, and probably the most prolific source of idolatry was the worship of heroes, or great men, who, from the extent to which they had been the instruments of good or evil while on earth, were reckoned among the gods when they were dead. The adulation, gratitude, reverence, or respect, which was yielded to them when alive, followed them to their graves; and no sooner had they passed away from the earth, than the extravagant feelings, whether of love or of awe, with which their memory was regarded, led to their deification. This indeed appears in very ancient times to have been the usual mode of rewarding those who had approved themselves as the benefactors of their race. Plutarch tells us, that the Egyptian priests were wont to boast that they had the bodies of their gods embalmed and deposited in their sepulchres, and Syncellus reckons up seven gods and nine demi-gods who reigned in Egypt, assigning to each of them a certain number of years for his reign. The Egyptians, however, were somewhat unwilling to allow such a view of their gods to be entertained generally among the people. By the laws of the country it was a capital crime to allege that Scrapis had once been a man. Nor was this feeling of jealousy confined to only one of their deities; they had in almost every temple the image of Silence, with her finger upon her mouth, and several images of Sphinx about the altars, the meaning of which, according to Varro, was, that no man should dare to affirm that their gods were of human origin.

It is scarcely possible, we conceive, to study attentively the ancient heathen mythology of the Greeks and Romans without being deeply impressed with the conviction, that its most prominent features manifest it to have been fundamentally and throughout a system of hero-worship: "That the ancient legends," says Mr. Crosthwaite, "concerning the deities of the Greeks refer to human beings, ought to be sufficiently evident to any plain candid inquirer, from the circumstances related of them. Their actions, their intermarriages, and other intercourse with men and women; their being driven out of Greece, as it is said, by giants, and their flight to Egypt, are all most unquestionably human affairs poetically embellished. Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, Pausanias, and especially Cicero, who devoted much time and attention to the subject, have all left this as their decided opinion on the subject. Diodorus Siculus expressly declares, that Osiris, the Jupiter of the Greeks, was a man worshipped for the splendid benefits conferred by him on his country and mankind; and that his associate deities were likewise men and women, whom gratitude or fear raised into objects of worship." On this subject, however, it is unnecessary to enlarge, as it has already been fully considered in the article entitled DEAD, WORSHIP OF THE (which see).

HERRNHUTTERS. See MORAVIANS.

HERSEPHORIA. See ARREPHORIA.

HERTHA, the goddess of the earth among the ancient Germans, termed by Tacitus the mother of the gods. This divinity is sometimes represented as a male, and sometimes as a female. One of the principal seats of the worship of Hertha was the island of Rugen, where, according to Tacitus, human victims were offered in sacrifice to the earth goddess.

It has been alleged that Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain was consecrated to her, when the idolatrous worship of the Saxons was introduced from Germany into England.

HESPERIDES, the guardians of the golden apples, which are said in the mythology of the ancient Greeks to have been presented by Ge to Hera, on the occasion of the celebration of her marriage with Zeus. Their names were Ægle, Erytheia, Hestia, and Arethusa. They are described by the poets as remarkable for the richness of their melodious singing. The earlier legends fix the residence of the Hesperides; or Atlantides, as they were sometimes called, in the remote west, on the banks of the Oceanus, but in the later writers they are usually spoken of as located in different parts of Libya, or even in the Hyperborean regions.

HESPERUS, the evening star worshipped among the ancient Greeks, and under the name of Lucifer also, or the morning star, among the ancient Romans. He is called by Homer and Hesiod, the bringer of light.

HESTIA (Gr. the hearth), the goddess of the hearth among the ancient Greeks, and the daughter of Chronus and Rhea. She was worshipped as the giver of all the comforts and blessings of home, and believed to dwell in the midst of families, rendering them the scenes of domestic happiness. This goddess presided in all sacrifices, watching over the sacred altar-fire, and was accordingly invoked at the very outset of the ceremony. She was also worshipped as a separate deity, sacrifices being offered to her of cows only one year old. When oaths of peculiar solemnity were taken among the Greeks, they swore by the goddess of the hearth, and it was accounted a high privilege also to claim her protection. Every town had its prytanis or sanctuary of Hestia, where she had a statue and a sacred hearth, where foreign ambassadors were formally received by the public authorities of the city. The emigrant also as he left his native home carried with him a portion of the sacred fire to cheer his new, and it might be far distant home. "If it happens," says Plutarch, "the sacred fire by any accident has been put out, as the sacred lamp is said to have been at Athens, under the tyranny of Aristion; at Delphi, when the temple was burned by the Medes; and at Rome, in the Mithridatic war, as also in the civil war, when not only the fire was extinguished, but the altar overturned: it is not to be lighted again from another fire, but new fire is to be gained by drawing a pure and unpolluted flame from the sunbeams. They kindled it generally with concave vessels of brass, formed by the conic section of a rectangled triangle, whose lines from the circumference meet in one central point." The Romans worshipped this goddess under the name of VESTA (which see).

HESYCHAST CONTROVERSY. See BARLAAMITES.

HESYCHASTS, a name applied by Justinian in one of his Novels to monks in general, on account of the quietness and retirement in which they lived, but it is more especially applied to the Quietist monks in the Greek convents on Mount Athos in Thessaly. They entertained the notion that tranquillity of mind and the extinction of all evil passions and desires might be obtained by means of contemplation. Accordingly, under the idea that there is a divine light hidden in the soul, which only requires to be developed, they seated themselves in some retired corner, and fixing their eyes upon their navel, they gave themselves up to intense contemplation for days and nights together, until at length, as they imagined, a divine light broke forth from the body, and they became luminous with the very light which shone on Mount Tabor. Thus by a motionless asceticism, they sought to attain to a sensible perception of the divine light. A similar practice prevailed among the ascetics in Siain. The Greek Hesychasts were attacked as enthusiasts by a Calabrian monk, named Barlaam, whose followers were called BARLAAMITES (which see), and defended by Gregory Palamas, archbishop of Thessalonica. A council was held at Constantinople on the subject, A.D. 1314, which decided in favour of the monks, and against Barlaam, who forthwith left Greece and returned to Italy.

HESYCHIA, a goddess among the ancient Greeks, who was considered as the patroness and producer of peace and quietness. She was said to be the daughter of Dice or Justice, which settles all disputes, and puts contending parties to silence.

HETERÆ. See PROSTITUTION (SACRED).

HETEREIUS, a surname of Zeus among the ancient Greeks, as protecting and patronising associations of companions and friends.

HETERODOX (Gr. heteros, another, and doxa, an opinion), an epithet applied to such opinions as are different from, or at variance with, the acknowledged creed of the orthodox Christian church.

HETEROOUSIANS (Gr. heteros, another, and ousia, substance or essence), a name given to the most open and avowed of the ARIANS (which see), in the fourth century, who, not content with denying the homoousia or identity of substance of the Father and the Son, rejected also the more modified Arian opinion of the homoiousia, or similarity of substance of the Father and the Son, and held in plain and explicit terms that the Son was entirely different in substance or essence from the Father. See ÆTIANIS.

HEURIPPE, a surname of Artemis, to whom Ulysses offered sacrifice on finding his lost horses.

HEXAPLA, an edition of the Bible prepared with almost incredible industry and labour by Origen in the third century. It contained throughout six columns, generally eight, and occasionally nine, thus arranged; 1. The Hebrew text in the Hebrew characters; 2. The Hebrew text in Greek characters; 3. The version of Aquila; 4. The version of Symmachus; 5. The Septuagint version; 6. The version of Theodotion; 7, and 8. Two other Greek versions whose authors were unknown, the one found at Aricho, and the other at Nicopolis; 9. A Greek version of the Psalms. The three last being anonymous, are denominated the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Greek versions. When the edition contained only the four versions of the Septuagint, Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, it was called the Tetrapla or the fourfold edition; and when it contained the whole except the Greek version of the Psalms, it received the name of Octapla or eightfold edition. Rufinus alleges that the object of Origen in undertaking this elaborate work was to put an end to the controversies between the Jews and the Christians. The Hexapla being found too cumbersome and expensive, Origen undertook to abridge it. He published, accordingly, a version of the Septuagint, adding supplementary renderings taken from the translation of Theodotion, where the Septuagint had not rendered the Hebrew text. The fragments of the Hexapla which are preserved, have been collected and published by Montfaucon, Paris, 1713, 2 vols. folio. The most useful parts of Montfaucon's edition, with additions, corrections and notes, have been published in two vols. 8vo, by Bahrdt, Leipzig, 1769-1770.

III, the second member of a mystic triad composed by Lao-Tsen, the celebrated Chinese philosopher. It is thus described: "That which you look at and do not see is called I; that which you hearken after and do not hear is called Hi; that which your hand reaches after and cannot grasp is called Wei. These are three beings which cannot be comprehended, and which together make but one. That which is above is no more brilliant; that which is beneath is no more obscure. It is a chain without break which cannot be named, which returns into nonentity. It is that which may be called form without form, image without image, being indefinable. If you go to meet it, you see not this principle; if you follow it, you see nothing beyond. He who grasps the old state of reason (that is, the negation of beings before the creation) in order to estimate present existences or the universe, he may be said to have hold of the chain of reason."

HICKSITES, one of the two great sections into which the Society of Friends in America has, since 1828, been divided. Elias Hicks, from whom they derive their name, belonged to Philadelphia, and the peculiar sentiments which he taught, he imagined to be in accordance with the original principles laid down by Fox and the first founders of the Society. The great fundamental principle on which the leader of the schism in America rested his teaching is thus expressed by Dr. Gibbons, himself a Hickite: "God hath given to every man coming into the world and placed within him, a measure of manifestation of divine light, grace, or spirit which, if heaved, is all sufficient to redeem or save him. It is recorded; and illustrated in the scriptures, by the prophets, and by Jesus Christ and his disciples and apostles, under various names and similitudes. But the thing we believe to be one, even as God is one and his purpose one and the same in all, viz., repentance, regeneration, and final redemption. It is called light—of which the light of the natural sun is a beautiful and instructive emblem: for this divine light, like the natural, enables us to distinguish with indelible clearness all that concerns us in the works of salvation, and its blessings are as impartially, freely, and universally dispensed to the spiritual, as the other is to the outward creation. It is called grace, and grace of God, because freely bestowed on us by his bounty and enduring love." According to this representation of the matter, there cannot be a doubt that the inward light is not only exalted above, but made actually to supersede the written word: and this inward light being communicated to every man without exception, and being sufficient, if obeyed, to save him, both the Word of Christ and Christ himself are rendered without effect. Such a doctrine plainly lays the Hicksites open to the charge which has been brought against them by the old school section of Friends, of having lapsed into deism. Nor does the statement which Dr. Gibbons gives of the views of the body, on the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, render them less amenable to the charge. "We believe," says he, "in the divinity of Christ—not of the outward body, but of the spirit which dwelt in it—a divinity not self-existing and independent, but derived from the Father, being the Holy Spirit or God in Christ. 'The Son can do nothing of himself,' said Christ; and again, 'I can of mine own self do nothing,' (John v. 19, 30;) and in another place, 'The Father that dwelleth in me he doeth the work,' (John xiv. 10;) 'As my Father hath taught me, I speak these things,' (John viii. 28;) 'Even as the Father said unto me, so I speak,' (John xii. 50.)

"We reject the common doctrines of the Trinity and Satisfaction, as contrary to reason and revelation. We are equally far from owning the doctrine of 'imputed righteousness,' in the manner and form in which it is held. We believe there must be a true righteousness of heart and life, wrought in us by the Holy Spirit, or Christ within; in which work we impute all to him, for of ourselves we can do nothing. Neither do we admit that the sins of Adam are, in any sense, imputed to his posterity; but we believe that no one incurs the guilt of sin, until he transgresses the law of God in his own person. Deut. i. 39; Ezek. xvi. 10—24; Matt. xvi. 16; Mark x. 14, 15, 16; Rom. ix. 11. In that fallen state, the love and mercy of God are ever extended for his regeneration and redemption. God so loved the world, that he sent his only-begotten Son into the world, in that prepared body, under the former dispensation, for the salvation of men. And it is through the same redeeming love, and for the same purpose that, under the 'new covenant,' he now sends the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, a mediator and intercessor, to reconcile us, and render us obedient to the holy will and righteous law of God. We believe that all, that is to be savingly known of God, is made manifest or revealed in man by his Spirit, (Rom. i. 19;) and if mankind had been satisfied to rest here, and had practised on the knowledge thus communicated, there would never have existed a controversy about religion."

The opinions of Hicks spread to a large extent among the Friends throughout the United States, particularly in Pennsylvania where the members of the Society have always been numerous. Accordingly, at a yearly meeting held at Philadelphia in the fourth month, 1828, a declaration was agreed upon in reference to the proceedings of those who, during the previous year, had separated from the Society, in which the Hicksites are explicitly stated to have been led into "an open denial of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion;" and the orthodox party go on to say in their declaration, that "they believe it right to bear their decided testimony against such principles, and to disown those who hold them." The relative numbers of the two parties in that year were, Hicksites, 18,141; orthodox, 7,134. The Hicksites still continue to form a large majority of the whole Society of Friends in America. The yearly meetings of New York, Genessee, Baltimore, Ohio, and Indiana, hold an epistolary correspondence with the Philadelphia yearly meeting according to ancient practice. But the yearly meeting of London has declined this intercourse since the separation in 1827.

HIERACITES, a heretical Christian sect which sprung up in Egypt at the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century. Its founder was Hieracas, as he is called by Epiphanius, or Hierax by John of Damascus, an ascetic of Leontopolis, who earned his subsistence by the practice of the art of calligraphy, which, at that period, was highly esteemed in Egypt. He was intimately acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, on which he wrote several commentaries, both in the Greek and in the Coptic languages. Like Origen he seems to have made much use, in his expositions, of the allegorical mode of interpretation. He denied the resurrection of the body and of a heaven perceptible by the senses. He objected to the married life, and strongly inculcated celibacy, alleging that none of those who were married could inherit the kingdom of heaven. This doctrine he considered as forming the grand leading distinction between the Old and New Testaments. Paul, he alleged, permitted marriage only out of respect to human infirmity; but to remain unmarried indicated a high measure of moral goodness. It was a favourite notion of Hieracas that it ought to be the habitual aim of every man, by his own efforts of self-denial and asceticism, to earn a part in the blessedness of heaven; and as a corollary from this doctrine he maintained that children who died before they are able to enter upon the great moral conflict are excluded from the inheritance of the righteous, but occupy a sort of middle position, such as Pelagius and many of the Orientals afterwards believed to belong to unbaptized children. Hieracas, among his other errors, was supposed to entertain false views on the doctrine of the Trinity. "The Son of God," said he, "emanates from the Father, as one lamp is kindled from another, or as one torch is divided into two." He held that Melchisedec typically represented the Holy Spirit. Into the sect of the Hieracites only unmarried persons were admitted, and some of the more rigorous among them abstained from animal food. Some writers have classed them with the Manicheans, but for this there is no foundation.

HIERARCHY (ANGELIC). See ANGEL.

HIERARCHY (ECCLESIASTICAL), a word used to denote the Christian church when viewed in its ecclesiastical constitution as having a regular gradation of orders among its ministers. In the article CLERGY (which see), we remarked that there is no evidence of any difference of rank among the clergy either in the age of the apostles or of their immediate successors, nor indeed until the establishment of Christianity under Constantine. The gradual rise, however, of the hierarchical tendency may be traced from a very early period in the history of the Christian church. As might naturally have been anticipated, the earliest congregations or churches were formed in towns over which bishops or pastors were placed. From these as centre points Christianity was diffused throughout the surrounding rural districts, and separate churches were formed which became connected with the nearest town bishop, who supplied them with a presbyter or deacon to discharge the duties of the ministry among them, still continuing himself to take a general oversight of the infant church. The power of the town-bishops thus increased as the number of rural congregations were multiplied; and the management of the ecclesiastical affairs becoming too difficult and complicated to be overtaken by one individual, provincial synods were formed towards the end of the second century. These synods usually met once or twice a-year in the chief town of the province, the bishop of that town acting as pre-ident. Thus the bishops of the principal cities gradually assumed a kind of superintendence over the other bishops of the province. In the first instance, however, this arrangement took place only in the east, where the Christian churches particularly abounded. In the west, Rome was the ecclesiastical metropolis of a great part of Italy, where as yet only a small number of Christian churches existed. In Africa, where Christianity had made rapid progress, a more regular ecclesiastical organization had been formed. Every African province had a primate at the head of it, who, in Mauritania and Numidia, was usually, though not always, the oldest bishop, and in proconsular Africa was the bishop of Carthage. This last was at the same time the head of all the provinces, and could summon general councils. The regular ecclesiastical organization thus early introduced into the African church was probably copied from the political arrangements of the country, all the provinces being under the proconsul in Carthage, under whom the two Mauritaniae were managed by procurators.

The bishops of the principal cities of the Roman Empire, Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, having many rural bishops under their care, and presiding in their own provincial synods, which were large and more influential, naturally came to be looked upon as possessed of more weight and importance than their fellow-bishops, though the principle was as yet fully recognized that all bishops were equal in rank and power. In the West, it is true, no small respect was paid to the Church of Rome, as the largest and the only apostolic church in the whole of that extensive district, but no authority was claimed over any one of the Western churches, far less over the Eastern. In process of time the ministers of the Christian church coming to be looked upon as a class distinct from the members of the church, and set apart, like the Jewish priesthood, for special sacred offices, they naturally were treated with additional respect, and even reverence. For the inferior services of the church, particular officers were appointed, different, however, in the Greek and Latin churches. This arrangement increased the patronage, as well as the power, of the bishops, in whom was vested the appointment of the inferior clergy. Still, however, the authority of the bishop was not uncontrolled, as in the discharge of his duties he had not only to consult his presbyters, but, in some cases, to ask the opinion of the whole church.

The establishment of Christianity under Constantine the Great had a powerful influence in developing the hierarchical tendency which had now for a long period been gradually developing itself. "Ecclesiastical possessions," says Gieseler, "became very considerable, partly by the liberality of the emperors, partly by the legal permission to accept of inheritances and gifts, which alas, was often abused by the clergy, so as to become legacy-hunting. All these external advantages attracted many to the spiritual profession, the number of clergy was swelled beyond measure, and to the already existing classes were added parabolani and copiatae. The emperors were obliged to meet this pressure, which became dangerous to the state, with stringent laws.

"Under these circumstances the power of the bishops particularly rose. At the head of a numerous clergy completely subject to them, they alone had power to decide on the appropriation of the church estates, and possessed ecclesiastical legislation by their exclusive privilege of having a voice at synods. Hence they continued to make the country bishops more subservient to them; to the other churches in cities and in the country, ecclesia plebana, titulus, except the head church (eccl. cathedra)

they sent according to their own free choice, presbyters (parochus, plebanus), to conduct the worship of God, who were entirely dependent on them even in the matter of maintenance. The first person next to the bishop was the archidiacon, who helped him to manage the revenues. The arch-presbyters, an order which arose about the same time, were of far inferior rank. All the lower clergy and the presbyters too were now chosen by the bishop alone. The choice of bishops mostly depended on the other bishops of the provinces, except when the emperors interfered. Still, however, the consent of the people was required, and was not without weight, especially in the west.

"Under these external advantages, it is not surprising that the prevailing notions of priestly dignity, and especially of the bishops' authority, rose higher and higher; and that the bishops externally enjoyed the highest demonstrations of respect, their claims as the vicars of Christ and the successors of the apostles being capable of indefinite development. Yet their overweening pride often gave just cause for complaint."

Notwithstanding this rapid increase of priestly authority and power among the bishops of the Christian church at the council of Nice, A. D. 325, provincial councils were still acknowledged as the highest ecclesiastical authority. In the commotions, however, which were caused by the Arian controversy, the provincial councils were frequently found to be too weak to withstand powerful adversaries often backed by the overwhelming influence of the emperors. This consciousness of weakness led to the still further development of the hierarchical spirit in the churches both of the East and West.

In the East larger synods were formed called diocesan, framed according to the political distribution of the realm, which had been made by Constantine. The second general council, which met at Constantinople A. D. 381, raised the diocesan synods above the provincial synods, so as to be the highest ecclesiastical court, and gave the bishop of Constantinople the first rank after the bishop of Rome. Thus in the East the bishops of Constantinople, Alexandria, Ephesus, and Caesarea, had risen above the metropolitans, and received the distinctive names of Exarch and Archbishop; and shortly before the council of Chalcedon the title of Patriarch, a name of respect which, in the fourth century, had been given to every bishop, was exclusively appropriated to them. "But," to quote again from Gieseler, "political relations and hierarchical ambition soon altered this arrangement. The bishops of Constantinople, favoured by their position, soon gained an influence over the affairs of other dioceses also, which manifested itself decidedly in the neighbouring dioceses of Asia and Pontus in particular. At first, indeed, they met with resistance; but since it was of moment to the emperors of the eastern Roman empire to make the bishop of their chief city powerful, as being their principal instrument in ruling the church, and to make him equal in rank to the bishop of the capital of the western Roman empire, the council of Chalcedon formally invested the patriarch of Constantinople with the same rank as the bishop of Rome, the superintendence over those three dioceses, and the right of receiving complaints from all the dioceses against metropolitans. Thus the exarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea were put back into a middle rank between patriarchs and metropolitans. The bishops of Antioch endeavoured likewise to draw over Cyprus into their ecclesiastical diocese, as it belonged to the political diocese of Asia; but the Cyprian bishops received from the Alexandrian party at the council of Ephesus the assurance of their independence. The bishops of Jerusalem, supported by the precedence which had been conceded to them at the council of Nice, after having long endeavoured in vain to shake themselves free of their metropolitan in Cæsarea, succeeded at last in rising to the rank of patriarchs, by an edict of Theodosius II., and by the synod of Chalcedon, the three Palestines were assigned them as their ecclesiastical domain. At the close of this period, therefore, we have four patriarchs in the east, viz. of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem. In their dioceses they were looked upon as ecclesiastical centres, to which the other bishops had to attach themselves for the preservation of unity; and constituted, along with their diocesan synod, the highest court of appeal in all ecclesiastical matters of the diocese; while on the other hand they were considered as the highest representatives of the church, who had to maintain the unity of the church-universal by mutual communication, and without whose assent no measures affecting the interests of the whole church could be taken."

The bishop of Rome, from the peculiar position which he occupied in the Western church, was naturally looked up to by his brethren with the highest respect. He was bishop of the only apostolic congregation of the west, that is, of the only congregation of the west which could boast of having been planted by an apostle. He was besides possessed of large episcopal revenues, metropolitan of ten suburban provinces, and resided in the principal city of the world. With such peculiar advantages as these, it was not difficult for Julius, bishop of Rome, to obtain from the synod of Sardica, A. D. 347, the power of appointing judges to hear the appeals of condemned bishops, should he look upon them as well founded. Questions of apostolic doctrine and practice were naturally referred in the West to the bishop of the only apostolic and common mother-church, such questions in the East being referred not to one only, but to several distinguished bishops. In consequence of the numerous disputed cases submitted to their decision, the Roman bishops took occasion to issue a great number of didactic letters which soon assumed the tone of apostolic ordinances, and were held in very high estimation in the West. All these circumstances had the effect of bringing about such a state of things, that in the beginning of the fifth century the bishops of Rome practically exercised an oversight and supervision of the entire Western church.

The Eastern church meantime strenuously asserted its entire independence of the West. But the doctrinal controversies which so frequently disturbed the peace of the church tended not a little to increase the power of the bishop of Rome; for while the Eastern churches were agitated and split into factions, the Western churches stood united and firm with the bishop of Rome at their head. The high influence and authority which that dignity had gained in the West rendered it important, whenever any ecclesiastical controversy broke out in the East, for each party to make all efforts to secure him on its side. Hence deference was frequently paid to the bishop of Rome in the East, which, in other circumstances, would have been denied him. But the portion of the Christian church, where the Roman bishops were least successful in obtaining influence, was the African church, which had been long accustomed to possess a firmly fixed ecclesiastical organization, through which its own affairs were readily managed, without needing the slightest interference from foreign churches.

The Christian church had now assumed a hierarchical form both in the East and in the West, being headed in the one case by the patriarchs, and in the other by the popes; and from this period commenced an earnest and sustained contention between these dignitaries for superiority of rank and power. At length their ambition could no longer be restrained within the bounds of their respective churches, but first the patriarch of Constantinople, and then the Pope of Rome, in course of time boldly put forth the arrogant and presumptuous claim to be regarded as the Universal Bishop, the sole head of the visible church of Christ upon the earth. And though the power and prestige of the patriarchs have long since fallen before the boundless ambition of the Russian czars, the pope of Rome, to this day, still proclaims as loudly as ever that he is "the head of all heads, and the prince moderator and pastor of the whole church of Christ which is under heaven."

The various orders of the ecclesiastical hierarchy differ in different churches. The Roman Catholic church adheres firmly to the principle on which the schoolmen were wont to insist, that the priesthood ought to consist of seven classes corresponding to the seven Spirits of God. Three belong to the superior order, presbyters or priests, deacons and subdeacons, while the inferior order contains four, acolytes, exorcists, readers, and doorkeepers. The Romish canonists, however, divide the clergy into nine classes, of which five belong to the inferior order, singers, doorkeepers, readers, exorcists, and acolyths; and four to the superior order, sub-deacons, deacons, presbyters, and bishops. In the Greek church, again, the officers are as follows, bishops, priests, deacons, sub-deacons, and readers, to which last class belong the singers and acolyths. The higher orders of the clergy include archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs. To these was sometimes added another officer still higher, styled exarch. In the Russo-Greek church, at the head of all is the supreme ecclesiastical judicatory, is the Holy Synod. The Syrian and Nestorian churches affect to copy after the heavenly hierarchy, and to compare their officers with those of the court of heaven. The Nestorians compare their patriarchs and bishops with the orders of cherubim, seraphim, and thrones; their archdeacons, pastoral priests, and preachers, with angels of the second rank, styled virtues, powers, and dominions; their deacons, sub-deacons, and readers with those of the third rank, principedoms, archangels, and angels. In the Church of England there are three orders of clergy, bishops, priests, and deacons, and besides there are several dignities including archbishops, deans, and chapters, archdeacons, and rural deans. Episcopalians are wont to allege, in support of a gradation of office-bearers in the Christian church, that the Jewish church, in Old Testament times, partook of the nature of a hierarchy. To this Presbyterians usually reply by demurring against all attempts to draw an analogy between the Jewish and Christian dispensations, the two being so completely different from one another. For the arguments on both sides see article BISHOP.

HIERARCHY (ECCLESIASTICAL). The word hierarchy is not only used in reference to the internal government of the church; but it is also employed to denote the dominion which the church has sometimes exercised over the state. For three centuries the Christian church was wholly unconnected with the civil government of the Roman Empire in which it was first planted; nay, the hottest persecutions through which the church had to pass in her early history, had the express sanction of the Roman state. Constantine the Great, however, A. D. 312, took Christianity under the shelter of the government, and adopted it as the established religion of the country. While the emperor thus afforded the protection of law, and the sanction of the civil government to the proceedings of the church, he still retained in his hands the power of calling synods, and even of presiding over their deliberations, as well as of exercising a general oversight over the whole movements of the Christians. The tendency, for a long period, was rather to subjugate the church to the authority of the state, even in matters connected with its internal constitution. Some of the Roman emperors even went so far as to decide questions of faith by edicts, and to convocate synods almost entirely for the purpose of adapting imperial articles of faith. Nor was this confined to the Roman Empire; the same spirit on the part of the government to lord it over the church was displayed in the Gothic, Lombard, and Frankish states. Gradually, however, the power of the clergy increased, and yet such was the jealousy with which they were viewed by the ruling powers in all the different countries of Europe, that it was not until the eleventh century that, under Gregory VII., the supremacy of the church over the state first assumed a perfectly organized system. From the time of his pontificate the face of Europe underwent a great change, and the prerogatives of the emperors, and other sovereign princes, were much diminished. The hierarchical principle was helped forward not a little by the influence of the crusades, and for nearly two centuries after the days of Gregory, the power of the church was completely in the ascendant. In the fourteenth century, however, it began gradually to diminish. The Reformation lent it a heavy blow; but while in Protestant countries the domination of the church over the state is unknown, the governments of Romish states have a constant struggle to prevent the growing power of the clergy, while the Pope endeavours, by means of concordats, to carry the hierarchical views of the Papacy as far as expediency or safety permits.

HIERATIC WRITING, a species of sacred writing among the ancient Egyptians, peculiar to the priests, especially the HIEROGRAMMATISTS (which see). This sacerdotal writing is chiefly found on the papyri, and is evidently derived from the Hieroglyphic writing, of which indeed it may be regarded as an abbreviated form. Though the signs, however, in the hieratic writing are considerably abridged, they include figurative, emblematic, and phonetic characters, the two former being sometimes found separate, and sometimes in groups. All the hieratic manuscripts exhibit the same character, that of abbreviated hieroglyphic writing, and seem to have been used chiefly, if not exclusively, in the transcription of texts in reference to matters of a purely religious or scientific description, and in the drawing up of religious inscriptions. The three species of writing in use among the Egyptians, were the Hieroglyphic, properly so called; the Hieratic, and the Demotic. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus mention only two, afterwards referred to by Clemens Alexandrinus, the popular and the sacred characters, an arrangement which is borne out by the Rosetta stone, which speaks also of only two kinds of writing, the enchorial and the sacred. The only way in which this apparent discrepancy can be explained is, by supposing that the sacred writing referred to by Herodotus, Diodorus, and the Rosetta stone, includes both the hieroglyphic and the hieratic writing of Clemens Alexandrinus.

HIEREION. See SACRIFICE.

HIERODIACONI (Gr. hieros, sacred, and diakonos, a deacon), monks of the Russo-Greek Church (which see), who are also deacons.

HIEROGLYPHICS (Gr. hieros, sacred, and glypho, to carve, or engrave), sacred carvings, a term applied by the ancient Greeks to that species of writing which they found engraved or sculptured upon the Egyptian monuments. It is not improbable from the word sacred being used as a part of the compound term hieroglyphics, that the Greeks supposed this species of writing to be employed to denote sacred things. But the discovery has been made by an examination of the inscriptions on the Rosetta stone, that, as Bishop Warburton acutely conjectured, these sculptured characters constituted a real written language, applicable to events of history and common life, as well as to subjects connected with religion and mythology. Picture writing, indeed, was one of the earliest modes of communication to which mankind resorted. They must have represented events and objects by painting them before they could have acquired the art of describing them in writing. Accordingly, when the Spaniards first landed on the shores of South America, their arrival was announced to the inhabitants of the interior by rude paintings of men, arms, and ships. Egypt is perhaps the only country whose monuments present to us the successive steps by which men have arrived at alphabetic writing, the first and simplest part of the process being the use of hieroglyphics, which would be gradually reduced and abbreviated, until at length they came to use arbitrary and conventional marks expressive of the sounds uttered by the human voice.

The hieroglyphic writing is of three kinds, the Phonetic, the Symbolic, and the Pictorial. The names of the Egyptian gods were usually expressed by symbols, and not by letters. These representations were of two kinds; figurative, in which the name of the deity is implied, by the form in which he was represented in his statue; and symbolic, in which a part of the statue or some object having a reference to the deity was employed.

It is interesting to mark the singular train of circumstances by which Dr. Young was first led to decypher the Egyptian hieroglyphics. The details are thus briefly given by Dr. Russell: "When the French were in Egypt they discovered, in the foundation of a fort near Rosetta, a block or slab of basalt, which presented an inscription in three distinct languages, namely, the sacred letters, the letters of the country, and the Greek. The first class obviously comprehends the hieroglyphic and hieratic, the mode of writing used by the priests; while the second not less manifestly identifies itself with what Clemens calls the Epistolographic, and which is now usually particularized as demotic or common. Unfortunately a considerable part of the first inscription was wanting; the beginning of the second and the end of the third were also mutilated; so that there were no precise points of coincidence from which the expounder could set out in his attempt to decipher the unknown characters. But the second inscription, notwithstanding its deficiencies near the beginning, was still sufficiently perfect to allow a comparison to be made of its different parts with each other, and with the Greek, by the same method which would have been followed if it had been entire. Thus, on examining, in their relative situation, the parts corresponding to two passages of the Greek inscription in which Alexander and Alexandria occurred, there were soon recognised two well-marked groups of characters resembling each other, which were therefore considered as representing these names. A variety of similar coincidences were detected, and especially that between a certain assemblage of figures and the word Ptolemy, which occurred no fewer than fourteen times; and hence, as the Greek was known to be a translation of the Egyptian symbols, the task of the decipherer was limited to a discovery of the alphabetical power of the several marks, or objects, which denoted that particular name. It was by pursuing this path that success was ultimately attained; it being satisfactorily made out that hieroglyphs not only expressed ideas, or represented things, but also that they were frequently used as letters; and that, when employed for the last of these purposes, the names of the several objects in the Coptic or ancient language of the country supplied the alphabetical sounds which composed any particular word."

In hieroglyphical manuscripts or papyri the characters are generally placed in perpendicular lines; while in sculptures and paintings, especially when they refer to persons, the signs are arranged horizontally. The hieroglyphics are always to be read towards the faces of the figures. Thus if the front be to the left, they must be read from left to right; if to the right, from right to left; and if arranged in perpendicular lines, from the top downwards.

HIEROGRAMMATISTS (Gr. hieros, sacred, and grammateus, a scribe), the sacred scribes among the ancient Egyptians. Employing the hieratic or sacerdotal writing, they transcribed religious writings on papyri, and gave an account of religious rites and ceremonies. Their duty was also to expound the sacred mysteries as far as they were allowed to be made known to the people. They appear to have been skilled in divination. Like the other members of the priesthood, they were subjected to rules of the strictest austerity. They were highly esteemed at court, and assisted the monarch with their counsels. They carried a sceptre, and were dressed in linen garments. See EGYPTIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT).

HIEROMANCY (Gr. hieros, sacred, and manteia, divination), a species of divination among the ancient Greeks and Romans, which consisted in predicting future events by observing the various appearances which presented themselves in the act of offering sacrifices.

HIEROMNEMON, one of two deputies sent from each city in Greece to the Amphictyonic council in Athens, and whose duty it was to take charge of what related to sacrifices and religious ceremonies

HIEROMONACH Gr. hieros, sacred, and monachos, a monk, monks of the Russo Greek Church, who are priests. They are considered as sacred monks, and never officiate but on solemn festivals.

HIERONYMITES, a name given to the monks over whom Hieronymus or St. Jerome presided in Syria, in the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century. The term is also applied to several orders of Romish monks which arose in Spain and Italy in the course of the fourteenth century. An order under this name was founded in Spain by Peter Ferdinand Pecha, chamberlain to Peter the Cruel, king of Castile; they were confirmed by Gregory XI. in 1373. and governed by the rule of St. Augustine. Their third general, Lupus Olivetus, with the consent of Martin V., A. D. 1424, formed among them a peculiar congregation, to which he gave a rule drawn from Jerome's works. In the year 1595, this order was reunited in Spain with the rest of the Hieronymites. In Italy, Peter Gambacorti, in 1577, established an order of Hieronymites. Besides, there was also the Fesulan Congregation, founded in 1417 by Charles of Montegravelli. Hieronymite monks, who are found in Sicily, the West Indies, and Spanish America, wear a white habit, with a black scapulary.

HIEROPHANTS, priests among the ancient Athenians, who officiated in sacrifices and sacred ceremonies. They were bound to observe the strictest continence, and in order to allay carnal desires, they are said to have drank decoctions of hemlock. The ceremonies of initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries were performed by the Hieropiants, who were held in such veneration that the initiated were forbidden to mention them in the presence of the profane. The supreme Hierophant, when presiding at the mysteries, was anointed with the juice of hemlock as the type of Creative Omnipotence. He was dressed in gorgeous robes, the outer vestment being a sort of coarse brocade of woven gold, arabesqued with jewels, and scented with spikebard. He wore a diadem on his head lavishly adorned with emeralds. He was accompanied with three principal attendants, severally the representatives of the sun, the moon, and the planet Mercury. In the midst of the strange visions which passed before the initiated in the Eleusinia, it was an important part of the office of the Hieropiants to read out of the sacred records of the goddess Ceres, the explanation of the stupendous types of the festivity.

HIEROPOIOI Gr. hieros, sacred, and poieo, to make, persons employed anciently at Athens in superintending the oblations and in sacrificing the victims. Ten were appointed to this office every year, and at their girdles they wore a consecrated axe as an emblem of their duties.

HIGH JURYMEN, a term at first applied to the Non-jurors, who at the Revolution in 1688 refused to acknowledge William III. as their lawful sovereign. In the present day the name is given to a party in the Church of England, who entertain high views of the authority of the church, the apostolical dignity of the clergy, and the efficacy of the sacraments when administered by a regularly ordained clergy. See ENGLAND (CHURCH OF).

HIGH PLACES. From the frequent mention which is made in the Old Testament of "high places," it is plain that from early times the tops of mountains and other elevated situations were selected by the heathen as suitable for their idolatrous observances. Hence we find the Israelites commanded, Dent. xii. 2, "Ye shall utterly destroy all the places wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods, upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree." And in Exod. xxxiv. 13, they are enjoined to quite pluck up all their high places. In consequence of the heathen custom of worshipping idols in high places, several of the Jewish kings are reproached for not taking away these high places, but, on the contrary, imitating the heathen by setting up images and groves on every high hill, and under every green tree, and burning incense in all the high places. We are not to understand, however, that there was any sin involved in the act of worshipping in high places, provided God alone was worshipped. On the contrary, we find, in the time of the Judges, mention made of Gideon building an altar, and offering a sacrifice to God on the top of a rock, and afterwards we are told that the tabernacle itself was removed to the high place that was at Gibeon. The building of the temple limited the place of sacrifice to Jerusalem, but throughout a long line of kings, both of Israel and Judah, there appears to have been an unhappy tendency, even in those who were zealous for God, to retain the idolatrous high places. Not until the reign of good King Josiah do we find the high places wholly removed, and the land utterly purged from idolatry. Before the tabernacle was first set up, says the Talmud, high places were permitted, and the service was performed by the first-born; but after the tabernacle was erected high places were prohibited, and the service was performed by the priesthood. The reason why the heathen imagined that their sacrifices were more acceptable to the gods when offered on the hills than in the valleys, is alleged by Lucian to have been because there men were nearer to the gods, and so the more readily obtained an audience.

HIGH-PRIEST, the head or chief of the Hebrew priesthood. This high dignitary was invested with great influence and authority, and enjoyed many peculiar privileges. He alone was permitted once a year to enter the Holy of Holies on the great day of atonement. He was the appointed judge in all religious matters, and, indeed, the final arbiter in all controversies. In later times he presided over the Sanhedrim, and held the next rank to the sovereign or prince. In the time of the Maccabees he united in his own person the offices of priest and king. Sometimes in the Old Testament he is called by way of eminence "the priest," as in Exod. xxix. 29, 30, "And the holy garments of Aaron shall be his sons' after him, to be anointed therein, and to be consecrated in them. And that son that is priest in his stead shall put them on seven days, when he cometh into the tabernacle of the congregation to minister in the holy place." The office was held for life, and was hereditary, but in New Testament times the high-priest, under Roman domination, held his office only for a time. Accordingly, we find, Matt. xxvi. 57, 58, the title high-priest given not only to the person who actually held the office, but also to individuals who had formerly been invested with the high-priesthood. When the high-priest from age was incapacitated for his duties, a sagan or substitute was appointed in his room.

In the law of Moses the office of the high-priesthood was vested in the family of Aaron, being appointed to descend hereditarily from the first born. The succession in the family of Aaron appears to have been regular during the existence of the first temple; but, according to the Talmud, the high-priests under the second temple purchased the office, and some say destroyed one another by witchcraft, so that it is alleged there were fourscore high-priests from the return of the Jews out of Babylon till the destruction of Jerusalem and the second temple, when the office of high-priest was abolished.

The ceremony of consecration to the high-priesthood was performed with great solemnity and splendour. It commenced, as in the case of all the priests, with ablution, which was performed with water brought from the sacred laver to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. On this occasion his whole body was washed in token of entire purification; and being once cleansed he had no occasion to do more, when he went to minister, than to wash his hands and his feet. After being washed, the high-priest was solemnly invested with the sacred garments, four of which were peculiar to himself, viz. the breast-plate, the ephod, the robe, and the plate of gold. The sacred garments were of the most gorgeous description, and the materials of which they were composed consisted exclusively of woollen or linen, nothing of hair or silk being used in their formation.

The next part of the ceremony of consecration was one peculiar to the high-priest, the anointing with sacred oil. This solemn rite is thus described by Mr. Lewis in his 'Hebrew Antiquities': "The ingredients of this oil were five hundred shekels of pure myrrh, and half so much of sweet cinnamon, two hundred and fifty shekels of sweet calamus, five hundred shekels of cassia, after the shekels of the sanctuary, and of oil olive a hin. The making up of these simples into the compound of the anointing oil was thus: The spices (except the myrrh, which was liquid) were bruised every one apart and by themselves, and then were they mingled, and boiled in clean water, till all their strength was come out into that decoction; which decoction strained, and having oil put to it, was again boiled to the height of an ointment, and so reserved. This anointing oil was only in use in the times of the tabernacle and the first temple; and whilst it continued the high-priests successively were anointed with it. The manner was thus: it was poured upon the top of his head, which was bare, and ran down his face upon his beard; and he that anointed him drew with his finger the figure of the Greek letter chi upon his forehead. The reason of the form of the letter chi, was to distinguish the anointing of the high-priest from that of their kings, who were anointed in the form of a circle or crown. The high-priest (the Jews say) was anointed by the Sanhedrim, and when the oil failed, he was clothed in the pontifical garments. If he were anointed, he was anointed daily seven days together; and if he were not (when the holy oil was gone) he was clothed with the eight vestments of the priesthood, every day, for seven days, and he was called the installed by the garments."

The last rite which was performed by the high-priest, on his consecration to office, consisted in the offering up of three sacrifices, namely, an offering for sin, a holocaust or whole burnt-offering, and a peace-offering. These sacrifices were repeated daily for seven days. There was also a meat-offering on such occasions, consisting of unleavened bread, unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil; all of which were put into one basket, and brought to the door of the tabernacle, to be presented there to God, along with the other sacrifices. All these ceremonies having been performed, Aaron and his sons were set apart to minister in holy things, which rites of initiation were always used before a high-priest could enter upon his office. But the sons of Aaron being once consecrated by Moses, their posterity were never after consecrated, because they succeeded to the priesthood by hereditary right.

A few of the peculiar privileges which belonged to the high-priest, are thus stated by Mr. Lewis: "To heighten the dignity of his office, he was obliged to marry a virgin, one who was not so much as espoused to any other person; nor was any sort of virgin thought fit to be his wife, but only one that was newly come out of her minority, and had not yet attained to her full puberty. This (the Hebrew doctors say) is to be understood of the high-priest after he was in his office; for if he had married a widow before (which was permitted to the common priests) he was to keep her, and not to put her away when he was advanced to the pontifical dignity. It was peculiar to the high-priest, that besides other women which no priests might marry, he alone was forbidden to marry a widow. In this law is prohibited not only a woman that had been married; but if she had been merely espoused, it was unlawful for the high-priest to take her for his wife. He was not allowed to marry the wife of his brother, to which others were obliged; nor a woman born of a person whom a high priest was forbidden to marry: as, if the high-priest had taken a widow, and had a daughter by her, that child might not be married, though a virgin, by a succeeding high priest; but he was to marry a virgin of Israel; and though he was not confined to his own tribe, yet she was to be nobly born, in order to preserve the dignity of his function. It is generally supposed that polygamy was not allowed to the high-priest, who was to have but one wife at a time, though other men were permitted to have more: if he took another, he was to give a bill of divorce to one of them before the great day of expiation, otherwise he was incapable to perform the offices of it; but if his wife died, it was not unlawful for him to marry again.

"The high priest was exempt from the common laws of mourning: he was not to let his hair grow neglected, which was a funeral ceremony, nor was he to rend his clothes; though the Talmudists will have it, as Cicero observes, that he might rend his garments at the bottom about his feet, but not at the top down to his breast. He was forbidden to go into the house where the body of his father or his mother lay dead, (which was permitted to the inferior priests) and consequently he was not to make any external signs of mourning for son or daughter, brother or sister. But before his anointing and consecration, and putting on the holy garments, it was not unlawful for him to attend the funeral of his father; and therefore Eleazar was present when Aaron died, being as yet in a lower ministry, and not completely advanced to the high-priesthood. If the high-priest was in the sanctuary when he heard of the death of his father or mother, he was not to stir from thence till he had finished his ministry; for he had a little house, after the temple was built, within the precincts of it, where he commonly remained all the day-time, which was called the parlour of the high-priest. At night he went to his own dwelling-house, which was at Jerusalem, and no where else. There he might perform all the offices of a mourner except uncovering his head, rending his clothes, or going into the house where the dead body was; and there the people came to comfort him; and sitting on the ground, while he sat in his chair, at the funeral feast, they said, Let us be thy expiation (that is, let all the grief that is upon thee fall upon us) to which he answered, Blessed be ye from heaven.

"There are other marks of honour bestowed by the Jews upon their high-priest. As all the lower priests were esteemed holy, he was always accounted the most holy. He was, says Maimonides, to excel the rest of his brethren in five perfections, in the comeliness of his body, in strength, in riches, in wisdom, and in a beautiful complexion; and if the heir of the high-priest had all the other accomplishments, and was not the most wealthy among his brethren, it was thought just that so great a personage should be made most rich by the contributions of the other priests. He was only second to the king; and as no person of mean descent or occupation could be advanced to the regal dignity, so neither could he into the high-priesthood: And some among the Jews go so far as to say, that the high priest was as valuable as the whole people of Israel. He was never to converse with the commonalty, or show himself naked to them; and therefore he was to avoid all public baths, and be cautious of going to feasts and entertainments, the better to secure the reverence due to the sanctity of his character. When he went abroad to those that were in mourning, he was always attended by other priests: he was to clip his hair twice a-week, but not to suffer a razor to come upon his head: he was to be every day in the sanctuary, and not to go to his house above twice in one day: he was not obliged to give testimony in any cases, but what related to the king, and in those he could not be forced but by the great sanhedrim: he was to have but one wife at one time. When he went into the temple, he was attended by three priests. He was not bound to sacrifice by lot, as the other priests were; but might do it as often as he pleased, and take whatever sacrifice he thought fit.

"But the greatest privilege and dignity of the high-priest consisted in his performing the most holy parts of Divine worship. He was the mediator, as it were, between God and the people, to appease the Divine anger, and to make atonement for the sins of the whole nation: he was obliged to offer a meat-offering every day at his own charges, half of it in the morning, and half at night, which was a distinct offering from that which attended the daily burnt-offerings: he alone was permitted to enter into the holy of holies, and that but once in a year, upon the day of expiation; and, upon great occasions, to enquire of God by Urim and Thummim."

The greatest of all the privileges of the high-priest was that of entering the most holy place, which was only permitted once a-year on the great day of expiation. See ATONEMENT (DAY OF). In this respect, and indeed in many others, the Jewish high-priest was an eminent type of our Lord Jesus Christ, who "offered himself up once for all a sacrifice for sin," who blesses his people, and "hath entered not into the holy place made with hands, which is a figure of the true, but into heaven itself, there to appear in the presence of God for us."

HHSI, the name given to the devil among the Finns. He is supposed to have his residence in the forests, whence he sends out diseases and calamities of every kind among men. He is described as having only three fingers on each hand, and as having these fingers armed with large nails, with which he tears in pieces all who fall into his power. See FINNS RELIGION OF.

HILARIA, a general term among the ancient

Romans, for days of feasting and rejoicing on any account whatever. It was usually applied, however, in a more restricted form, to denote a festival held on the 25th of March, in honour of Cybele, the mother of the gods. It seems to have been celebrated with games and amusements of every kind. Among other rites there was a solemn procession in which the statue of the goddess was borne along, preceded by specimens of plate and other works of art provided by the wealthy Romans for the occasion.

HILLEL (SCHOOL OF), one of the most eminent of the Jewish academies for giving instruction in the Law of Moses. It was founded by Hillel, a famous Jewish doctor, who was surnamed the Babylonian, because he was a native of Babylon. Thirty years before the birth of Christ, this distinguished Rabbi arrived at Jerusalem, and was consulted about the celebration of the passover, which fell that year upon a Saturday. His answer was so satisfactory, that they elected him patriarch of the nation, and his posterity succeeded him down to the fifth century, when the patriarchs of Judea were abolished. Hillel was forty years of age when he left Babylon, and having devoted himself to the study of the law, he was elected patriarch at the age of eighty, and also head of the sanhedrim. The Jews allege, that like Moses, to whom they often compare him, he lived to the advanced age of one hundred and twenty years. Hillel was the disciple of Schammai, and differing in opinion from his master, he set up a rival school; and so violent was the opposition of the disciples of Hillel to those of Schammai, that a bloody contention ensued, in the course of which several of the combatants were slain. The quarrel, however, was brought to a close, by the declaration of the BATUKOL (which see), in favour of the superiority of the school of Hillel. The Jews blame Schammai, and highly extol Hillel, who they say was so much esteemed as a teacher, that he had no fewer than a thousand scholars. Eighty of his disciples rose to great distinction, for the Jewish writers allege, that thirty of them were worthy of having the glory of God resting upon them as it did upon Moses; thirty who, like Joshua, were able to stop the course of the sun; and the other twenty, little inferior to the first, but superior to the second.

HINA, a goddess among the New Zealanders, who is regarded as the spouse of Mawi, the supreme god, and by whose two sons the world is believed to have been peopled.

HINDUISM, the prevailing religion of Hindustan, professed by 150,000,000 of people. It has been a favourite idea with some Orientalists, that the system of religion which is termed Brahmanism or Hinduism is of very remote antiquity, long before the days of Moses. Niebuhr, however, has clearly shown that Hindu civilization is of comparatively recent origin, not dating long before the conquests of Alexander the Great. And this latter view is fully borne out by the remnants of the primitive inhabitants, which are still to be found in the hill country, beyond the borders of the cultivated plains. These hill and forest tribes are diminutive in stature, with small eyes and flat noses. They have no caste, and no idols, although they have various superstitions practices. These aboriginal or non-Aryan tribes, have evidently been compelled to take refuge in the woods and fastnesses from the incursions of the Hindus or Aryans, as they call themselves. In the Vedas all who withstood the onward march of the men of Aryan, are termed Dasyus, and are said to perform no religious rites. They are also termed "those who do not tend the fire," and "fail to worship Agni." Another appellation by which the Vedas describe them is "flesh eaters," and in accordance with this name, it is a well known fact that the Bhils, who are the most numerous and important of all the aboriginal tribes, eat the flesh not only of buffaloes, but also of cows, when it can be obtained, a peculiarity which more perhaps than any other marks them out as entirely separate and distinct from the Hindus, with whom the cow is an animal of special sacredness. The following points of distinction between the aborigines and their Aryan conquerors are stated by General Briggs in the Journal of the Asiatic Society:

1. Hindus are divided into castes.
The aborigines have no such distinctions.
2. Hindu widows are forbidden to marry.
The widows of the aborigines not only do so, but usually with the younger brother of the late husband—a practice they follow in common with the Scythian tribes.
3. The Hindus venerate the cow and abstain from eating beef.
The aborigines feed alike on all flesh.
4. The Hindus abstain from the use of fermented liquors.
The aborigines drink to excess; and conceive no ceremony, civil or religious, complete without.
5. The Hindus partake of food prepared only by those of their own caste.
The aborigines partake of food prepared by any one.
6. The Hindus abhor the spilling of blood.
The aborigines conceive no religious or domestic ceremony complete without the spilling of blood and offering up a live victim.
7. The Hindus have a Brahmanical priesthood.
The indigenes do not venerate Brahmins. Their own priests (who are self-created) are respected according to their mode of life and their skill in magic and sorcery, in divining future events and in curing diseases: these are the qualifications which authorise their employment in slaying sacrificial victims and in distributing them.
8. The Hindus burn their dead.
The aborigines bury their dead, and with them their arms, sometimes their cattle, as among the Scythians. On such occasions a victim ought to be sacrificed to atone for the sins of the deceased.

9. The Hindu civil institutions are all municipal. The aboriginal institutions are all patriarchal.

10. The Hindus have their courts of justice composed of equals.

The aborigines have theirs composed of heads of tribes or families, and chosen for life.

11. The Hindus brought with them more than three thousand years ago, the art of writing and science.

The indigenes are not only illiterate, but it is forbidden for the Hindus to teach them."

The aboriginal tribes of Hindustan, as far as they have yet been examined, are generally supposed to be of a Mongolian type, and to have come from the northern parts of the country, probably at a remote period having inhabited some part of the regions of Central Asia. The best account of the religion of the different non-Aryan tribes is to be found in a memoir furnished to the Journal of the Asiatic Society by Major Macpherson, under the title of 'An Account of the Religion of the Khonds in Orissa.' The chief object of their worship is stated to be the Earth-god, under the name of BERA-PENNE (which see), to whom they offer human sacrifices annually, in the hope of thereby obtaining success in their agricultural operations. See KHONDS (RELIGION or). But in addition to the aborigines who inhabit Northern India, such as the Bhils, the Mirs, the Klulis, the Khonds, there has always been a large body of Nishadas or non-Aryan tribes in the southern part of the Peninsula. Mr. Caldwell, in his 'Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian or South Indian family of Languages,' thus describes the religious character of these aborigines of the south: "The system which prevails in the forests and mountain-fastnesses throughout the Dravidian territories, and also in the extreme south of the Peninsula amongst the low caste tribes, and which appears to have been still more widely prevalent at an early period, is a system of demonolatry, or the worship of evil spirits by means of bloody sacrifices and frantic dances. This system was introduced within the historical period from the Tamil country into Ceylon, where it is now mixed up with Buddhism. On comparing this Dravidian system of demonolatry and sorcery with 'Shamanism'—the superstition which prevails amongst the Ugrian races of Siberia and the hill-tribes on the south western frontier of China, which is still mixed up with the Buddhism of the Mongols, and which was the old religion of the whole Tatar race before Buddhism and Mohammedanism were disseminated amongst them—we cannot avoid the conclusion that these two superstitions, though practised by races so widely separated, are not only similar but identical."

But while the native tribes of Hindustan occupy the forests and the hills, the whole of the open country or plains of the Ganges intervening between the Himalaya mountains and the Vindhya hills, is occupied by the Hindu or Aryan races, who, at a remote period, seem to have crossed the Indian Alps, and been diffused over the Panjab, ultimately overrunning the whole Peninsula.

The religion of the Hindus, as it now presents itself in the system of Brahmanism, differs essentially from the religion of the same people in its more ancient form, as it is found in the Vedas. These sacred books, which are of great antiquity, are four in number, and are denominated the Rig-Vêda, the Yajur-Vêda, the Sama-Vêda, and the Atharva-Vêda. The four Vêdas were formerly supposed to be of equal antiquity, but now it is ascertained that whilst the hymns of which the Rig-Vêda consists, rank "as amongst the oldest extant records of the ancient world," the Sama-Vêda merely gives extracts from these hymns arranged for worship, the Yajur-Vêda contains hymns of later date, mixed with repetitions of the early specimens, and the Atharva-Vêda is a much later compilation consisting of formularies required on certain rare occasions. The Rig Vêda, which is the earliest of these collections of sacred hymns, is believed to have been written B.C. 1200, or B.C. 1400. It contains 1,017 mantras or prayers, about one-half of which are addressed to Indra the god of light, or Hindu Jupiter, or Agni the god of fire, or rather perhaps fire itself, viewed partly as a vivifying principle of vegetation, and partly as a destructive agent. The next divinity, which in the view of some Orientalists completes the triad of the Vaidic system, is Varuna the god of water. Thus the Hindu religion of this early period seems to have been a system of worship addressed to natural phenomena, the light, the fire, the water; and must therefore have partaken of a pantheistic character. The elements were deified, and the very sacrifices they offered were converted into gods. Thus the hymns comprising one entire section of the Rig Vêda are addressed to SOMA (which see), the milky juice of the moon plant (asclepias acida), which was a libation offered to the gods, and without a draught of which even they could not be immortal.

The language in which the Vêdas are written is the Sanskrit, which the Hindus seriously believe to be the language of the gods, and to have been communicated to men by a voice from heaven; while the Vêdas themselves have proceeded from the mouth of the Creator. But the Shastras or sacred writings of the Hindus are not limited to the four Vêdas: besides these, there are four Upa-Vêdas or Sub-Scriptures; six Ved-angas or bodies of learning; and four Upanishads or appended bodies of learning, forming in all an immense mass of secular and sacred lore, such as any single individual would in vain attempt even cursorily to peruse, much less fully to master.

At the foundation of the complicated system of Hinduism in its present form, lies the existence of one great universal self-existing Spirit, who is denominated BRAHM (which see). It is one grand peculiarity of this the Supreme God of India, that while all natural attributes are ascribed to him in infinite perfection, he is not alleged to possess a single moral attribute. And even his natural attributes, though they may be momentarily exercised for the purpose of manifesting the universe, they are speedily recalled and reabsorbed into his mysterious essence. Hence throughout all India, there are neither temples, nor sacred rites, nor acts of worship in honour of Brahm. The excuse given for this strange state of matters is, that "the representing the Supreme Being by images, or the honouring him by the institution of sacred rites, and the erection of temples, must be perfectly incompatible with every conceivable notion of an all-pervading, immaterial, incorporeal spirit." Such an excuse would undoubtedly be valid, in so far as an outward image is concerned, but has no force whatever when applied to the spiritual worship of an intelligent creature.

The Trinity or Hindu Trinity.

See Plate II.

In the creed of the Hindus, Brahm alone exists; all else is illusory. How then is creation on such a system to be accomplished? The mode in which the universe sprang into existence is thus sketched by Mr. Hardwick in his 'Christ and other Masters': "Alone, supreme, and unapproachable, a feeling of dissatisfaction with Himself had crossed the mind of the Great Solitary. He longed for offspring, and at length determined to resolve the primitive simplicity of His essence, and transform Himself into a world which might contrast with His eternal quietude. From this desire of God has sprung whatever is, or is to be: the earth, the sky, the rock, the flower, the forest, the innumerable tribes of gods and men, of beasts and demons,—these, so far as they possess a true existence, are all consubstantial with divinity. The basis underlying all the forms which they assume is the Ineffable, the Uncreated. God may be regarded as the undeveloped world, the world as the development of God. He is both the fountain and the stream, the cause and the effect, the one Creator and the one creation. 'As the spider spins and gathers back [its thread]; as plants sprout on the earth; as hairs grow on a living person; so is this universe here, produced from the imperishable nature. By contemplation the vast one germinates; from him food [or, body] is produced; and thence, successively, breath, mind, real [elements], worlds and immortality arising from [good] deeds.' Expressions of this kind had not unnaturally suggested to some minds the inference that the pantheism of ancient India was simple and materialistic: but a further insight into the philosophy, at least so far as it appears in monuments of the Bráhmánic age, will prove such inferences to be erroneous. We may not, indeed, be able to decide with confidence respecting the complexion of the earliest Hindu metaphysics, since the Védas, notwithstanding the ingenuity of their commentators, will be found to have contained a very slender metaphysical element: but as soon as ever an attempt was made to bring the ruder superstitions of their forefathers into harmony with more refined conceptions of the Godhead, the whole tone of Hindu pantheism is subtilized, to the extent of questioning the reality of the material world itself. All forms assumed by matter are then held to be not only transient but illusive. The semblance of reality which they possess is due to Máyá,—the personification of God's fruitless longing for some being other than His own,—the power, by which, in different words, the Absolute had been Himself beguiled from His original quietude. But while matter is thus held to be essentially non-existent, that which underlies and animates the whole of the phenomenal universe is one with the Divinity, who, by a species of self-analysis, has brought Himself under the conditions of the finite and the temporal, and must in future so continue till the visible is ultimately reabsorbed by the invisible, and multiplicity reduced afresh to simple unity."

Thus it is that, according to Hinduism, every object in the universe, nay, the soul of man himself, is nothing more than an illusory manifestation of the essence of Brahm. But in all cosmological speculations the difficulty is apt to start itself, how spirit can exert energy at all; and more especially how it can operate directly upon matter. It was conceived, therefore, that in order to put forth his energy, Brahm must assume a form, or the appearance of a form. Under this assumed personal form he drew forth in some ineffable manner from his own impersonal essence three distinct beings or hypostases, which became invested with corporeal forms. This is the celebrated Hindu Triad or Trimurti,—Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. To these three beings were intrusted the arrangement and government of the universe after Brahm had relapsed into his proper state of profound sleep and unconsciousness.

The creation of the universe is accounted for in the Hindu Sâstras by the production of the Mundane Egg, from which the whole universe sprang forth in perfected form. To produce the egg, Brahma is represented as having assumed a new and peculiar form, in which he is usually called Parush, or the primeval male; while his divine energy separated from his essence is personified, under a female form named Prakriti or Nature. From the combination of Parush and Prakriti proceeded the Mundane Egg. See CREATION. Thus the elements of universal nature came into being, consisting of fourteen worlds; seven inferior, or below the world which we inhabit; and seven superior, consisting—with the exception of our own which is the first—of immense tracts of space, bestudded with glorious luminaries and habitations of the gods.

But the worlds having thus been educed from the Mundane Egg, the question arises, who is the maker of the different orders of being who are to inhabit the worlds. This office is exclusively assigned to BRAHMA (which see), the first person of the Hindu

Triad, who is accordingly styled the Creator. From him also proceeded by emanation or eduction the four castes into which the Hindus believe mankind to be divided. From his mouth came the highest or Brahman caste; from his arm the Kshattriya or military caste; from his breast the Vaishya or productive caste; and from his foot the Shudra or servile caste. The life of Brahma measures the duration of the universe, and is believed to extend to three hundred billions of common years; and as a partial destruction or disorganization of the ten lower worlds recurs at the close of every kalpa or day of Brahma, there are understood, according to this system, to be thirty-six thousand partial destructions or disorganizations of the larger half of the universe, and as many reconstructions of it during the period of its duration. And when the life of Brahma shall have terminated, there will be no longer a partial destruction, but an utter annihilation of the universe called a Maha Pralaya, and Brahm alone will exist. "Thus," to use the language of Dr. Duff, "there has been, according to the Hindu Shastras, an alternating succession of manifestations and annihilations of the universe, at intervals of inconceivable length, throughout the measureless ages of a past eternity;—and there will be the same alternate never-ending succession of manifestations and annihilations throughout the boundless ages of the eternity that is to come."

The Hindus believe in the doctrine of transmigration, holding that every human soul in order to expiate its guilt passes through millions and millions more of different bodily forms throughout the whole duration of the present universe. To this arrangement, however, there is an exception, the superior gods not being subject to undergo these numberless changes, but enjoying the highest happiness attainable apart from absorption through the whole of Brahma's life. It is the earnest desire, accordingly, of every Hindu that he may rise a grade higher in the next birth, and thus attain one step in advance towards ultimate deliverance. A higher species of future bliss set before the devotee of Brahmanism, is the enjoyment of carnal delights in the heaven of one or other of the superior gods. But the last and highest kind of future bliss consists in the absorption of the soul into the essence of Brahm. See ABSORPTION. This is the consummation of felicity, for the soul once absorbed is not liable to any further transmigration. But while there is thus a graduated scale of future rewards for the righteous, there is also a graduated scale of future punishments for the wicked. Thus an individual may by his evil deeds in this life incur a degraded position in the next birth; or if more wicked, he may be sent down to one or other of innumerable hells, to reappear, however, on earth in mineral, animal, and vegetable forms before he rises to the human; or if a peculiarly heinous transgressor, he may be consigned to perdition until the dissolution of all things.

Now to attain each of the three distinct kinds of future bliss, and escape the three distinct kinds of future punishment, there are three equally distinct paths marked out in the sacred books of the Hindus. To secure advance in the next birth, all the necessary duties peculiar to caste must be carefully discharged; and the ordinary practices and ceremonies of religion must be diligently observed. To obtain an entrance into the paradise of one of the superior gods, there must be the performance of some extraordinary services to the deities, or some acts of extraordinary merit. But to render a man worthy of absorption into Brahm, he must adopt peculiar austerity in his mode of life; he must apply himself sedulously to divine knowledge; and above all, he must give himself up to pure and intense meditation on the Eternal Spirit. It is in the power of the three higher castes to reach any one of the kinds of bliss set before the Hindu; but the Sudra must limit his ambition in either of the inferior kinds of bliss, and when he has attained this primary object in a future birth, he may then aspire to the highest beatitude—final absorption in Brahm.

The gods of Hinduism are almost numberless, and hence the immense variety of sects in India, each deriving its denomination from the name of its favourite divinity. At the head of this immense pantheon must be placed the members of the Hindu Triad, who, of course, attract the greatest number of votaries and the largest amount of reverence. It is not a little remarkable, that though Brahma occupies the first position among the Sacred Three, and might be supposed, as the Creator, to call forth the special homage of the creature, the active worship of this deity has almost completely fallen into desuetude among the people generally. He is still worshipped by one class, the Brahmans, at sunrise every morning, when they repeat an incantation containing a description of his image, and as an act of worship present him with a single flower; but as Mr. Elphinstone informs us, he was never much worshipped, and has now but one temple in India. Vishnu and Shiva, however, with their consorts, have always secured the greatest amount of practical homage, and their sects are more numerous than any other of the sects of India. Professor Horace Wilson says, that the representatives of these two superior deities have in course of time borne away the palm from the prototypes, and that Krishna, Rama, or the Lingam, are almost the only forms under which Vishnu and Shiva are now adored in most parts of India.

The worshippers of the Sakti, the power or energy of the divine nature in action, are exceedingly numerous among all classes of Hindus. It has been computed that of the Hindus of Bengal, at least three-fourths are of this sect; of the remaining fourth, three parts are Vaishnavas, and one Saivas. When the worshippers of Sakti incline towards the adoration of Vishnu, the personified Sakti is termed Laksh- mī or Maha Lakshmi; but when they incline towards the adoration of Shiva, the personified Sakti is termed Parvati, Bhavani or Durga. The bride of Shiva, in one or other of her many and varied forms, is one of the most popular emblems in Bengal and along the Ganges. The chief ceremony of initiation in all Hindu sects is the communication by the teacher to the disciple, of the Mantra, which generally consists of the name of some deity, or a short address to him; it is communicated in a whisper, and never lightly revealed to the uninitiated. Another distinction amongst sects, but merely of a civil character, is the term or terms with which the religious members salute each other when they meet, or in which they are addressed by the lay members. But the usual mode of discriminating one sect from another is by various fantastic streaks on the face, breast, and arms. For this purpose all the Vaishnava sects employ a white earth called gopichandana, which, to be of the purest description, should be brought from Dwārakā, being said to be the soil of a pool in that place where the Gopis drowned themselves when they heard of Krishna's death. The common gopichandana, however, is nothing but a magnesia or calcareous clay.

The worship of Shiva appears to be the most prevalent and popular of all the modes of adoration, if we may judge from the number of shrines dedicated to the only form under which Shiva is revered, that of the Lingam; yet these temples are scarcely ever the resort of numerous votaries, and are regarded with comparatively little veneration by the Hindus. Benares, however, forms an exception, and the temple of Visweswara, "the Lord of all," an epithet of Shiva, represented as usual by a Lingam, is thronged with a never-ceasing crowd of worshippers. "The adoration of Shiva indeed," as Professor H. H. Wilson remarks, "has never assumed, in upper India, a popular form. He appears in his shrines only in an unattractive and rude emblem, the mystic purpose of which is little understood, or regarded by the uninitiated and vulgar, and which offers nothing to interest the feelings or excite the imagination. No legends are recorded of this deity of a poetic and pleasing character; and above all, such legends as are narrated in the Puranas and Tantras have not been presented to the Hindus in any accessible shape. The Saivas have no works in any of the common dialects, like the Rāmāyana, the Bārta, or the Bhakti Mālā. Indeed, as far as any inquiry has yet been instituted, no work whatever exists, in any vernacular dialect, in which the actions of Siva, in any of his forms, are celebrated. It must be kept in mind, however, that these observations are intended to apply only to Gangetic Hindustan, for in the south of India popular legends relating to local manifestations of Siva are not uncommon. Corresponding to the absence of multiplied forms of this divinity, as objects of worship, and to the want of those works which attach importance to particular manifestations of the favourite god, the people can scarcely be said to be divided into different sects, any farther than as they may have certain religious mendicants for their spiritual guides. Actual divisions of the worshippers of Siva are almost restricted to these religious personages, collected sometimes in opulent and numerous associations; but for the greater part detached, few, and indigent."

The course of worship among the Hindus consists in circumambulating the temple, keeping the right hand to it, as often as the devotee pleases: the worshipper then enters the vestibule, and if a bell is suspended there, as is commonly the case, he strikes two or three times upon it. He then advances to the threshold of the shrine, presents his offering, which the officiating Brahman receives, mutters inaudibly a short prayer, accompanied with prostration, or simply with the act of lifting the hands to the forehead, and then departs. There is nothing like a religious service, and the hurried manner in which the whole is performed, the quick succession of worshippers, the gloomy aspect of the shrine, and the scattering about of water, oil, and faded flowers, inspire anything but feelings of reverence and devotion.

Besides the usual forms of religious homage and rites of worship, there are other acts which, according to the religion of the Hindu, possess such extraordinary merit as to entitle the performer to an entrance into one or other of the heavens of the gods. Some of the most prominent of these are thus enumerated by Dr. Duff: "Fasting, frequent, long-continued, and accompanied by various meditative exercises:—the presenting of gifts to the Brahmans, such as a valuable piece of land, cows, horses, or elephants, large sums of silver or of gold, houses well stored with food, clothes, and utensils:—the honouring of Brahmans with feasts, which are replenished with all manner of rare delicacies and expensive luxuries: readings and recitations of portions of the Mahabharat and other Shastras, on auspicious days; and rehearsals for weeks or months together of those legends which embody the histories of their gods, accompanied with dancing and wavings of brushes, and the jinglings of rings, and the noises of instrumental music:—the digging of public wells, or tanks, or pools of water 'to quench the thirst of mankind;' the building of public ghâts or flights of steps along the banks of rivers, to assist the faithful in their ablutions; the planting and consecrating of trees to afford a shade, and of groves to furnish refreshment to holy pilgrims; the repairing of old temples, or the erecting of new, in honour of the gods:—long and arduous pilgrimages to the confluence of sacred streams,—to spots that have been immortalized by the exploits of gods or the penances of holy sages,—or to shrines where the presence of some divinity may be more than ordinarily realized, and his favours and blessings with more than wonted affluence bestowed. Besides these, and others too telious to be recounted, must be specially noted the manifold practices of self-murder. Certain moles of voluntary religious suicide some of the Shastras distinctly recommend, annexing thereto promises of a heavenly recompense. To the modes thus divinely appointed the fervent but blind and perverse zeal of deluded votaries has not been slow in adding many more to testify the intensity of their devotion. Hence it is that numbers annually throw themselves over precipices and are dashed to pieces, or cast themselves into sacred rivers and are drowned,—or bury themselves alive in graves which may have been dug by their nearest kindred. All these, and other modes of self-murder, are practised with the distinct expectation of earning an entrance into heaven. But the most celebrated of them all is the rite of Sati or Suttee."

The primitive form of Hinduism was, as we have seen, the religion of the Vedas, dating somewhere about B.C. 1400. At length philosophers appeared who avowed themselves not only critics, but opponents of the doctrines of these ancient sacred books. Three systems arose, the Sankhya, the Nyaya, and the Vedanta; and each system being divided into two parts, six schools of philosophy were formed somewhere between B.C. 700 and B.C. 600, which systems are, even at this day, taught at Benares. The earliest of these systems is undoubtedly the Sankhya, which is attributed to the sage Kapila as its author; but the precise date of any one of the three it is impossible to discover. One thing, however, is certain, that they gradually succeeded in destroying the credit and authority of the Vedas. At length, while Brahmanism was still struggling with the metaphysical schools which were dividing the public mind, Buddha appeared, regarding it as the great object of his mission to overturn the ancient religion of the Hindus. A contest now commenced between Buddhism and Brahmanism, which lasted for a long period. For seven or eight centuries after the Christian era, Buddhists were in turn patronised, neglected, and persecuted by the kings of India. When driven from the Ganges they fled to Nepal, or sought refuge among the hills of the Dekkan.

"We first hear of Siva worship," says Mrs. Speir, in her recent work, entitled 'Life in Ancient India,' "about B.C. 300, some centuries after the first promulgation of Buddhism, but before Buddhism had become the court religion. At that time Alexander the Great was dead; Seleucus held Bactria and Babylon, and his ambassador Megasthenes dwelt with Hindu Rulers at Patna, on the Ganges. Brahmanical philosophy had before this time made war upon the Vedas; Rain and Fire worship had become obsolete, and Sacrifice typical; the Greeks were not therefore likely to see Soma-festivals, or to hear of offerings to Indra and Agni; and as the philosophic Brahmins reserved their religious doctrine for the privileged few, the only obvious religions were those of the populace, which Megasthenes describes as Siva worship on the hills and Vaishnava worship in the plains. The first was, he says, celebrated in tumultuous festivals, the worshippers anointing their bodies, wearing crowns of flowers and sounding bells and cymbals. From this the Greeks conjecture that Siva worship must be derived from Bacchus or Dionysus, and have been carried to the East in the traditionary expedition which Bacchus made in company with Hercules. This view was confirmed by finding that the wild vine grew in some of the very districts where this worship flourished. But these conjectures are treated by Professor Lassen as pure invention, and all that he accepts from the observations of Megasthenes is, that Siva worship was prevalent in the hills of India previous to the reign of Chandragupta.

"For a time the Brahmins resisted this innovation, and refused their patronage both to Siva and his worshippers; but the popular current was too strong for their virtue, it swept away their breakwaters, and left them in danger of unimportance and neglect. Then perceiving their selfish errors, and looking for a selfish remedy, the old Brahmins resolved to consecrate the people's harbours, or, in other words, to adopt the people's gods. Unable to stand like Moses, firmly promulgating a law which they declared Divine, they took the part of Aaron and presided over worship to the Golden Calf. From this era the morality and grandeur of ancient Brahmanism degenerated."

From the Chinese we learn that Buddhism was patronized in Central India so late as A.D. 645; but in the course of the seventh century it seems to have gradually disappeared, and Sivaism to have taken its place as the favourite worship of the Brahmins, and Shiva as the presiding deity of their order. To this day the greater number of sacred castes, particularly those who practise the rites of the Vedas, or who profess the study of the Shastras, receive Shiva as their tutelary deity, wear his insignia, and worship the Lingam either in temples, in their houses, or on the side of a sacred stream, providing in the latter case Lingams kneaded out of the mud or clay of the river's bed. The worship of the god Vishnu now began to prevail. He had been mentioned in the Rig-Veda, but merely as an inferior divinity. The publication of the Bhagavat-Gita, which is generally dated about the seventh or eighth century, made Vishnu a prominent god, styling him even the Supreme Deity, from whom all things have issued, and into whom all things shall be absorbed. For a time the religions of the Vaishnava and of the Shiva sects contended for the mastery. The two parties split up into numberless little sects, worshipping either the one deity or the other, in some one of his varied forms, or perhaps his consort, under one or other of her varied appellations. What has been the effect of the cumbrous and complicated system of idolatry which now constitutes Hinduism is seen in the degraded, debased, and immoral condition into which the whole Hindu population is plunged. Such is, indeed, the natural result of their religion. "It matters not," Professor Horace Wilson truly remarks, "how atrocious a sinner may be, if he paints his face, his breast, his arms, with certain sectarian marks; or, which is better, if he brands his skin permanently with them with a hot iron stamp; if he is constantly chanting hymns in honour of Vishnú; or, what is equally efficacious, if he spends hours in the simple reiteration of his name or names; if he die with the word Hari, or Ráma, or Krishnú, on his lips, and the thought of him in his mind, he may have lived a monster of iniquity,—he is certain of heaven."

During the last half century much has been done to ameliorate the condition of the Hindus. Missions have been established throughout almost every part of India; somewhere about 200 stations and 400 missionaries are scattered over the entire Peninsula; and from the indirect, as well as the direct influence of Christianity, a decided improvement has been effected in the general aspect and condition of the country. The Marquis of Hastings, who went to India in 1813 as governor-general, was the first to lend the influence of government to the cause of civilization among the natives. He gave every encouragement, private and public, to schools and colleges. Under his auspices the Calcutta School Society, the School Book Society, the Hindu College, and other institutions sprung into being. He also abolished the censorship of the press. Lord Bentinck abolished the Suttee throughout the British possessions of India, and Lord Hardinge made great, and in various instances, successful exertions to have it abolished in the dominions of the native princes not under British rule. Infanticide has been very extensively suppressed. The Phansisagars or Thugs, with whom it was a religious duty to murder and plunder, have been nearly, if not entirely, rooted out. A stop has been put in a good degree to the Meriah sacrifices in the extensive hill-tracts of Orissa. The law which declares that a native shall forfeit his paternal inheritance, by becoming a Christian, has been abrogated. Caste, the greatest obstacle to the spread of Christianity in India, has, in some degree, been put down. The marriage of Hindu widows has been sanctioned. In the courts the practice of swearing is in some places changed, the Bible being substituted for the water of the Ganges; or the witnesses only required to make a declaration that they speak the truth. Above all, the preaching of the gospel extensively, both by European and native missionaries, and the establishment of schools for the instruction of the young in general knowledge, and the elements of pure Bible Christianity, have done much to undermine and prepare for the final overthrow of the gigantic fabric of Hinduism. No doubt the recent insurrection in the North-western parts of India has put a temporary arrest on the progress of missions in that quarter; but when the cloud which now darkens the horizon of India shall have passed away; when this fierce outbreak of Mohammedan ambition and Brahmanical jealousy shall have been suppressed, the work of missions will be resumed with redoubled zeal and energy, and Christianity will at length, by God's blessing, cover the whole peninsula of Hindustan from the Himalaya mountains to Cape Comorin.

HINNOM (VALLEY OF), a noted valley situated on the south of Jerusalem, where the apostate Israelites celebrated the horrid rites of MOLoch (which see), often accompanied with human sacrifices. This valley is rather more than half-a-mile long, about fifty yards broad, and twenty deep. By the Old Testament prophets it is sometimes called Tophet, from the tabrets, in Hebrew toph, with which the cries of the victims were drowned. After the Babylonian captivity, when the Jews had renounced their love of idolatry, they held Hinnom in abhorrence, casting into it the carcasses of dead animals and the bodies of malefactors; lighting up fires in the valley to consume the offal. Hence Gehenna came to signify the place of final torment.

HIPPOCAMPUS, the mythical sea-horse of the ancient classical mythology. It was believed to be a kind of marine deity, half horse, half fish, and employed in the service of Poseidon of the Greeks or Neptunus of the Romans.

HIPPOCENTAUR. See CENTAURS.

HIPPOCRATIA, a festival held by the Arcadians in honour of Poseidon, in course of which it was customary to lead horses and mules gaily caparisoned in procession. It is supposed to have corresponded to the CONSUALIA (which see) of the Romans.

HIPPOLAITIS, a surname of Athena, under which she was worshipped at Hippola in Laconia.

HIPPONA, an ancient heathen deity worshipped by grooms who usually kept an image of this goddess in the stables that they might invoke her to bless the horses.

HIRSCHAU (CONGREGATION OF), a class of religious established by William, abbot of Hirschau, in the diocese of Spire in Germany. It was formed on the model of that of Clugny. (See CLUNIACENSIA.) Its founder died in 1091. The monks went by the name of the Hirschaugian monks.

HISAGUS, a river-god who decided the dispute between Athena and Poseidon about the possession of Athens.

HISTOPEDES, a name given to the ETNOMIANS (which see), a branch of the Arians, in the fourth century, because they immersed in baptism, as Epiphanius relates, with the heels upwards and the head downwards, baptizing, however, in this singular way, only the upper parts of the body as far as the breast.

HOAGNAM, a deity among the Chinese, who is believed to preside over the eyes.

HOBAL, an idol of the ancient Arabians, which was demolished by Mohammed after he had taken possession of Mecca. It was surrounded with three hundred and sixty smaller idols, each of them presiding over one day of the lunar year.

"HOC AGE" Lat. Do this, a form of words solemnly pronounced by a herald, when the ancient Romans were about to engage in a public sacrifice. It implied that the whole attention of the people was to be fixed on the sacred employment. Do this, as it were, and nothing else.

HO-CHANG, a name given in China to the priests of Fo or Budha. They strongly inculcate upon their followers the worship of Budha, the sacred books, and the priesthood, which are termed the three gems. See GEMS (THE THREE).

HODAMO, a priest of the Pagan inhabitants of the island of Socotra, on the coast of Africa, who worshipped the moon, and had temples called Mo-quamos, in which that luminary was adored. The Hodamo was annually chosen and presented with a staff and a cross as the emblems of his functions.

HODUR, a Scandinavian god, son of Odin. He is represented in the Edda as blind, and yet so strong that he slew Baldur by throwing at him the twig of a mistletoe, which pierced him through and through. Referring to this murder the Edda says of Hödur, "Both gods and men would be very glad if they never had occasion to pronounce his name, for they will long have cause to remember the deed perpetrated by his hand." See BALDUR.

HOFFMANISTS, the followers of Daniel Hoffman, professor first of logic, and afterwards of theology, in the university of Helmstadt in Germany. In the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century he taught that the light of reason, even as it is set forth in the writings of the most eminent philosophers, such as Plato and Aristotle, is injurious to religion; and, accordingly, he declared his decided opposition to all philosophical inquiry. This led to a keen controversy, in which Hoffman was joined by a number of ardent supporters. At length such was the heat and animosity manifested between the two parties, that the civil government found it necessary to interpose, and to refer the matter to arbitration, the result of which was, that Hoffman was called upon to recant, which accordingly he did, and thus escaped any further persecution.

HOFFMANNITES, a new sect of a mystic and apocalyptic character, which arose in 1854 among the Pietists in Württemberg. Their leader is Dr. Hoffmann of Ludwigsburg, son of the founder of the pietistic colony of Korinthal, and brother to the distinguished court-preacher at Berlin. He is described by Dr. Schaaf as a man of much talent, learning, and piety. He was elected in 1818 a member of the parliament of Frankfort in opposition to Dr. Strauss, the author of 'The Life of Jesus.' Dr. Hoffmann regards the church, in its present mixture with the world, as the modern Babylon lying in wait for destruction, dimly foreshadowed by the revolution of 1848, and he looks to the Holy Land as destined to be the scene of the gathering of God's own people to await the second coming of Christ. His friends made preparation for an emigration to Palestine, and we learn, on the authority of Dr. Schaaf, that they actually applied to the Sultan for a gift of that country, but of course without success. They formed great expectations from the Eastern war, but these have not as yet been realized.

HOG (THE SACRIFICE OF THE). The Jews were strictly prohibited from using the hog as food. The reason of this prohibition is supposed by Maimonides to have been the filthy feeling of the animal, and its wallowing in the mire; others trace it to the circumstance that the hog is a carnivorous animal, and others still believe that the flesh of the hog, when used as food, would have produced the leprosy, to which the inhabitants of the East have always been liable. But whatever might be the cause of its prohibition as an article of food, the hog has always been held in special abhorrence by the Jews. They were not allowed so much as to open one of these animals, to take out the fat and apply it to any use. In regard to this animal the Jews are so scrupulous, that they say they may not touch a hog when alive with one of their fingers, it being a proverbial saying among them, that ten measures of leprosy descending into the world, swine took to themselves nine of them, and the rest of the world one. It is a curious circumstance, and one which strikingly shows the ignorance which prevailed among the ancient Pagans as to the religion of the Jews, that Plutarch, in his writings, introduces one Callistratus saying, that the Jews refrained from eating the flesh of a hog out of the great respect in which they held that animal, because, by turning the ground with his muzzle, he had taught men husbandry. Such an assertion is unworthy of a writer so intelligent and generally well-informed as Plutarch undoubtedly was. The true reason probably why the Jews accounted the hog an abomination was, because of its use among some idolatrous nations. Not only, however, did the Hebrews abstain from the use of hog's flesh; the Egyptians, Arabians, Phœnicians, and other neighbouring nations also refrained from this kind of food. And yet from the frequency with which swine are seen painted on the monuments, these animals appear to have been reared in considerable numbers among the Egyptians; but for what purpose it is difficult even to conjecture. The Scythians would not sacrifice them, nor even rear them. At this day the Kalmuck Tartars will not feed these animals, though the Buddhist religion does not forbid them. Among the ancient Greeks and Romans hogs formed a frequent class of victims in their sacrifices, so that the Suocentrilla of the Romans, and the Tritton of the Greeks, consisting of a pig, a sheep, and an ox, were not unfrequently employed on sacred occasions. Thus in the regular and general lustration or purification of the whole Roman people, which took place at the end of every five years, this was the species of sacrifice which was offered in the Campus Martius, where the people assembled for the purpose. These, indeed, were the most common animal sacrifices at Rome. They were performed in all cases of a lustration, and the victims were carried around the thing to be lustrated, whether it was a city, a people, or a piece of land. In the arch of Constantine at Rome there is still seen a representation of the Suovetaurilia. It was a practice also among the Greeks and Romans to offer a hog in sacrifice to Ceres at the beginning of harvest, and another to Bacchus before they began to gather the vintage; because the animal is equally hostile to the growing corn and the loaded vineyard. It is possible that to this practice there may be an allusion in Isa. lxvi. 3, "He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol. Yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations."

The Hindus hold the hog in as great abhorrence as the Jews themselves do. In his third avatar or incarnation, Vishnu assumed the form of a hog. The Mohammedans, also, who have imbibed many Jewish prejudices and customs, abhor hogs, and look upon them as so unclean that they dare not touch them; and should they do so, even by chance, they become thereby polluted.

HOLY GHOST, the third Person in the blessed Trinity. He is also termed the HOLY SPIRIT, and believed by all Trinitarian Christians to be the same in substance with the Father and the Son, and equal to them in power and glory. This was the doctrine of the primitive Christian church, founded on numerous passages of the Holy Scriptures. Thus we find the Holy Ghost combined with the Father and the Son on a distinct footing of equality, or rather identity in the baptismal formula, Matt. xxviii. 19, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." And again, the name Holy Ghost is interchanged with that of God in Acts v. 3, 4, "But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land? Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God." Not only is the Holy Ghost thus termed God, but the Divine attributes are ascribed to him in various passages. Thus He is said to be omniscient, I Cor. ii. 10, 11. Omnipotent, Luke i. 35, where he is termed "the Power of the Highest;" Eternal, Heb. ix. 14. The works of God are ascribed also to the Holy Ghost; for example, creation, Gen. ii. 2; Job xxvi. 13; Ps. civ. 30. The Holy Ghost is joined with the Father and the Son in the apostolic blessing pronounced upon the Corinthian church, 2 Cor. xiii. 14, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen." He is stated also to be the author of all those extraordinary gifts which were communicated to the Church of Christ in the earliest period of her history, and to impart to the souls of men in all ages those regenerating and sanctifying influences which can alone fit them for serving God on earth, and enjoying him in heaven. From considerations such as these, the Holy Ghost is concluded to be a Divine Person, equal to the Father and the Son.

In the fourth century, when the church was agitated with the Arian controversy, various different opinions began to be expressed in regard to the nature and constitution of the Holy Ghost. The council of Nice, A. D. 325, had been silent on the subject. Lactantius, while he separated the Son from the Father after the manner of the Arians, confounded the Holy Spirit with the Son, as the Sabellians did. Some writers followed his example, while others ascribed a distinct personality to the Spirit, but asserted that he was subordinate to both the Father and the Son. The most prominent individual, however, in the fourth century, who denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, was the Semi-Arian Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who is said to have reasoned thus: "The Holy Spirit is either begotten or not begotten; if the latter, we have two uncreated beings, the Father and the Spirit; if begotten, he must be begotten either of the Father or of the Son: if of the Father, it follows that there are two Sons in the Trinity, and hence brothers; but if of the Son, we have a grandson of God." In opposition to this reasoning, Gregory of Nazianzum simply remarked, that not the idea of generation, but that of procession is to be applied to the Holy Spirit, according to John xv. 26, and that the procession of the Spirit is quite as incomprehensible as the generation of the Son.

The rise of the Macedonian heresy occasioned considerable discussion, and at length the general council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, influenced chiefly by Gregory of Nazianzum, decided the point as to the nature of the Spirit, not by applying the term Homousios, of the same substance, to the Spirit, as the Nicene council had done in the case of the controversy as to the nature of the Son, but simply by determining that he proceeded from the Father. It

It would appear that when the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed was formed, the most conflicting opinions were held by different divines, thus clearly calling for a definite deliverance of the church upon the subject. Gregory of Nazianzen gives a summary of the chief opinions in regard to the Holy Spirit at the time when the council of Constantinople was held: "Some of the wise men amongst us regard the Holy Spirit as an energy, others think that he is a creature, some again that he is God himself, and, lastly, there are some who do not know what opinion to adopt, from reverence, as they say, for the Sacred Scriptures, because they do not teach anything definite on this point." Eustathius of Sebaste belonged to this latter class. Eusebius of Casarea was the more willing to subordinate the Spirit to both the Father and the Son, the more he was disposed to admit the subordination of the Son to the Father. He thinks that the Spirit is the first of all rational beings, but belongs nevertheless to the Trinity. Hilary was satisfied that that, which searcheth the deep things of God, must be itself divine, though he could not find any passage in Scripture in which the name 'God' was given to the Holy Spirit. He also advises us not to be perplexed by the language of Scripture, in which both the Father and the Son are sometimes called Spirit. Cyrill of Jerusalem, too, endeavours to confine himself to the use of scriptural definitions on the nature of the Holy Spirit, though he distinctly separates him from all created beings, and regards him as an essential part of the Trinity." Basil, surnamed the Great, also, at the same period, published a treatise expressly on the subject of the Holy Spirit, in which he maintained that the name 'God' should be given to the Holy Spirit, and appealed, in support of this view, both to Scripture in general, and to the baptismal formula in particular. Without, however, laying much stress upon the name itself, he simply demanded that the Spirit, so far from being regarded as a creature, should be considered as inseparable from both the Father and the Son.

In so far as the particular heresy of Macedonius was concerned, the canons of the council of Constantinople were quite satisfactory. "The relation," says Hagenbach, in his 'History of Doctrines,' "of the Spirit to the Trinity in general had been determined, but the particular relation in which he stands to the Son and the Father separately, remained yet to be decided. Inasmuch as the formula declared, that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, without making any distinct mention of the Son, room was left for doubt, whether it denied the procession of the Spirit from the latter, or not. On the one hand, the assertion that the Spirit proceeds only from the Father, and not from the Son seemed to favour the notion, that the Son is subordinate to the Father; on the other, to maintain that he proceeds from both the Father and the Son, would be placing the Spirit in a still greater dependence, viz. on two persons instead of one. Thus the desire fully to establish the Divinity of the Son, would easily detract from the Divine nature of the Spirit; the wish, on the contrary, to prove the self-existence and independence of the Spirit, would tend to throw the importance of the Son into the shade. The Greek fathers, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, and others, asserted the procession of the Spirit from the Father, without distinctly denying that he also proceeds from the Son. Epiphanius, on the other hand, ascribed the origin of the Spirit to both the Father and the Son, with whom Marcellus of Ancyra agreed. But Theodore of Mopsuestia and Theodoret would not in any way admit that the Spirit owes his existence to the Son, and defended their opinion in opposition to Cyrill of Alexandria. The Latin fathers, on the contrary, and Augustine in particular, taught the procession of the Spirit from both the Father and the Son. This doctrine was so firmly established in the West, that at the third synod of Toledo (A.D. 589) the clause filiogue was added to the confession of faith adopted by the council of Constantinople, which afterwards led to the disruption between the Eastern and Western church."

The addition made by the Spanish church to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed, was afterwards adopted by the churches of France and Germany. The Eastern or Greek church refused to recognize the change, as, in their view, unwarranted and heretical (see FILIOQUE), and to this day, the question as to the single or double procession of the Holy Ghost is one of the main grounds of difference between the Greek church and the churches of the West. HOMA, a sacrifice to fire among the Hindus which the Brahmans alone have the privilege of performing. It is simply a fire kindled with a kind of consecrated wood, into the flames of which they cast a little boiled rice sprinkled with melted butter. This sacrifice is performed by the father of the novice at the initiation of a Brahman. When the fire has been consecrated, it is carried into a particular apartment of the house, where it is kept up day and night with great care, until the ceremony is ended. It would be considered a very inauspicious event if for want of attention, or by any accident, it should happen to go out.

HOMAGYRIUS, a surname of Zeus among the ancient Greeks, under which he was worshipped at Ægium, on the north-west coast of the Peloponnesus, where Agamemnon is said to have assembled the Greek chiefs for the purpose of deliberating about the Trojan war. It was under this name also that Zeus was worshipped as patronising the Achæan league.

HOMILIARIUM OF CHARLEMAGNE, a selection of sermons made by order of Charlemagne in the eighth century, in order to assist those clergymen, and they were numerous at that period, who were unable to compose their own sermons. At an earlier period, there had been prepared for this purpose selections from the discourses of the Fathers, and which the clergy were permitted to read in their churches. But these selections having been greatly corrupted through the ignorance of the age, the Emperor Charles directed an improved collection to be made by one of his clergy, Paul Warnefrid or Paulus Diaconus of the abbey of Montecassino. Thus by means of this Homiliarium, the sermons preached on Sundays and festival days were collected and arranged, and the order of biblical texts being observed which had been gradually formed in the Roman church from the time of Gregory the Great, that order came more generally into use, and a greater degree of uniformity in this respect was introduced. To extend the usefulness of the Homiliarium, several councils ordered its translation into different languages. The example of Charlemagne was speedily followed, and several Homiliaria appeared in the eighth and ninth centuries, all of them, however, in the Latin language. Otfrid of Weisenburg appears to have been the first who composed a Homiliarium in the German language.

HOMILIES (Gr. Homiliai, discourses), the name given in the ancient Christian church to the SERMONS (which see), or discourses which were delivered on the Lord's Day, and on festivals, for the instruction and edification of the people. All the homilies which have been preserved both by the Greek and Latin Fathers were composed by bishops.

HOMILIES (Book of), plain discourses drawn up at the Reformation, to be used in the churches in England "on any Sunday or holy-day when there is no sermon." The first book, which appeared in the reign of Edward the Sixth, is attributed chiefly to Archbishop Crammer, aided, as is generally supposed, by Ridley and Latimer. The second book appeared in 1562 in the reign of Elizabeth. It is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain precisely the authors of the discourses in either Book, and many members of the Church of England disapprove of some of the doctrines which they inculcate, such as the sacramental character of marriage, baptismal regeneration, and the real presence in the eucharist.

HOMINICOLÆ (Lat. man-worshippers), a term of reproach applied by the APOLLINARIANS (which see), and others to those who worshipped the God-man Christ Jesus.

HOMMES D'INTELLIGENCE (Fr. men of understanding), a sect which appeared in the Netherlands in the fifteenth century, headed by William of Hildesheim or Hildenissen, a Carmelite friar. They are thought by Mosheim to have been a branch of the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT (which see); for they asserted that a new law of the Holy Spirit and spiritual liberty was about to be announced. They taught various doctrines which tended no doubt to prepare the way for the Reformation. Thus they preached justification through the merits of Christ without the deeds of the law. They rejected priestly absolution, maintaining that Christ alone can forgive sins. They held that voluntary penances are not necessary to salvation, but true repentance and a change of heart. Along with the Brethren of the Free Spirit, they appear to have believed that the period of the old law was the time of the Father, the period of the new law the time of the Son, and the remaining period that of the Holy Ghost or Elias.

HOMIOUSIANS (Gr. homoios, similar, and ousia, substance or essence), a name sometimes applied to the high ARIANS (which see), on account of the opinion which they held in regard to the Person of the Son, maintaining that he was not of the same but of similar substance with the Father.

HOMOIOUSIANS (Gr. homos, together, and ousia, substance or essence), a name given to the orthodox or ATHANASIANS (which see), in the fourth century, because they held the Son to be of the same substance or consubstantial with the Father.

HOMUNCIONITES. See PHOTINIANS.

HONEY. The Jews were forbidden in Lev. ii. 11, to mingle honey in any burnt-offering made by fire; at the same time they were commanded to present the first-fruits of their honey, these being intended for the support of the priests, and not to be used in sacrifices. The Jewish doctors allege that the honey here referred to was not that which is produced by bees, but a sweet syrup procured from ripe dates. The reason why it was forbidden as an ingredient of the Jewish sacrifices is probably to be found in the circumstance that it was so used by the heathen. It was much employed in the preparation of ordinary beverages, both among the Greeks and Romans, and it also formed an ingredient in sacrifices to many of their gods, besides constituting an important part in offerings to the dead. At this day the Russians place near the grave a dish into which honey enters as an ingredient, and the Esthonians a clay vessel full of honeyed drink. Herodotus mentions it in describing the sacrifice of an ox to the Egyptian goddess Isis.

Among the early Christians, it was customary to give to the newly baptized a small portion of milk and honey, to signify, as Jerome and Tertullian allege, that they were now as children adopted into God's family. From the third council of Carthage it appears that this milk and honey had a peculiar consecration distinct from the eucharist. It is said in the canons of that council to be offered at the altar on a most solemn day, and there to have its proper benediction for the mystery of infants, that is for the baptized, who are considered to be new-born babes, in a spiritual sense.

HONOR, a personification of Honour, which was worshipped at Rome, having a temple dedicated to him outside the Colline gate. Caius Marius built a temple to this deity after his victory over the Cimbri and Tentones. Those who sacrificed to Honor rejoined to have their heads uncovered.

HONORINUS, the name by which Augustin describes the Roman god Honor (see preceding article).

HONOR CATHEDRA, an expression used in Spain in the sixth century, to denote the honorary acknowledgment which the bishops received in their parochial visitations.

HOOD, an ornamental fold that hangs down the back of a graduate in England to mark his degree. Formerly the different degrees were known in the universities by the colour and materials of the hood. By the canons of the Church of England, all ministers saying the public prayers, or ministering the sacraments, or other rites of the church, if they are graduates, shall wear upon their surplices at such times such hoods as by the orders of the universities are agreeable to their degrees.

HOPKINSIANS, or HOPKINSIAN CALVINISTS, the followers of the Rev. Samuel Hopkins, a North American divine, who was pastor of the first Congregational Church at Newport, Rhode Island, about A. D. 1770. Being a man of a somewhat metaphysical turn of mind, he was particularly partial to the writings of President Edwards, but instead of following closely in the steps of that eminent philosophical theologian, Dr. Hopkins struck out in some respects a path of his own, and in his 'System of Divinity,' which was published at Boston, New England, a short time after his death, has given forth sentiments on the most important points of Christian doctrine, that varied not only with the views of Edwards, but of orthodox divines in general. The peculiar opinions of Hopkins, however, have found considerable favour with some Christians, who, though not forming a separate sect or denomination, are called from their leader Hopkinsians, though they themselves prefer to be called Hopkinsian Calvinists.

At the foundation of this system of theology lies the notion that all virtue or true holiness consists in disinterested benevolence, and all sin in interested selfishness, the latter principle being in its whole nature, and in every degree of it, enmity against God, the enthroning of the creature, and the dethroning of the Creator. The distinction is not sufficiently kept in view in the writings of Hopkins between legitimate self-love and illegitimate selfishness. The former is an inherent part of our moral constitution, and its exercise is both lawful and necessary; the latter is the offspring of the fall, and in its very nature vicious and sinful. But the very existence of self-love as a part of our moral constitution, and the Divine sanction given to it in the command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," shows plainly that disinterested benevolence cannot be of the essence of human virtue. The goodness which the Bible commands, in so far at least as regards the second table of the law, consists not in total self-forgetfulness or self-extinction, but in a beautiful equipoise of love to self and to our neighbour. Neither, in so far as the first table of the law is concerned, can disinterested benevolence be said to be of the essence of human virtue, seeing the whole Christian scheme revealed to us in the Word of God, is so constructed as to establish the great moral principle arising out of the whole, "We love Him, because he first loved us." The fundamental principle then of Hopkinsianism as a moral system is obviously fallacious.

In this theological system, the distinction on which Edwards so much insists between natural and moral inability is firmly maintained, and it is clearly pointed out, that the inability of man to believe in Christ is wholly of a moral character, as Christ himself says to the Jews, "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." Unbelief, therefore, is not an infirmity, but a crime. In this point the Hopkinsians are correct. But whenever their favourite notion of disinterested benevolence is introduced, their views become erroneous. Thus they allege that, in order to faith in Christ, a sinner must approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though God should cast him off for ever. Now it is undoubtedly true that conviction of sin, or a deep heartfelt consciousness of guilt and demerit, precedes conversion, but while we judge ourselves to be righteously condemned sinners, we are not called upon to pronounce judgment upon the divine conduct in a hypothetical case. Our own sinfulness, and our own need of a Saviour, are at that important stage of our spiritual history the chief objects of our concern. The Hopkinsians are thoroughly Self-righteous in their Calvinism, for they believe that God has predestinated the fall and all its consequences, and that he designed the introduction of sin to operate for the production of the general good. They allege also that repentance is necessarily prior in point of time to the exercise of faith in Christ—a point which is of little importance, as the two graces of faith and repentance are so closely and intimately connected, that it is difficult to assert priority in regard to either the one or the other. But the great theological distinction of the Hopkinsian system is a denial of the doctrine of imputation, whether of Adam's guilt on the one hand, or of Christ's righteousness on the other. This peculiarity has been extensively embraced both in Britain and America, not so much from the diffusion of the writings of Hopkins, as from the wide circulation which Dr. Dwight's System of Theology has obtained on both sides of the Atlantic—a work which, amid all its excellencies, is pervaded by this one error. Both sin and righteousness, it is alleged by those who deny imputation, are strictly personal in their nature, and cannot possibly be transferred from one person to another. But the fallacy of this objection consists in confounding two things which are essentially distinct, the actual and the legal. It is nowhere alleged that Adam's posterity have become actually guilty of Adam's personal sin, but it is alleged that in consequence of their federal connection with their first father they have become legally, or in the eye of law chargeable with, or rather involved in, his guilt. In the same way it is nowhere alleged that the righteousness of Christ is actually conveyed over to believers, but it is asserted that his righteousness is legally, or in the eye of law imputed to them, or put down to their account. Imputation then is not an actual but a legal transference. The term is strictly forensic, and the principle which it involves is familiarly known to us in the transactions of every day life. Let but a royal ambassador be insulted at a foreign court, and the whole nation whence the insult has proceeded will be made to suffer for it. How often do we find the debts of one man put down to the account of another, who may happen to be his surety? And the same principle is often seen at work in the providential dealings of God. Thus in a thousand instances the child suffers for the vices of his parent, and the wife for those of her husband, and even a whole people for the crimes of their rulers. After all, the distinction which the Hopkinsian draws is nominal rather than real. We are become sinners by Adam's sin, not for it; we become righteous by or through Christ's righteousness, but not for it. The result is the same on either supposition; the controversy is as to the mode in which the result has been produced.

In regard to the doctrines of grace and the divine decrees, the Hopkinsians are high Calvinists. They believe both in particular election and in reprobation; they hold the total depravity of human nature; they contend for the special influences of the Spirit of God in regeneration, justification by faith alone, the final perseverance of the saints, and the complete consistency between free agency and absolute dependence on the grace of God.

The Hopkinsian controversy is but little known in Britain, but in the United States of America it was some years ago warm and protracted, giving rise to a number of publications on both sides, marked by considerable ability and polemic power.

HORÆ, the goddesses of the seasons among the ancient Greeks, and the servants of Zeus in conveying benefits to men. Two of them were worshipped at Athens from a remote period, one of them, Thallo, presiding over spring, and the other, Carpo, presiding over autumn. They are often combined with the Charites. They were worshipped not only at Athens, but also at Argos, Corinth, and Olympia. Hesiod makes them three in number, Eunomia, Dice, and Eirene, and calls them the daughters of Zeus and Themis, who, in accordance with their respective names, give to a commonwealth good laws, justice, and peace.

HORCUS (Gr. an oath), the personification of an oath among the ancient Greeks. He is mentioned by Hesiod as the son of Eris, and ready at all times to punish perjury.

HORDICALIA, or HORDICIDIA, an ancient Roman festival, celebrated on the 15th of April in honour of the goddess Tellus. Thirty cows with calf were sacrificed on the occasion, part of them in the temples of Jupiter.

HORME, the personification of energy among the ancient Greeks. She had an altar dedicated to her at Athens.

HORNS. The principal instruments of defence in many animals being in their horns, it often happens that the horn is used as a symbol of power. Thus in the Old Testament we find such expressions as the Lord exalting the horn of David, and breaking the horn of the ungodly. It is said, Psal. xviii. 2, "The horn of my salvation," that is, my Saviour and defence. Horns are also used in Scripture as the symbols of royal dignity and authority. Thus Jer. xlviii. 25, "The horn of Moab is cut off;" and in Zeek. i. 18, the four horns are four great monarchies. "The ten horns," says Daniel, "are ten kings." In Judea, in Persia, in China, and even, according to Schoolcraft, among the Red Indians of North America, horns have been used as a symbol of power. The pictures and statues of the gods of heathen antiquity were often adorned with horns. The Greeks, Porphry tells us, fixed the horns of a ram to the image of Jupiter, and those of a bull to that of Bacchus. The same ornament is found according to Spanheim, on medals of Jupiter Ammon, Bacchus, Isis, and Scrapis. Clemens Alexandrinus alleges that Alexander the Great wore horns in token of his divine extraction. Accordingly, he is called in the Koran the two-horned, as the famous era of the Selencidæ is called the era of the two-horned.

HOROLOGIUM, the name given to a collection of prayers used in the Greek church, corresponding nearly to the Hours of the Romish Church.

HORSE-SACRIFICE. At a very ancient period this rite appears to have been practised in some coun-trials. Thus the Massagete, a great and powerful nation, whose territories extended beyond the Araxes to the extreme parts of the East, are said by Herodotus to have sacrificed horses to the Sun, deeming it most proper to offer the swiftest of all animals to the swiftest of the gods. Larcher, in reference to this species of sacrifice, remarks, "This was a very ancient custom; it was practised in Persia in the time of Cyrus, and was probably anterior to that prince. Horses were sacrificed to Neptune and the deities of the rivers, being precipitated into the sea or into the rivers. Sextus Pompeius threw into the sea horses and live oxen in honour of Neptune, whose son he professed to be." Hence we find the surname applied to Neptune of Hippius, from the Greek word hippos, a horse. Among the Lacedemonians, a horse was sacrificed to the winds, which by their force carried the ashes of the victim to a distance. Nay, from its swiftness the horse is sometimes used as the emblem of the winds. Thus in the Scandinavian mythology, Skjafir, the horse of Odin, has eight legs, probably to indicate the extreme rapidity of the winds. In the Rig-Veda, the ear of the wind is represented as being drawn by reddish and yellow horses.

But in the different systems of heathen mythology, both ancient and modern, horses are often introduced in connection with the Sun, the great king of day, who starts from the East, and with great rapidity traverses the heavens until he finds his resting place in the West. In Persia, white horses were consecrated and sacrificed to the Sun. In Thrace, the man eating horses of Diomedes show that the god of the country was the Sun, and that they offered him human victims. The Romans also sacrificed a horse to Mars with peculiar ceremonies. Apollo the Sun-god had his four-wheeled chariot drawn by swift-flying steeds. The Greeks gave several of their gods cars supplied with splendid horses. The Scandinavians and the Germans attributed a prophetic virtue to horses, especially those of Freyr, the god of day. The Slavonians reared sacred horses, some of them white, others black. Among the ancient Romans a horse was sacrificed annually to Mars, in the Campus Martius at Rome, in the month of October. On that occasion the blood which dropped from the tail of the October horse, as it was called, was carefully preserved by the Vestal virgins in the temple of Vesta, for the purpose of being used at the Palilia or shepherd festival, which was annually celebrated at Rome in the month of April, when the blood was burned along with other articles to produce a purifying smoke.

The horse is not infrequently mentioned in heathen mythology in connection with water, probably on account of its rapidity. In the Zend-Avesta, the water Ardonissour, which gushes forth from Alford, the sacred mountain, is represented under the form of a young girl with the body of a horse. The Rig Veda makes the Sun which dries the earth struggle against Etana, the horse, or the water, and in the Zend Avesta, Taschter the genius of rain fights under the figure of a horse against Epeoscho the genius of dryness.

In the Rig-Veda, are two hymns in honour of the horse sacrifice, called Axamedha: "The horse," says Mrs. Spier, "is a mystical horse, 'springing from the Gods,' 'fabricated from the sun.' The actual sacrifice was probably a custom belonging to the Hindus' earlier home in Northern Asia, where the Scythians and Massagete are known to have offered horses to the sun; and later, when treated as an emblematic ceremony, the mythical horse typified the Sun, and the Sun typified the universal soul. The hymns describe the horse as 'bathed and decorated with rich trappings, the variously-coloured goat going before him.' Three times he is led round the sacrificial fire; he is bound to a post and immolated by an axe, and the flesh is roasted on a spit, boiled, made into balls and eaten, and finally—

'The horse proceeds to that assembly which is most excellent:

To the presence of his father and his mother (heaven and earth).

Go horse to-day rejoicing to the Gods, that (the sacrifice) may yield blessings to the donor.'

"This ceremony was afterwards performed symbolically, and is alluded to in Upanishads and Brahmanas (which are treatises attached to the Vedas,) as a ceremony of peculiar solemnity and deep significance, and one which is supposed to procure universal dominion. In the very much later writings called Puranas the rite is altogether travestied: a mortal rajah there performs the sacrifice in order to dethrone the God Indra; and it is upon this version of the story, that Southey constructed his 'Curse of Kehama,'—correctly enough, Professor Wilson observes, according to the authorities which he followed, 'but the main object of the ceremony, the deposal of Indra from the throne of Svarga and the elevation of the Sacrificer after a hundred celebrations to that rank, are fictions of a later date, uncountenanced by the Veda.'"

The horse sacrifice at this day is one of the great annual ceremonies of the Hindus. It is thus described: "The animal must be of one colour, if possible white, of good sign, young and well formed. The sacrificer must touch, on an auspicious day, the head of the horse with clay from the Ganges, with sandal-wood, a pebble, rice not cleansed from the husk, leaves of durra grass, flowers, fruits, curds, a shell, a lamp, a mirror, silver and gold, repeating the necessary formula. Having first been bathed with water, in which had been immersed a ball composed of the bark of different trees and various kinds of spices, the horse is next superbly caparisoned. Then the god Indra is invoked by a number of prayers to come and preserve the horse, which is about to be set at liberty. After this a small piece of paper is fastened on the forehead of the horse, inscribed with the following words: 'I liberate this horse, having devoted it to be sacrificed. Whoever has strength to detain it, let him detain it. I will come and deliver it. They who are unable to detain it, will let it go, and must come to the sacrifice, bringing tribute.' These ceremonies being concluded, the horse is let loose, and runs at liberty for a whole year, during which whole time, however, he is constantly followed by servants belonging to the sacrificer. The year being expired, he is caught and bound. A proper place for the sacrifice having been selected and walled round with bricks, a roof is raised on pillars, under which is erected an altar of earth. At the eastern extremity of the altar a small terrace of sand is raised for receiving the fire; and from the roof is suspended a canopy, with elegant curtains on all sides. On the pillars of the altar are suspended branches of the mango-tree, bells, garlands of flowers, with châmaras, or tails of the cow of Tartary. The sacrificer, accompanied by a number of persons engaged to officiate at the rites, then enters, while portions of the Sâma-Veda are recited. Twenty-one posts, to one of which the horse is fastened, are then fixed in the earth, adorned with garlands, and having thirty inferior victims tied to them. These are purified by aspersions of holy water, and numerous incantations. A silver image of Garuda, with sixteen golden bricks, is then borne in, and the sacrificer and his wife wash the feet of the horse, and caparison him anew. The fire is blown with a fan of deer's skin. The holy water is contained in a fig-tree bowl. There is likewise provided an earthen vessel of water, with the image of a man painted on it, which is covered with branches, fruit, and flowers, and ornamented with gold, silver, pearls, and other gems. The horse is then slain, and his flesh, cut into small pieces, is cast into the fire, while the sacrificer and his wife sit upon the altar and receive the fumes. After this the other victims are slain, amidst the chaunting of repeated incantations. The gods to whom these sacrifices are offered are Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, and the ten guardian deities of the earth."

HORSES (BLESSING OF). See ANTHONY'S (ST.) DAY.

HORTA, a name sometimes given to ANGELONA (which see).

HORUS, the ancient Egyptian god of the sun. He was the son of Osiris and Isis, and the symbol under which he was represented was with the head of the sacred hawk. He is thought to have been the same as Aroneris. His worship extended from Egypt to Greece, and even to Rome, though under a somewhat modified form. In the astronomical view of the Egyptian mythology, he was Osiris in the sign of Leo. He was identified with the Greek Apollo, so early as the time of Herodotus, and in some respects with the Egyptian god of silence, Harpocrates, being born like him with his finger on his mouth, indicative of mysterious secrecy and silence.

HOSANNA, a form of blessing used by the Jews at the feast of tabernacles. In the course of that ancient festival they carried branches of palm-trees, olives, citrons, myrtles, and willows, singing all the while Hosanna, "Give salvation," or "Save I beseech thee," meaning thereby to pray for the coming of the Messiah. The branches which they carried were called Hosanna, as well as all the days of the feast. During the continuance of the feast, which in ancient times lasted for seven days, the Jews walked in procession round the altar with branches in their hands, amid the sound of trumpets, singing Hosanna; and on the last day of the feast, which was called the Great Hosanna, they marched round the altar seven times. Among the modern Jews, the feast of tabernacles is made to extend to nine days. The seventh day is called Hosanna Rabba, that is, "assist with great succour," being a solemn acclamation used in the prayers of this day.

The Christian church, both ancient and modern, ascribe to the word Hosanna a signification somewhat similar to that of HALLELUJAH (which see). Eusebius gives the first instance on record of its use, where, at the death of a certain martyr, the multitude are said to have shouted, "Hosanna to the Son of David." The use of it is prescribed in religious worship in the Apostolical Constitutions, in connection with a doxology to Christ. It occurs also in the liturgy of Chrysostom. By the ancients it was uniformly regarded as a doxology. Jerome speaks of a custom which existed in his time, and which he strongly condemns, that of the people singing hosannas to their bishops, as the multitudes did to our Saviour on his entrance into Jerusalem. The hosanna used to the bishops appears to have been couched in these words: "Blessed be ye of the Lord, and blessed be your coming; hosanna in the highest." In the Apostolical Constitutions, the Hosanna is appointed to be used after participating in the communion, and the precise form is thus recorded: "Hosanna to the Son of David. Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: blessed be the Lord our God who was manifested to us in the flesh."

HOSPITALIERS. See KNIGHTHOOD (ECCLIASTICAL ORDERS OF).

HOSPITALS, houses in which the poor are gratuitously accommodated and supported. Such buildings were often erected in connection with Christian churches in ancient times; and it became an express regulation that a fourth part of the revenues of the church should be set apart for the poor and sick. Priests and deacons often had the management of the hospitals, being responsible to the bishop for the right management of their trust.

HOSPITIUM, a place sometimes attached to monasteries in former times, with the view of affording temporary relief to travellers, and in which a certain number of the poor were relieved by a daily alms. It was also called a roundelium.

HOSSEIN, the second son of Ali and Fatima, and the third of the Twelve Imams. He had been born prematurely, which some of his followers accounted a miracle. He endeavoured to dissuade his brother HASSAN (which see) from resigning the Caliphate in favour of Mo'awiyah, but on finding his remonstrances unavailing, he was one of the first to declare submission to the new Caliph, not only attending at the court to pay homage, but actually serving in the Caliph's army when the Saracens first attacked Constantinople. On the death of Mo'awiyah, A. D. 679, his son Yezid succeeded, but Hossein was persuaded to contest the Caliphate with him, being deceived by the promise of powerful support from the professed adherents of the house of Ali. Overpowered by numbers, and deserted by many of his followers, he was in imminent danger of falling into the hands of his enemy: "That night," says Dr. Taylor, "Hossein slept soundly, using for a pillow the pommel of his sword. During his sleep, he dreamed that Mohammed appeared to him, and predicted that they should meet the next day in Paradise. When morning dawned, he related the dream to his sister Zeinab, who had accompanied him on his fatal expedition. She burst into a passion of tears, and exclaimed, 'Alas! alas! Woe worth the day! What a destiny is ours! My father is dead! My mother is dead! My brother Hassan is dead! and the measure of our calamities is not yet full.' Hossein tried to console her; 'Why should you weep?' he said; 'Did we not come on earth to die? My father was more worthy than I—my mother was more worthy than I—my brother was more worthy than I. They are all dead! Why should not we be ready to follow their example?' He then strictly enjoined his family to make no lamentation for his approaching martyrdom; telling them that a patient submission to the Divine decrees was the conduct most pleasing to God and his prophet.

"When morning appeared, Hossein, having washed and perfumed himself, as if preparing for a banquet, mounted his steed, and addressed his followers in terms of endearing affection that drew tears from the eyes of the gallant warriors. Then opening the Korân, he read the following verse: 'O God! be thou my refuge in suffering, and my hope in affliction.' But the soldiers of Yezid were reluctant to assist the favourite grandson of the prophet; they demanded of their generals to allow him to draw water from the Euphrates, a permission which would not have been refused to beasts and infidels. 'Let us be cautious,' they exclaimed, 'of raising our hands against him who was carried in the arms of God's apostle; it would be, in fact, to fight against God himself.' So strong were their feelings, that thirty cavaliers deserted to Hossein, resolved to share with him the glories of martyrdom.

"But Yezid's generals shared not in these sentiments, they affected to regard Hossein as an enemy of Islâm; they forced their soldiers forward with blows, and exclaimed, 'War to those who abandon the true religion, and separate themselves from the council of the faithful.' Hossein replied, 'It is you who have abandoned the true religion, it is you who have severed yourselves from the assembly of the faithful. Ah! when your souls shall be separated from your bodies, you will learn, too late, which party has incurred the penalty of eternal condemnation.' Notwithstanding their vast superiority, the Khaliph's forces hesitated to engage men determined on death; they poured in their arrows from a distance, and soon dismounted the little troop of Hossein's cavalry.

"When the hour of noon arrived, Hossein solicited a suspension of arms during the time appointed for the meridian prayer. This trifling boon was conceded with difficulty; the generals of Yezid asking, 'How a wretch like him could venture to address the Deity?' and adding the vilest reproaches, to which Hossein made no reply. The Persian traditions relate a fabulous circumstance, designed to exalt the character of Hossein, though fiction itself cannot increase the deep interest of his history. They tell us, that whilst he was upon his knees, the king of the Genii appeared to him, and offered, for the sake of his father Ali, to disperse his enemies in a moment. 'No,' replied the generous Hossein, 'what use is there in fighting any longer? I am but a guest of one breath in this transitory world; my relatives and companions are all gone, and what will it profit me to remain behind; I long for nothing, now, save my martyrdom; therefore, depart thou, and may the Lord recompense and bless thee.' The Genii was so deeply affected by the reply, that his soul exhibited human weakness, and he departed weeping and lamenting.

"When the hour of prayer was passed, the combat was renewed; Hossein soon found himself alone; one of his sons, six of his brethren, and several of his nephews, lay dead around him; the rest of his followers were either killed or grievously wounded. Hitherto he had escaped unhurt, for every one dreaded to raise a hand against the grandson of Mohammed; at length a soldier, more daring than the rest, gave him a severe wound in the head; faint with the loss of blood, he staggered to the door of his tent, and with a burst of parental affection, which at such a moment must have been mingled with unspeakable bitterness, took up his infant child and began to caress it. Whilst the babe was lisping out an inquiry as to the cause of his father's emotion, it was struck dead by an arrow in Hossein's arms. When the blood of the innocent bubbling over his bosom, disclosed this new calamity, Hossein cast the body towards heaven, exclaiming, 'O Lord! if thou refusest us thy succour, at least spare those who have not yet sinned, and turn thy wrath upon the heads of the guilty.'

"Parched by a burning thirst, Hossein made a desperate effort to reach the Euphrates; but when he stooped to drink, he was struck by an arrow in the mouth, and at the same moment one of his nephews, who came to embrace him for the last time, had his hand cut off by the blow of a sabre. Hossein, now the sole survivor of his party, threw himself into the midst of the enemy, and fell beneath a thousand weapons. The officers of Yezid barbarously mangled the corpse of the unfortunate prince; they cut off his head, and sent it to the Khaliph."

A splendid mosque was erected over the place where Hossein's body was buried; and the place, which is named Mesched Hossein, that is, "the place of Hossein's martyrdom," is a favourite resort of pilgrims to this day. The Schites believe that the martyr's head, after having wrought several miracles, left Egypt, and joined itself to his body at Kerbela, and one of the days of the Mohurrum is dedicated to the commemoration of this event. There is a curious tradition in reference to Hossein's head, which may be related: "When Hossein's head was sent to be presented to Yezid, the escort that guarded it, halting for the night in the city of Mosul, placed it in a box, which they locked up in a temple. One of the sentinels, in the midst of the night, looking through a chink in one of the doors, saw a man of immense stature, with a white and venerable beard, take Hossein's head out of the box, kiss it affectionately, and weep over it. Soon after, a crowd of venerable sages arrived, each of whom kissed the pallid lips and wept bitterly. Fearing that these people might convey the head away, he unlocked the door and entered. Immediately, one of the number came up, gave him a violent slap on the face, and said, 'The prophets have come to pay a morning-visit to the head of the martyr. Whither dost thou venture so disrespectfully?'—The blow left a black mark on his cheek. In the morning he related the circumstances to the commander of the escort, and showed his cheek, on which the impression of the hand and fingers was plainly perceptible."

Hossein, like his father Ali, is said to have been remarkable for his piety, and his biographers actually affirm that he paid his adorations to the Most High a thousand times every day.

HOSSEIN'S MARTYRDOM (ANNIVERSARY OF), a religious solemnity observed both in Persia and India with extraordinary splendour. It lasts for ten days, during which the Schites keep up continual mourning for the martyr's fate, giving themselves up to sighs and groans, fastings and tears. They abstain from shaving their heads, from bathing, and even from changing their clothes. The observances consist of a series of representations of the successive scenes in the life of Hossein, from the date of his flight from Medina, onward to his martyrdom on the plains of Kerbela; and the exhibition of each day is preceded by the reading in a plaintive and pathetic tone a portion of the history of Hossein. The mosques are hung with black, and the pulpits are also covered with cloth of the same colour. Parts of the history recited are in verse, and chanted in most doleful strains. The audience is soon wrought up to a high pitch of grief, waving their bodies to and fro, and smiting their breasts, exclaiming, "O Hossein!" "Alas, Hossein!" Wandering minstrels go about the streets every day during the solemnity, carrying pictures relating to the martyr's history, and crowds of men, follow in their train, some representing the soldiers of Hossein and others his enemies. The two opposing parties often come into collision, and mock fights ensue which are occasionally attended with serious consequences. The events of the last or tenth day, comprise the circumstances of Hossein's murder, which are acted in the presence of the King of Persia, in the great square of Ispahan. "I have been present," says Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, in her description of Mohammedanism in India, "when the effect produced by the superior oratory and gestures of a Maulvee reading the history of the house of Ali has almost terrified me; the profound grief evinced in his tears and groans, being piercing and apparently sincere. I have even witnessed blood issuing from the breasts of sturdy men, who beat themselves simultaneously as they ejaculated the names 'Hassan!' 'Hossein!' for ten minutes, and occasionally for a longer period in that part of the service called Mortem." Mr. Morier, in his Travels in Persia, gives the following account of what he witnessed on the eighth night of the Mohurrum: "On entering the room, we found a large assembly of Persians, clad in dark-coloured clothes, which, accompanied with their black caps, black beards, and their dismal faces, looked really as if they were 'afflicting their souls.' We observed that 'no man did put on him his ornaments,' Exod. xxxiii. 4. They wore neither their daggers nor any other part of their dress which they regard as ornamental. A mollah of high consideration sat next to the grand vizier, and kept him in serious conversation, while the remaining part of the company communicated with each other in whispers. After we had been seated some time, the windows of the room in which we were seated were thrown open, and we then discovered a priest, placed on a high chair, under the covering of a tent, surrounded by a crowd of the populace, the whole place being lighted up with candles. He commenced with an exordium, in which he reminded them of the great value of each tear shed for the sake of the Imam Hossein, which would be an atonement for a past life of wickedness; and also informed them, with much solemnity, that 'whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among the people,' Lev. xxiii. 29. He then began to read from a book, with a sort of nasal chant, that part of the tragic history of Hossein appointed for the day, which soon produced its effect upon his audeceit, for he had already turned over three leaves, before the grand vizier began shaking his head to and fro, and uttering in a most piteous voice, the usual Persian exclamation of grief, 'Wah! wah! wah!' both of which acts were followed, in a more or less violent manner, by the rest of the audience.

The chanting of the priest lasted nearly an hour, and some parts of the song were indeed pathetic, and well calculated to rouse the feelings of a superstitious and lively people. In one part of it all the people stood up; and I observed that the grand vizier turned himself towards the wall, with his hand extended before him, and prayed. After the priest had finished, a company of actors appeared, some dressed as women, who chanted forth their parts from slips of paper, in a sort of recitative, that was not displeasing even to our ears. In the very tragical parts most of the audience appeared to weep very unaccountably; and as I sat near the grand vizier and his neighbour the priest, I was witness to many real tears that fell from them. In some of these mournful assemblies, it is the custom for a priest to go about to each person, in the height of his grief, with a piece of cotton in his hand, with which he carefully collects the falling tears, and then squeezes it into a bottle, preserving them with the greatest caution. This practice illustrates that passage in Psalm lvi. 8, 'Put thou my tears into thy bottle.' Some Persians believe that in the agony of death, when all medicines have failed, a drop of the tears so collected, put into the mouth of a dying man, has been known to revive him. It is for this use they are collected."

HOST, a term applied by Romanists to the eucharistic wafer after it has been consecrated by the priest. The word is evidently derived from the Latin word hostia, a sacrificial victim, under the idea that the Mass (which see), is a sacrifice in which the real body, soul, and divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ is offered up to God. The host is composed of meal and water, which is baked into small circular cakes like wafers. See BREAD (EUCHARISTIC). It is offered daily in the mass, as a sacrifice for the sins of mankind. The consecrated wafer or host is kept in a small tabernacle called CIBORIUM (which see), or PYX. The practice which is followed in the Greek and Roman churches of elevating the host immediately after consecration, does not appear to have existed before the eighth century. Germanus, bishop of Constantinople, who lived about A. D. 715 is the first writer who refers to it in connection with the Greek church; and assigning a reason for the custom, he says it was to represent our Saviour's elevation upon the cross, and his dying there, together with his rising from the dead. In the Latin church there is a perfect silence observed by all the older ritualists in regard to it until the eleventh century, when it is mentioned by Ivo Carnotensis and Hugo de Sancto Victore, who assign the same reason for it as that which is alleged by Germanus, but make not the slightest allusion to the practice of adoration of the host. (See next article).

HOST (ADORATION OF THE). The worship of the host or consecrated sacramental wafer, was the natural result of the adoption of the doctrine of transubstantiation. From the Roman canon law, we learn that Pope Henricus, who succeeded Innocent III., in the beginning of the thirteenth century, ordered that the priests, at a certain part of the mass service, should elevate the consecrated wafer, and at the same instant the people should prostrate themselves before it in worship. In A. D. 1261, the festival of CORPUS CHRISTI (which see), which is still observed with so much pomp, was established by Pope Urban IV. On that occasion the host is carried in solemn procession through the streets, every individual, as it passes him, bowing the knee in token of adoration. In all Roman Catholic countries the practice of kneeling to the host is universal. In Spain, when a priest carries the consecrated wafer to a dying man, a person with a small bell accompanies him. At the sound of the bell all who hear it are obliged to fall on their knees, and to remain in that posture till they hear it no longer. The first writer who mentions the elevation of the host in connection with its adoration, is Gulielmus Durandus, who wrote about the year 1286. Some Romish writers have endeavoured to claim for the practice of adoring the host an almost apostolic origin. In support of this claim they refer to the Sursum Corda, or invitation to lift up the heart, or early times, as an admonition to worship the consecrated bread, whereas it was an exhortation to lift their souls from earth to heaven, setting their whole affections upon Divine and heavenly things.

If the adoration of the host was indeed a practice of the early Christian church, it is surely most unaccountable that not the remotest allusion is made to it by the Fathers of the church, whether Greek or Latin; and equally strange is it that amid all the objections and calumnies urged by the heathens against the Christians, they never object to them the worship of bread and wine, which they assuredly would have done if it had been in their power. Bingham, in his 'Christian Antiquities,' gives an admirable summary of the arguments urged against the adoration of the host, which we cannot do better than quote: "As, 1. From the silence of all ancient writers about it. 2. From their using no elevation of the host for worship for many ages. 3. The ancients knew nothing of ringing a bell, to give notice of the time of adoration to the people. 4. There are no histories of beasts miraculously worshipping the eucharist, which sort of fictions are so common in later ages. 5. The ancients never carried the eucharist to the sick or absent with any pomp or signs of worship; never exposed it to public view in times of solemn rejoicing or sorrow; never adored or invoked its assistance in distress, or upon any great undertaking; which are now such common practices in the Roman church. 6. The ancients never enjoined persons newly baptized and penitents to fall down before the eucharist and worship it, as is now commonly done in the Roman church. 7. The ancients never allowed non-communicants to stay and worship the eucharist, as the practice now is; which yet had been very proper, had they believed the eucharist to be their God. But they used it only for communion, not for adoration. 8. The ancients never used to carry the eucharist publicly in processions, to be adored by all the people; which is a novel practice in the judgment of Krantzins and Cassander. 9. The ancients lighted no lamps nor candles by day to the eucharist, nor burned incense before it, as is now the practice. 10. They made no little images of the eucharist, to be kissed and worshipped as the images of Christ. 11. They had no peculiar festival appropriated to its more solemn worship. This is of no longer date than Pope Urban IV., who first instituted it, anno 1264, and it is peculiar only to the Roman church. 12. The ancient liturgies have no forms of prayers, doxologies, or praises to the eucharist, as are in the Roman Missal. 13. The adoration of the eucharist was never objected by the heathens to the primitive Christians; nor were they reproached as the Romanists have been since, as eaters of their God. It is a noted saying of Averroes. Since Christians eat what they worship, let my soul rather have her portion among the philosophers. This learned philosopher lived about the year 1150, when the host worship began to be practised, which gave him this prejudice to the Christian religion. 14. The Christians objected such things to the heathens, as they never would have objected, had they themselves worshipped the host; as that it was an impious thing to eat what they worshipped, and worship what they eat and sacrificed. Which objections might easily have been retorted upon them. 15. The Christians were accused by the heathens of eating infants' blood in their solemn mysteries, but never any mention is made of eating the blood of Christ, either in the objection or answer to it. The ground of the story arose from the practice of the Carpocratians and other heretics, and not from the Christians eating the blood of Christ. 16. Lastly, the Christians never urged the adoration of the eucharist in their disputes with the Ebionites and Docetes, which yet would have been very proper to confute their errors, who denied the reality of the flesh of Christ."

These arguments are drawn by Bingham from the able and learned treatise of Daillé on the object of religious worship against the Latins, and they are sufficient to show, that although respect was undoubtedly shown by the early Christian church to the sacramental elements, the practice of host-worship was totally unknown.

HOST OF HEAVEN (WORSHIP OF THE). See TSABIANs.

HOSTIA, an animal among the ancient Romans, which was destined for sacrifice to the gods. In early times it seems to have been the custom to burn the whole victim upon the altars of the gods. In later times this was done in the case of sacrifices to the infernal gods. So far back as the time of Homer, however, only the legs and part of the intestines were consumed by fire, while the rest of the animal was eaten. It was the smoke ascending from the sacrifice which was considered to be chiefly pleasing to the gods, and, accordingly, it was imagined that the more numerous the animals consumed upon the altar, so much the more plentiful the smoke, and, therefore, so much the more acceptable the sacrifice. Hence a hecatomb, or a hundred bulls, sometimes smoked upon the altars at once. The hostie or victims were generally animals of the domestic kind, such as bulls, cows, sheep, rams, lambs, goats, pigs, dogs, and horses. The beast to be sacrificed, if it was of the larger sort, used to be marked on the horns with gold; if of the smaller sort, it was crowned with the leaves of that tree which the deity was thought most to delight in for whom the sacrifice was designed. And besides these they wore the infule and vitta, a sort of white fillets, about their heads. The animal selected for sacrifice required to be free from all blemishes and diseases. Having been decorated for the solemn occasion, it was led to the place of sacrifice, preceded by the officiating priest clothed in a white robe, white being a colour particularly pleasing to the gods. A libation of wine was then poured upon the altar, and a solemn invocation addressed to the deity. After this the victim was usually slain, though sometimes it was previously consecrated by throwing some sort of corn and frankincense together with the mola, that is bran or meal mixed with salt, upon the head of the beast. This was technically called immolatio. Before the animal was killed, a bunch of hair was cut from its forehead and thrown into the fire as first-fruits. Wine was then poured between its horns, and if it was to the gods above, its head was drawn upwards, but if to the gods below, downwards; after which it was slain and laid upon the altar to be consumed. While burning, wine and incense were poured upon it, and prayers and music accompanied the solemnity. Among the Greeks the victims were usually killed by the priests, but among the Romans by a person called Papa, who struck the animal with a hammer before using the knife. The better parts of the intestines were strewed with barley-meal, wine, and incense, and were burnt upon the altar; but if the sacrifice was made to the gods of the rivers or of the sea, these parts were not burnt, but thrown into the sea. See SACRIFICE.

HOSTILINA, a female deity worshipped among the ancient Romans when the ground shot forth new ears of corn.

HOTRI, in the system of Hinduism, one who invokes the gods, or calls them to sacrifice.

HOTTENTOTS (RELIGION OF THE). The Hottentots comprise a number of connected tribes in South Africa, the Corannas, the Namaquas, and the Bushmen, formerly inhabiting the territory which is now embraced in the English colony of the Cape of Good Hope. Mr. Moffat describes them as "not swarthy or black, but rather of a sallow colour, and, in some cases, so light that a tinge of red in the cheek is perceptible, especially among the Bushmen. They are generally smaller in stature than their neighbours of the interior; their visage and form very distinct, and in general the top of the head broad and flat; their faces tapering to the chin, with high cheek bones, flat noses, and large lips." They resemble none of the Kafir tribes, and are equally distinct from the Negro race. Mr. Moffat compares with Mr. Barrow in supposing, that they resemble the Chinese more than any other people. Gibbon alleged them to be "the connecting link between the rational and irrational creation." This remark, however, applies rather to the Bushmen who inhabit the deserts and mountain fastnesses of the interior than to the Corannas and Namaquas who are the unmixed Hottentots. The language of the latter tribes is characterized by a peculiar click, which it is exceedingly difficult for any European to imitate. Dr. Philip, in his Researches in South Africa, gives a very favourable view of the native character of the Hottentot tribes, alleging that when the Portuguese first visited the Cape of Good Hope, they found them rich in cattle, living comfortably, and so distinguished for their morality and good conduct, that they received the appellation of "The good men." Mr. Barrow says, that Hottentots are capable of strong attachments, are grateful for kindness shown, and honest and truthful. The present number of Hottentots, including all the tribes, is estimated at 150,000.

It is difficult to give any satisfactory account of the religion of the Hottentots. Dr. Philip, who passed many years as a missionary in the Cape Colony, says of them, "I have never been able to discover from my intercourse with the natives, or from any other source, that this nation had ever attained any distinct notion of a Supreme Being, or that an idea of a future state had at any period prevailed among them." The Hottentot word Utko seems to be the name which denotes the Supreme Being, and, accordingly, it is used among the frontier or Kafir tribes to denote the Christian's God. The Namaquas use the term Tuiknap, or as some tribes pronounce it, Utknap; the Utko of the Hottentots is articulated with the click peculiar to that language. "In my journey," says Mr. Moffat, in his Missionary Labours and Scenes in South Africa, "to the back parts of Great Namaqualand, I met with an aged sorcerer, or doctor who stated that he had always understood that Tuiknap was a noble warrior, of great physical strength; that, in a desperate struggle with another champion, he received a wound in the knee, but having vanquished his enemy, his name was lost in the mighty combat, which rendered the nation independent; for no one could conquer the Tuiknap without kneeling. When I referred to the import of the word, one who inflicts pain, or a sore knee, manifesting my surprise that they should give such a name to the Creator and Benefactor, he replied in a way that induced a belief that he applied the term to what we should call the devil, or to death itself, adding, that he thought death, or the power causing death, was very sore indeed." To him, as to many others, this Tuiknap was an object neither of reverence nor love. During tremendous thunder storms, which prevail in that climate, and which it might be supposed would speak to the mind of man with an awful voice, I have known the natives of Namaqualand shoot their poisoned arrows at the lightning, in order to arrest the destructive fluid. May not the Tuiknap of these people be like the Thianga of the Kafirs, an ancient hero; or represent some power, which they superstitiously dread, from its causing death or pain?"

The Rev. Mr. Henry Tindall, who spent several years in Great Namaqualand, thus states his impressions of the religion of the Namaqua branch of the Hottentot family: "As to religion, their minds appear to have been almost a blank. They do not seem, before they became acquainted with the first principles of Christianity, to have been in the habit of observing any rites or ceremonies of a religious character, or to have had any idea of responsibility to a higher Being. The fact that their language contains appellations for God, spirits, and also for the wicked one, seems to indicate that they were not totally ignorant of those subjects, though there is nothing more in the terms of the language, or in their ceremonial observances and superstitions that affords evidence of anything beyond a crude notion of a spiritual world. I believe that the superstitious tales which have been gleaned from them by travellers, and advanced as religious records, are regarded by the natives themselves in the light of fables, which are either narrated for amusement, or intended to illustrate the habits and characteristics of wild animals."

"They have much more confidence in witchcraft than in religion. Almost all disease or calamity, and sudden death in particular, is attributed to some enemy who is supposed to hold the fatal charm. The practice of medicine is almost exclusively confined to the witch doctor, and though his efforts often result in a signal failure, yet occasional success, attributable to the simple remedies which he employs, or the recovery of patients under his treatment in the course of nature, confirms them in their belief of the accusations which he makes, and the power that he arrogates. The doctor generally practises some sleight of hand, and pretends to extract pieces of sticks, sheep's bones, and other substances from the limbs of his patients. As a antive council will seldom meet without breathing destruction to some well-fed bees, so the witch doctor never carries on his operations without sacrificing the best of his patient's flock to his art, or rather to his appetite, and besides this, demands exorbitant pay."

The same intelligent writer, speaking of the Bushmen scattered up and down the interior, remarks, "They are almost entire strangers to religious knowledge or sentiment. Their ideas of a Supreme Being and of a spiritual world are extremely vague, and superstition has little hold upon them. Many of them wear pieces of wood or bone dangling from their necks, which they regard as charms to avert the influence of witchcraft; it is also customary for them when going to hunt to cast a stone on a heap which has been raised over the grave of some departed friend, by successive offerings, in order to insure success; but this custom appears to be confined to those who have had most intercourse with their Namaqua neighbours. If unsuccessful they become petulant, and on their next expedition will pass the spot without taking any notice of it; of course, they still have ill luck, which they attribute to the insult which they have offered to their god; they generally become penitent, return home, and after having spent a sleepless night, rise early on the following morning, hasten to the place of offering, and atone for the past by casting another stone on the heap. A Bushman was once asked by a missionary if he knew there was a God, and if he had any idea where He was. He replied that he had heard that there was such a Being, and that the missionary was the most likely person he had ever seen to be He."

It has long been alleged that one peculiarity of the religion of the Hottentots was, that they worshipped an insect which has received the name of the "Praying Mantis," from the erect position and motion it assumes when alarmed. Considerable doubt, however, is now entertained as to the truth of this allegation. That there is a diminutive species of insect which goes in the colony by the name of the "Hottentot's god," is admitted on all hands; but the missionaries who have been long resident in South Africa, entertain very serious doubts whether such worship was ever known among the Hottentots, and they state that the fullest information which they have been able to obtain upon the subject amounts to nothing more than that the insect in question was viewed with such superstitious feelings that they accounted it a crime to kill it, and believed that if by any accident they should happen to do so, they would be unfortunate during the rest of their lives. All this, even admitting it to be well-founded, does not substantiate the charge of insect-worship. But though not perhaps chargeable with the gross idolatry of worshipping the "Praying Mantis," their whole religion, if religion it can be called, consists of sorcery, superstition, and witchcraft.

Missions have been established for many years among the Hottentot as well as the other tribes of Southern Africa, and it is remarkable, in consequence of the progress of Christianity and the influence of the civilization of the English and Dutch colonists, what a complete change has been effected, both in the physical and moral condition of the Hottentots. They have lost many of their former characteristics, and are becoming rapidly amalgamated with the colonists among whom they live. This remark, at the same time, is limited to those Hottentots who are resident within the colony, the more distant tribes being still the victims of the most degrading superstition.

HOUAMES, a set of vagrant Mohammedans in Arabia, who dwell in tents. They have a law by which they are commanded to perform their ceremonies and prayers under a pavilion. They are held in great contempt and abhorrence for their wicked and immoral conduct.

HOUR. This division of time, according to Herodotus, originated with the Chaldeans, from whom probably it passed to the Jews. The first mention of hours in the Scriptures occurs in Dan. iii. 6. The Jews reckoned the hours of the civil day from six in the morning till six in the evening. The morning sacrifice was offered at the third hour, that is, at nine o'clock of our time, and the evening sacrifice at the ninth hour, that is, at three o'clock of our time. The evening watches lasted each of them three hours, the first reaching from six till nine, the second from nine till twelve, the third from twelve till three, and the fourth from three till six, when the day commenced. At an after period the natural day was divided into twelve portions or hours, which varied in their length with the season, being longer in summer and shorter in winter.

The division of the day into hours has been adopted by almost all nations. One case, however, may be mentioned in which the hours differ in length from those of other countries. We refer to the Japanese, whose division of time is of a peculiar kind. The day, we learn from Siebold, "extending from the beginning of morning twilight to the end of evening twilight, is divided into six hours, and the night, from the beginning to the end of darkness, into six other hours. Of course the length of these hours is constantly varying. Their names (according to Titsingh) are as follows: Kokonots, noon and midnight; Yaats, about our two o'clock; Nanats, from four to five; Moutsdouki, end of the evening and commencement of morning twilight; Itsous, eight to nine; Yoots, about ten; and then Kokonots again. Each of these hours is also subdivided into four parts, thus: Kokonots, noon or midnight; Kokonots-fan, quarter past; Kokonots-fan-souki, half-past; Kokonots-fan-souki-maye, three-quarters past; Yaats, commencement of second hour; Yaats-fan, &c., and so through all the hours.

"The hours are struck on bells, Kokonots being indicated by nine strokes, preceded (as is the case also with all the hours) by three warning strokes, to call attention, and to indicate that the hour is to be struck, and followed, after a pause of about a minute and a half, by the strokes for the hour, between which there is an interval of about fifteen seconds—the last, however, following its predecessor still more rapidly, to indicate that the hour is struck. Yauts is indicated by eight strokes, Nauts by seven, Mouts dauki by six, Itous by five, and Youts by four. Much speculation has been resorted to by the Japanese to explain why they do not employ, to indicate hours, one, two, and three strokes. The obvious answer seems to be, that while three strokes have been appropriated as a forewarning, their method of indicating that the striking is finished would not be available, if one and two strokes designated the first and second hours." HOUSEL, the term which, in the Saxon language, denotes the Lord's Supper.

HRIMFAXI, the horse in the ancient Scandinavian mythology, on which Night rides, and which every morning, as he ends his course, bedews the earth with the foam which falls from his bit.

HRIMTHURSAR, the frost-giants of the Scandinavian mythology sprung from the giant Ymir. The Prose Edda says, that "when Ymir slept, he fell into a sweat, and from the pit of his left arm was born a man and woman, and one of his feet engendered with the other a son from whom descended the Frost-Giants, and we, therefore, call Ymir the Old Frost-Giant."

HU, the supreme god of the ancient Cymri, who, with his spouse CERIDWEN (which see), dwelt at the extremity of an immense lake, called Llŷon, which was always threatening to burst its barriers, when a black heaver, the degenerate offspring of these two divinities, let out the waters, and a universal destruction took place. Hu is represented as winged. He is said to have drawn forth the destroyer out of the water, so that the lake should no more bring a deluge upon the earth. This he is said to have done by means of oxen. He also instructed the primitive race in the art of tilling the soil. He first collected and arranged them in different tribes, and transferred the Cymri or Celts into Britain. In various points there is thought to be an analogy between this deity and Noah.

HUGUENOTS, a name given to the Protestants of France at a very early period of their history. The earliest known instance of its occurrence is in a letter addressed by the Comte de Villars, lieutenant-general of Langue-doc, to the king, dated November 11, 1560, in which he terms the riotous Calvinists of the Cevennes, Huguenots. It is impossible, at this distance of time, to ascertain with certainty the precise origin and meaning of the word. The derivation which D'Aubigné thinks the most probably correct is that drawn from Hugon, a gate in Tours, where the Protestants first assembled. Others derive it from a corruption of the first words of their protest, "Hue nos." Browning, in his 'History of the Huguenots,' gives no fewer than ten different derivations of the term, the most ancient of them taken from a work printed at Lyons in 1573, tracing it to John Huss, whose doctrines they professed, and from whom they were called in derision, "Guenens de Huss," or Huss's apes. Conder thinks a more probable etymology is found in the German word eidgenossen, confederates, softened into egnotes, a term which was originally applied to the brave citizens of Geneva, who entered into the alliance against the tyrannical attempts of Charles III., duke of Savoy. HULSEAN LECTURES, an annual series of theological lectures delivered at Cambridge under the will of the Rev. John Hulse, late of Elworth, bearing date the 12th July 1777. The course extended originally to twenty lectures, but is now reduced to eight.

HUMAN SACRIFICES. It is a melancholy fact, that, in almost all heathen nations at one period or another of their history, the practice has been found to exist of offering human beings in sacrifice to their gods. The earliest instance on record of this barbarous practice, is the ancient sacrifice to Moloch, in which children were caused to pass through the fire to this sanguinary deity. Attempts have sometimes been made to explain away the expression which describes this inhuman rite as indicating something less than the sacrifice of children; but all doubt as to the real existence of such a practice among the Jews is removed by the plain statement of the prophet Jeremiah vii. 31, "And they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart." And again, in regard to the service of another false god, whose worship had been adopted by the Jews, the same prophet mentions, xiv. 5, "They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt offerings unto Baal, which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind." Both these quotations establish beyond a doubt that the Jews were chargeable, at least in the degenerate days of Manasseh, with offering human beings in sacrifice to heathen idols. In all probability, however, this cruel rite had been learned from the Canaanites, as indeed appears very plainly from Ps. cvi. 37, 38, "Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, and shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood." The practice of this horrid ceremony is expressly forbidden under pain of death in the law of Moses, Lev. xx. 2. "Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones."

Far from being limited to the Canaanites, human beings were offered in sacrifice by almost all the heathen nations of antiquity. The Egyptians, the Cretans, the Arabians, brought human blood to the altars of their gods. The ancient Mexicans deemed human sacrifices the most acceptable offerings which they could present to their deities. Tacitus relates that it was the custom of the ancient Germans to sacrifice human victims to their gods. The Phœnicians, the Cyprians, the Rhodians, all had human sacrifices. In the early ages of Grecian history such a mode of propitiating their deities seems to have prevailed, and Pausanias informs us that the practice of shedding the blood of human victims in honour of Zeus Lyceus, existed in Arcadia, and it appears to have continued down to the time of the Roman emperors. In Lencas, every year at the festival of Apollo, a man was thrown from a rock into the sea. At an annual festival, also, called Thargelia, which was celebrated in honour of the Delian Apollo and Artemis at Athens, two human beings were burnt on a funeral pile, the one sacrificed in behalf of the women of Athens, and the other of the men. It is not certain that on every return of the festival such a sacrifice was offered, but more probably it was reserved for extraordinary emergencies, such as the occurrence of heavy calamities seriously affecting the welfare of the city. In the later ages of the history of Greece, the custom of sacrificing human victims seems to have disappeared before the advancing progress of civilization.

Among the Romans, also, human sacrifices existed. To Saturn human victims were offered. "As Saturn," says Tertullian, "did not spare his own children, so he persisted in not sparing those of other people; for parents offered up their own children to him." Curtius and the Decii are well known examples in Roman history of self-sacrifice for the good of the country. Among the early Italian nations, more particularly the Sabines, votive offerings, like that of Jephtha in Old Testament history, often involved the sacrifice of human beings. But even in the latest period of the Roman republic, an instance of such bloody offerings is to be found. In the reign of Julius Cæsar, when a military insurrection took place, two of the soldiers were sacrificed to Mars in the Campus Martius.

Human sacrifices seem to have formed an essential part of the Druidical religion. Procopius Cæsariensis, who flourished so late as the sixth century affirms that these sacrifices were offered by the Druids in Gaul in his time; and Strabo expressly declares, that it was because the Druids offered human sacrifices that the Romans were determined to abolish their religion. Cæsar, in speaking of this custom as it existed among the Gauls, says, "Those who are afflicted with any grievous distemper, or whose lives are hazarded in war, or exposed to other dangers, either offer up men for sacrifices, or vow so to do; and they make use of the Druids for their priests upon such occasions, imagining their gods are to be satisfied no other way for sparing their lives than by offering up the life of another man." There is no doubt that the Druids followed the same cruel practice also in Britain.

Numberless are the ancient divinities who seem to have delighted in blood. Cyprus sacrificed a man every year to Agraulus, Rhodes to Saturn, Chios, Lesbos, Tenedos to Bacchus, Phœcia to Diana, Lacedæmon to Mars. The sacrifice of children, as we have seen, had its origin among the Canaanites and the Phœnicians. Colonies from these nations carried the practice to Cyprus, to Crete, to the coasts of the Ægean Sea, to Carthage, Sicily, and Sardinia. From the Canaanites, also, doubtless, had the Moabites and Ammonites learned the custom. It existed among the Syrian worshippers of Adonis, among the Lydians towards the north, and among the Arabians towards the south. We find it also among the ancient Scandinavians, and even among the primitive races of Peru and of Mexico, as well as among the savages of Florida. Some nations have persuaded themselves that the gods would be satisfied with the blood of old men, of prisoners of war, of slaves, or criminals. Such was the case with the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Scythians, the Celts, the Germans, the Slavonians, and even the Persians, the Greeks and Romans. But other nations carry farther still this horrid immolation of human victims. The ancient Mexicans, and even, at this day, some tribes of Western Africa, butcher their prisoners of war by hundreds, and even by thousands, in one day, not to propitiate the gods but as a triumphal offering in honour of victory over their enemies.

In many of the nations of modern heathendom, the practice of offering human victims to the gods still exists in full vigour. Not to speak of the cruel acts of self-torture perpetrated by the votaries of Kali and Durga among the Hindus, numberless human sacrifices were offered down to a recent period by the Thugs under the sanction of their patron goddess Kali, and by the Khonds of Goomsoor, who, till very recently, offered up their annual Merias or human victims. In the Kalika Purana minute directions are given for the performance of a human sacrifice, by which the goddess Kali is said to be rendered propitious for a thousand years. What multitudes have sacrificed themselves to the idol Jogal Nath, and what multitudes more have given up their lives to the waters of the all-devouring Gunga! Dr. Spry, in his 'Modern India,' gives an account of a tribe, in the Nagpore district, who not only sacrifice human victims, but feast upon the sacrifice. See CANNIBALS.

The practice of offering human sacrifices has prevailed, to some extent, among the North American Indians, and is still found attended with shocking barbarism among most of the heathen tribes of Southern and Western Africa. The same rite was generally prevalent among the islands of the Pacific before the introduction of Christianity, and even yet has not altogether disappeared among the Pagan inhabitants of some of those islands.

HUMANISTS, a class of thinkers which arose in Germany towards the end of the eighteenth century, originating chiefly from the diffusion of the writings of Rousseau. Their views were thoroughly infidel, their chief aim being to sink the Christian in the man. Hence the name given to their system, which was usually called Humanism. It sought to level all family distinctions, all differences of rank, all nationality, all positive moral obligation, all positive religion, and to train mankind to be men, as the first, the last, the highest accomplishment. This was the kind of education which Rousseau professed to represent in his 'Emile,'—a work which sapped the foundations of Christian principle in the case of multitudes both in France and Germany. In the latter country particularly, the Deistic tendencies which were fostered by the writings and the example of Frederick II., began to shoot forth in the direction of Humanism. The practical aspect which it now assumed, was that of the Philanthropic education, as it was termed, of Basedow. The first Philanthropinum was formed at Dessau in 1774. One of its fundamental regulations was, that all religious distinctions were to be entirely kept out of view, and the private devotional exercises, accordingly, were so framed as that nothing should be done which would not be approved of by every worshipper of God, whether he were a Christian, Jew, Mohammedan, or Deist. In the system of teaching, which was adopted by Basedow, and the others who followed in his wake, the chief object was not so much to impart knowledge as to develop all the human powers and faculties. The entire education was based on the supposed goodness of human nature. "While the former education," says Dr. Kahnis, in his 'Internal History of German Protestantism,' "had required all which it was in the power of youths to do, whether it gave them pleasure or pain, the philanthropic education asked, in the first place, What is in accordance with the nature of the child? What affords him enjoyment? How do all the inclinations and dispositions of childhood find their suitable sphere? The delight of children in bodily exercise is made use of as bodily gymnastics; the inclination for play, as mental gymnastics; walks, as opportunities for educating and teaching; ambition as a moral engine. But although the Philanthropina at first promised to teach every thing better and more quickly than the ordinary school did, yet it soon appeared that linguistic knowledge, and all matters of memory, would not thrive. Because they would not teach any thing from without, and mechanically, but would develop every thing according to nature, rational knowledge, such as logic, mathematics, arithmetic, natural religion, and morals, as well as those sciences based upon perception, experience, and advantage, were there chiefly cultivated. The fresh youth, grown up under fine bodily training, simply and easily dressed in an age of wigs and pig-tails, walked about the fields and forests to acquire a knowledge of nature; went into the workshops of tradesmen to acquire a knowledge of common life, with its arts and wants; exercised themselves in the labour of the husbandman, in the art of the citizen, in order to stand a future like that of Robinson Crusoe, better than the hero of that book himself."

The plausible manner in which Basedow, Campe, and others had set forth the advantages of this system of philanthropic education blinded the minds of many to its true character. But the spell was speedily broken, the delusion vanished. Men began to look coldly at this utilitarian mode of educating the human being. The Philanthropic Humanism soon gave place to a higher Humanism, which began to spring out of the ardent study of the ancient classics. But neither the one species of Humanism nor the other was fitted to render the human being either morally good or practically useful, but thoroughly selfish in his whole nature and actings. He was not trained to be a member of a family, of a nation, of a church, but of that great totality, the human race. A training so vague and unpractical was altogether unsuited to man in the various positions which he is called to occupy in this world, or to fit him for a higher sphere in the world to come.

HUMANITARIANS, a name sometimes applied to those modern Socinians who maintain, with Dr. Priestley, the doctrine of the simple humanity of Christ. Socinianism, in its original form as taught in the Racovian Catechism, and in the writings of the Polish divines, admitted the miraculous conception, and inculcated the worship of Christ. Dr. Priestley, however, anxious to remove what he considered the corruptions of Christianity, carried his Socinian principles to their full length, and taught that Jesus was a mere man, the son of Joseph and of Mary, and naturally as fallible and peccable as Moses, or any other prophet. This view of the nature of Christ is held by the modern school of Socinians in Britain, which may be said to have been founded by Dr. Priestley, and consolidated by Lindsey, Belsham, and others. That portion of their creed which relates to the person of Christ, and which may well entitle them to the appellation of Humanitarians, is thus expressed by Belsham in his 'Calm Inquiry': "That Jesus of Nazareth was "a man of exemplary character, constituted in all respects like other men, subject to the same infirmities, the same ignorance, prejudices, and frailties." See SOCINIANS.

HUMANITY (RELIGION OF), a species of infidelity which has grown up during the last twenty years in Britain and America. It is a kind of idealism, which resolves all true religion, not into any of the special forms of belief which are found in the world, but into the instincts of humanity. This system of thought is sometimes called the Absolute Religion, ignoring all written revelation, and finding religion only in the outward universe, and the inward man. Thus Theodore Parker, one of the most able expositors of the system, remarks, that "we are never to forget that there is no monopoly of religion by any nation or any age. Religion itself is one and the same. He that worships truly, by whatever form, worships the Only God. He hears the prayer, whether called Brahma, Jehovah, Pan, or Lord; or called by no name at all. Each people has its prophets and its saints; and many a swarthy Indian, who bowed down to wood and stone—many a grim-faced Calmuck, who worshipped the great God of storms—many a Grecian peasant, who did homage to Phoebus-Apollo when the Sun rose or went down—yes, many a savage, his hands smeared all over with human sacrifice, shall come forth from the east and west, and sit down in the kingdom of God, with Moses and Zoroaster, with Socrates and Jesus."

In regard to the name of the system, Mr. Parker says, "I call this the Absolute Religion, because it is drawn from the absolute and ultimate source; because it gives us the Absolute Idea of God—God as Infinite; and because it guarantees to man his natural rights, and demands the performance of the absolute duties of human nature." Mr. W. J. Fox, who, though formerly a Unitarian, has adopted a creed identical with that of Mr. Parker, calls it a Religion of Humanity, stating that, in his belief, "the source of all revelation is the moral constitution of human nature, the human mind and heart."

The views of the writers, both in England and America, who have adopted the Religion of Humanity, are thus set forth in the Westminster Review, which is their ablest organ in this country: "It is not the presence of God in antiquity, but his presence only there,—not his inspiration in Palestine, but his withdrawal from every spot besides,—not his supreme and unique expression in Jesus of Nazareth, but his absence from every other human medium,—against which these writers protest. They feel that the usual Christian advocate has adopted a narrow and even irreligious ground; that he has not found a satisfactory place in the Divine scheme of human affairs for the great Pagan world; that he has presumptuously branded all history but one as 'profane;' that he has not only read it without sympathy and reverence, but has used it chiefly as a foil to show off the beauty of evangelic truth and holiness, and so has dwelt only on the inadequacy of its philosophy, the deformity of its morals, the degenerate features of its social life; that he has forgotten the Divine infinitude when he assumes that Christ's plenitude of the Spirit implies the emptiness of Socrates. In their view, he has rashly undertaken to prove, not one positive fact,—a revelation of Divine truth in Galilee;—but an infinite negative;—no inspiration anywhere else. To this negation and to this alone is their remonstrance addressed. They do not deny a theophany in the gift of Christianity; but they deny two very different things, viz. 1. That this is the only theophany; and 2. That this is theophany alone; that is, they look for some divine elements elsewhere, and they look for some human here. It is not therefore a smaller, but a larger, religious obligation to history, which they are anxious to establish; and they remain in company with the Christian advocate so long as his devout and gentle mood continues; and only quit him when he enters on his sceptical antipathies."

One marked characteristic of this the latest form which infidelity has assumed, is a rejection of all outward revelation, except in so far as it is an expression of the fundamental beliefs inherent in our spiritual nature. It demands of every man that, if he would find religion, he must look not to the Bible, the Koran, or the Shastras, but to the original intuitions of his own heart. There he will find engraven in indelible characters the primitive idea of an Infinite God, and this one idea is sufficient in the view of the writers whose opinions we are now considering, to give shape and form, as well as impulse and energy, to the religion of every age and people. "Nor can these," says Mr. Hardwick, in his 'Christ and other Masters,' "be termed the speculations of a band of ignorant or dreamy mystics. They are entertained by men of learning; who profess moreover a peculiar interest in the progress of civilization, and who labour to advance what they believe to be the disenfranchisement of the human spirit. They affirm that something higher, deeper, heavenlier, is reserved for us; that growth must be expected and promoted not only in our apprehension of religious truth, but in the orb of truth itself; that their peculiar mission is to hasten this result by showing man his real dignity and destiny, by sounding all the depths of human consciousness, and calling to their aid the newest facts of history and the last discoveries of science. They do not, indeed, condemn the worthies of antiquity. The statues of Confucius, Moses, and Pythagoras; of Socrates and Zoroaster; of Buddha, Christ, and Apollonius; of Mani and Muhammed, are all elevated side by side in the Walhalla of spiritualism. These all in different measures are applauded as the saints, the prophets, the apostles of their age; yet, notwithstanding the enormous latitude of his belief, the spiritualist is not content with any of the forms in which religion has hitherto appeared on earth. However well adapted to peculiar countries or to transitory phases of the human mind, they are unequal to the wants and the capacities of the present century. He would not himself have worshipped either with his 'swarthy Indian who bowed down to wood and stone,' or with his 'grim-faced Calmuck,' or his 'Grecian peasant,' or his 'savage,' whose hands were 'smeared all over with human sacrifice; but rather aims, by analysing the principles of heathenism and cultivating a deeper sympathy with what is termed the 'great pagan world,' to organise a new system which he calls the Absolute Religion, the Religion of Humanity, the Religion of the Future. From it all special dogmas are to be eliminated; sentiments which every one may clothe according to his fancy, are to occupy the place of facts; the light of a spontaneous Gospel is to supersede the clumsy artifice of teaching by the aid of an historical revelation. Thus, while the promoters of this scheme affect the greatest reverence for the wisdom and the so-called 'inspirations' of the past, they aim to soar indefinitely above it. Nearly all the doctrines of ancient systems are abandoned or explained away, as things which really have no stronger claim upon us than the cycle of luxuriant myths that captivated Greek imaginations in the pre-historic period. The Christ and Christianity of the Bible are thus virtually denied: 'superior intellects' are bidden to advance still higher, to cast off as worthless or ill-fitting the old garments of the Church, to join the standard of the Absolute Religion, and so march forward to the 'promised land.'

The only positive and prominent article of the creed of this sect of infidels is, that there is one Infinite God, and beyond it is a mere series of negations. Thus Mr. Parker, "Of course I do not believe in a devil, eternal torment, nor in a particle of absolute evil in God's world or in God. I do not believe that there ever was a miracle, or ever will be; everywhere I find law,—the constant mode of operation of the Infinite God. I do not believe in the miraculous inspiration of the Old Testament or the New Testament. I do not believe that the Old Testament was God's first word, nor the New Testament his last. The Scriptures are no finality to me. Inspiration is a perpetual fact. Prophets and Apostles did not monopolize the Father: He inspires men to-day as much as heretofore. In nature, also, God speaks for ever. . . . I do not believe in the miraculous origin of the Hebrew Church, or the Buddhist Church, or the Christian Church: nor the miraculous character of Jesus. I take not the Bible for my master, nor yet the Church; nor even Jesus of Nazareth for my master. . . . I try all things by the human faculties. . . . But at the same time, I reverence the Christian Church for the great good it has done to mankind; I reverence the Mahometan Church for the good it has done,—a far less good."

Such is the Absolute Religion, or the Religion of Humanity, which some writers in our own day would extol as destined to form a new era in the history of religious thought, but which from its very meagreness and vagueness is in all probability destined ere long to dwindle away and be forgotten.

HUMILIATI, an order of Romish monks which originated in A. D. 1161. They were brought out of Lombardy into Germany, as captives by Barbarossa, who after a time permitted them to return into their own country, where they built monasteries, and gave themselves up to fasting, prayer, and meditation. They followed the rule of St. Benedict, and were approved and confirmed by Pope Innocent III. Their dress was a plain coat, a scapular, and a white cloak over it. They were suppressed by Pius V. in 1571, on account of the degenerate and immoral habits which had begun to characterize the monks of the order.

HUNGARIAN CONFESSION, a Confession of the Reformed Churches in Hungary, drawn up at a Synod held A. D. 1557. It consisted of eleven articles.

HUNGARY (PROTESTANT CHURCH OF). The kingdom of Hungary, though once mighty and powerful, has for some time been a mere political dependency of the Austrian empire. The climate is temperate and healthy, the inhabitants industrious and active, and the country, by proper cultivation, is capable of supplying within itself all that the necessities and comforts of life demand. When Rome was mistress of the world, Hungary was colonized by that warlike people, from whom it received the name of Dacia; and on the irruption of the northern nations, it was overrun, first by the Goths, and afterwards by the Huns, who were followed in succession by other equally savage tribes, until the days of Charlemagne.

The ninth century found Hungary in the hands of the Magyars, the ancestors of its present inhabitants, a rude and warlike, and withal, an idolatrous people, worshipping Mars as their chief god, and paying their adorations also to the sun and moon, the earth and fire. It was about this period, when the Magyar faith predominated, that Christianity began to be introduced into the country, and to spread silently and slowly, but not on that account the less surely, among all classes, from the palace to the peasant's hut.

It is with Stephen, a prince who ascended the throne in A. D. 997, at the early age of eighteen, that the history of Christianity in Hungary properly commences. The period of Stephen's accession had been preceded by events of the greatest magnitude and interest. Charlemagne had succeeded, though not without bloodshed, in spreading Christianity in Germany; and about the year 890, the Christian religion had been established in Bohemia. Poland not long after embraced the true faith; and missionaries from Italy and Greece poured into all parts of Hungary. No sooner had Stephen succeeded to the government, than under the influence of his pious mother and the Christian teachers, he made an open profession of Christianity, calling upon his people, under heavy penalties, to take the same step. Such a daring infringement of the rights of toleration was met by the most determined opposition on the part of the people, who broke out into open rebellion. The young king attacked the insurgents, and speed ily reduced them to subjection. Having succeeded in restoring quiet and order in the kingdom, he passed various laws in favour of Christianity, enforcing a strict observance of the Sabbath, building and endowing churches, establishing schools for the education of youth, and endeavouring in every possible way to advance the religious welfare of his people.

The beneficial influence of Stephen's exertions however was not long in being completely neutralized. The Magyars still loved their idolatry, and seized the first opportunity that occurred after the death of Stephen to demolish all that bore the Christian name. An attempt was made by more than one sovereign to repress the violence of the people, and to restore the true religion; but with the exception of Ladislaus, a long unbroken line of princes only prolonged the darkness which now covered the land. It is pleasing however to notice, that so early as the year 1176, there were many to be found in Hungary adhering to the doctrines of the Waldenses, who had sought an asylum in that country from the intolerance and persecutions of Rome. There that devoted people laboured for many years in spreading among the Magyars the pure and unsophisticated doctrines of Bible truth. Rapidly increasing in numbers, we find them, about the year 1315, amounting to 80,000. No wonder, that both from their numbers and their zeal, the Waldenses in Hungary should have caused no little anxiety to Rome. Calumny, the ever ready weapon of the Papacy, was resorted to with unsparing malignity. These active propagators of pure Christian truth were represented as teaching the most terrible heresies. But all was unavailing. The cause of Christ steadily advanced; and many, even of the nobility, embraced the new doctrines.

Thus did the Waldenses continue to maintain their ground in free Hungary until the reign of the emperor Sigismund, in the beginning of the fifteenth century. It was at this eventful period in the history of Protestant truth that John Huss arose, who, followed by Jerome of Prague and other pious and devoted men, openly proclaimed the Pope of Rome to be antichrist. The consequences of such plain declarations of their conscientious convictions were such as might have been expected wherever the Papacy is concerned. Both Huss and Jerome were burned at the stake. But these noble men died as became martyrs to the truth of God. On their way to the stake they sang hymns; and as Eneas Sylvius remarks, "no mere philosopher ever suffered the fiery death so nobly as these men did."

From that moment Protestant truth made the most astonishing progress. The Hussites, as they were now called, were to be found in multitudes in Hungary and Transylvania. The Scriptures were translated into the native language; and as a natural result, more especially in days of fiery persecution, the Word of God grew mightily and prevailed. In almost every part of Hungary, many congregations of the Hussites were formed, and churches built, where they worshipped God according to their consciences. The progress of Bible truth annoyed Rome very much; but what was to be done? If the Hussites were to be driven from Hungary, such a step would only propagate the evil, not arrest it. The new doctrines must be extirpated, whatever may be the consequences. Torrents of blood may flow, but Rome is inexorable. How true is it, that "she makes herself drunk with the blood of the saints." In the year 1444, Cardinal Julian concluded a contract with King Uladislaus, that the Hussites, wherever found, should be completely destroyed. Providence, however, thwarted this bloody decree. Before it could be carried into execution, King Uladislaus was killed in battle, and Cardinal Julian also was slain in attempting to escape. Thus did the Lord mercifully deliver his people, as he has often done of old, by the destruction of their foes.

Though the hand of persecution was thus mercifully stayed for a time, the Hussites became at every little interval the victims of the most cruel treatment, and always at the instigation of Rome. Representing them as maintaining opinions the most heretical and blasphemous, the adherents of the Papacy called upon the civil power to put forth its strong arm for their destruction. Too often were such appeals listened to, and these faithful followers of Jesus were subjected to sufferings of the most cruel and heartless description. It was remarkable, that for some time before the dawn of the Glorious Reformation, they were permitted to live in quietness and peace, prepared to hail the blessings of that happy era in the history of the Christian Church.

As the era of the Lutheran Reformation approached, religion in Hungary, as elsewhere, had degenerated into empty ceremony. Rome endeavoured as usual to support her authority and influence by the propagation of lying wonders; and the better educated among the people, especially among the nobility, were disgusted with the palpable tricks which were attempted to be palmed upon them. In this condition of things, more especially taken in connection with the previous success of the Hussites, the Reformation, as may easily be supposed, was hailed in Hungary as a happy deliverance from the ignoble fetters of a degrading and idolatrous superstition. No country more readily declared in favour of the Reformation. The way had no doubt been previously prepared to no small extent by the zealous labours of the Hussites, in proclaiming far and wide the truth as it is in Jesus; and the good seed of the Word had also been sown by the German troops, who came to help Hungary against the Turks. Accordingly, at so early a period as 1521, so numerous were the adherents of Luther in Hungary, that it was deemed necessary to read a condemnation of the writings of the Reformer from the pulpits of the principal churches.

One of the most zealous and active in propagating throughout Hungary the tenets of Luther was Simon Grynaeus, a professor in the academy in Ofen, who was in consequence imprisoned, but only for a short time, public opinion having risen so strongly in his favour as to demand his speedy liberation. For a considerable period the truth advanced among all classes, but a sudden and fearful check was given to its progress by the publication of the edict of King Louis in 1523, according to which, "All Lutherans, and those who favour them, as well as all adherents to the sect, shall have their property confiscated, and themselves be punished with death, as heretics and foes of the most Holy Virgin Mary." This violent decree, though it seemed to satisfy the priests, did not produce the desired effect. The truth still made progress, and at length in 1525, Louis was prevailed upon by the Romish clergy to issue a decree, that "All Lutherans shall be rooted out of the land; and wherever they are found, either by clergy or laymen, they may be seized and burned."

This bloody law Louis had so far yielded to the priests as to enact, but now that it was enacted he had not courage to execute it. All that he could be persuaded to do, was to write to the authorities of the different towns, reminding them of their duty. Providentially, at this critical period in the history of the Protestant Church in Hungary, political events arose which directed the attention of the king in another channel, and produced a most powerful effect on the progress of the Reformation in that country.

Soliman, the then reigning emperor of Turkey, was resolved upon the subjugation of Hungary. So boldly had he carried forward his plans, that early in 1526 Belgrade was taken; the Turkish emperor was already in Peterwardein, the Hungarian Gibraltar, and Louis, though his treasury was exhausted, was summoned to pay immediate tribute. On the 23d July, the king set out to meet his powerful enemy, and on the 29th August he was signally defeated in the plain of Mohács; and in attempting to fly, Louis's horse fell backwards, and crushed him to death in the mud. The carnage on that eventful day was tremendous. Seven bishops, twenty-eight princes, five hundred nobles, and twenty thousand warriors lay on the field.

This sanguinary engagement, while it cut off large numbers of the bitter persecutors of the truth, was productive of no ultimate benefit to the Protestant cause. On the death of Louis, two individuals contended for the throne, neither of them favourable to the Lutheran party. The consequence was, that persecution still raged in Hungary, prevented no doubt from reaching its former severity by the prevalence of civil war. With this unceasing strife time passed on, until at length arrived the 25th of June, 1530, when the Augsburg Confession was read. Its simplicity, clearness, and power, subdued many enemies, and converted them into decided friends of the truth.

About this time there arose in Hungary a man or whom the spirit of Luther had descended. Honoured with the friendship of the great reformer and his illustrious coadjutors, Matthew Devay had returned to his native land, resolved, in the strength of God, to preach the doctrines of the Reformation. He was remarkably successful in bringing over converts from Popery; and for this heinous crime he was imprisoned in Ofen. The following little anecdote connected with Devay's imprisonment is well worth relating: "It happened that in the same prison was a blacksmith, who in the shoeing had lamed the king's favourite horse, and the passionate John had sworn that he should die for it. The blacksmith heard Devay converse as never man spoke; the words were to him as the words of Paul to the jailer at Philippi, and the consequence was, that when the blacksmith was shortly after to be set free, he declared he would share Devay's fate as a martyr, for he also partook of the same faith. The king moved by this declaration, pardoned both, and set them free."

Soon after his liberation, Devay became pastor of Kashaw in Upper Hungary, which was then in the possession of Ferdinand. Jealous of the success of his eloquent invectives against Rome, the monks complained of him to the king, who had him brought immediately to Vienna, and given over for examination to Dr. Faber, the bitterest foe of the Reformation. For nearly two years Devay lay in prison, at the end of which time Ferdinand relented and liberated him.

This apostolic man was no sooner delivered from prison than he proceeded to itinerate in Hungary, preaching the Gospel, and assisting in the translation of the Epistles of Paul into the Hungarian language. Overjoyed with the thought that the truth was making such progress in Hungary, Devay hastened to Wittenberg to refresh the heart of Luther with the glad tidings. They were men of a kindred spirit, and no greater happiness did they know on earth than in hearing that the cause of God was advancing. In his absence, Devay's pastoral charge in Upper Hungary was occupied by a man of great learning and Christian courage, Stephen Szantai. A man of this stamp was not likely to escape the persecution of the monks, who demanded of Ferdinand that he should be arrested and punished as a heretic. The king, however, who had before this time relaxed in his opposition to the Protestant faith, proposed, to the dismay of the priests, that a public discussion should be held on the great disputed points of religion. This discussion took place in 1538. To oppose Stephen Szantai the monks had chosen Gregory of Grosswardein. Szantai continued the discussion for several days, and after the umpires had noted all down, they came to present their decision to the king. They reported that all which Szantai had said was founded on the Scriptures, and that the monks had brought forward only fables and idle tales. "But," they added, "should we state this publicly, we are lost, for we should be represented as enemies to our religion; if we condemn Szantai, we act contrary to truth and justice, and would not escape Divine retribution." They begged, therefore, that the king would protect them from the danger on both sides. Ferdinand promised to do his utmost, and let them go.

From the tenderness which Ferdinand showed to Stephen Szantai, it appears plain, that Ferdinand's mind had undergone a great change; but that it was really a saving change, we have no satisfactory grounds for believing.

One circumstance which tended to promote the progress of Protestantism in Hungary, was the constant correspondence which the Reformers maintained with those of the princes and clergy, who were known to be friendly to the new movement. The truth spread far and wide among all classes of the people, and King Ferdinand, perceiving that the chasm which separated the Protestants from Rome was every day becoming wider, urged earnestly upon the Pope that he should summon a general council. At length the Council of Trent was appointed to meet on the 13th December, 1545. Two distinguished bishops were despatched as deputies from Hungary, and the instructions which they received show clearly that the king's views were far from unfavourable to the Reformation.

"Ferdinand charged them to use their influence to bring on the discussion respecting a reformation of morals first, and of faith afterwards; to have a reformation in the court at Rome; to have the number of cardinals reduced to twelve or twenty-four; to have the number of indulgences diminished; to have simony completely abolished, as well as all payments in spiritual matters; to have the clergy brought back to their original purity in dress, morals, and doctrines; to have the eating of flesh permitted, and the Lord's Supper administered in both kinds."

The sittings of this far-famed council lasted for eighteen years, during which those decrees were passed which form the established creed of the Roman Catholic Church down to the present day.

Ferdinand could not conceal from the Pope the deep disappointment which he felt at the result of the Council of Trent, more particularly in forbidding the cup to the laity. The remonstrance which he tendered, along with the advice of some of the bishops, extorted a bull in favour of communion in both kinds,—a concession which gave so much delight to Ferdinand that he had a medal struck to commemorate the transaction. It was not, however, until his son Maximilian I. succeeded to the throne that permission to the laity to use the cup in the sacrament was extended to Hungary. This prince, throughout the whole of his reign seems to have treated the Protestants with lenity if not with favour. With his son Rudolph, however, begins a period of thirty-two years, which for the Church in Hungary abounded in sufferings and trials. It was by this cruel and bigoted king that the decree was passed, which once more sanctioned the persecution of all who dissented from the Church of Rome. In vain did the States protest against a decree so arbitrary and intolerant; the Protestant clergy were expelled in multitudes, and Popish priests appointed in their place.

The peace of Vienna, which was concluded on the 23d June, 1606, put an end for a time to the troubles of the Church in Hungary. It declared the persecuting decree to which we have just referred, to be illegal; it set aside all decrees which had been passed against the Protestants; it proclaimed liberty of conscience and free exercise of worship. The hero of this great achievement for the Protestant Church was destined to see little of its fruits. It was but a few months till the prince, in the vigour of manhood, sunk into his grave. He died from poison, on the 7th January, 1607, to the great grief of the Protestants by whom the loss of a prince so noble and generous was severely felt.

The Roman party now acquired fresh courage. The persecuting enactments were renewed, and attempts were made to crush the liberties of the Hungarian Church. In the providence of God, however, Hungary and Austria were transferred from Rudolph to his brother Matthew, who declared upon oath his determination to protect the rights and privileges of the Protestants. One of their party was elected palatine, and by his influence the Synod of Sillein was summoned, which went far by its decrees to place the Church of Hungary on a secure footing. The Popish party were exasperated. Within eighteen days the Cardinal and Archbishop Forgacs protested against the decrees, and pronounced a curse upon all who should observe them. The Protestants replied with the most determined boldness. A controversy ensued, which was conducted with intense bitterness on both sides. The Papists, however, through the influence which they possessed at court, succeeded in bringing the reformed party into fresh and even severer troubles. No attack made upon them did them so much injury as the appearance of a work, entitled 'The Guide to Truth,' which was published at Presburg in 1613. The author in this volume defended, with no small ingenuity, the doctrines of Rome, and represented Luther and Calvin as servants of Antichrist. Many were by this book—which was full of plausible reflections—drawn back into the Romish Church. Years passed away, and this dangerous work remained unanswered; the time was wasted in unseemly quarrels between the two sections of the Protestant Church—the Reformed and the Lutheran. These quarrels were very acceptable to the Romish clergy, but notwithstanding their dissensions the Protestant party continued to maintain their protest against Rome with firmness and zeal.

In the year 1618, through the influence of the Jesuits, the Hungarian crown fell to the Archduke Ferdinand of Austria. At this period matters were in a very critical condition. "All Europe was in such a state of religious excitement as had not been the case since the time of Luther; and this was the work of the Jesuits and Pope Clement VIII., who had entered into a contract with the princes and kings of Europe, since the beginning of the century, to annihilate the Protestant name. As the storm raises the water, and drives the mud and scum to the top of the waves, so did they by their immoral principles goad the nations to madness. They had, within the memory of that generation, made France a great churchyard; and in the St. Bartholomew's Day—the height of their glory—they showed what they could do when aided by debased women and a fanatical king. By the Gunpowder Plot they would have destroyed England's liberty, had not Providence interfered and prevented. In Carinthia, Styria, and Austria, they had, in the name of the one true Church, 'out of which is no salvation,' practised deeds which cried to high heaven for a speedy vengeance. In Hungary, Bohemia, and Transylvania, they deserved the credit of having done only all the evil they could. In these lands, where a recognized constitution existed, and where considerable civil and political liberty prevailed, their influence was limited, and the people took to arms rather than bow themselves under the yoke of tyranny and unjust persecution."

With the reign of Leopold, however, in 1657, began the golden age of the Jesuits, and the decay of the Hungarian Church. The king, the Popish nobles, and the army, all combined to do their utmost to eradicate Protestantism from the land. But a small witnessing remnant were still to be found. "Putting their lives in their hands, there were a few pastors who either had not been summoned to Presburg, or who had not gone, and in lonely glens, in woods and mountains wild, in ruined castles and morasses, inaccessible except for the initiated, these men resided, and preached the Gospel to the faithful who were scattered over the land. From the dark cavern, scantily lighted, arose the psalm of praise sung to those wild melodies which to this day thrill the heart of the worshipper. From lips pale and trembling with disease, arising from a life spent in constant fear and danger, the consolations of the Gospel were proclaimed to the dying. The Lord's Supper was administered; fathers held up their infants to be devoted in baptism to Him for whom they themselves were willing to lay down their lives; and, amid the tears which oppression wrung from them, they joined their hands and looked up to Him who bottles up the tears, and looked forward to a better land beyond the grave."

This melancholy state of matters continued until the death of Leopold in 1705. His successor was Joseph the First of Austria, whose accession to the throne proved the dawn of a better day to the Hungarian Church. But alas! how short. In the midst of his benevolent efforts to restore peace and harmony among his subjects, he was suddenly cut off by an attack of small-pox.

Shortly after the sudden and unexpected death of Joseph the First, the Protestant Church in Hungary obtained a considerable share of religious freedom by the establishment of the "Peace of Szathmar," which was signed on the 10th May, 1711. For some time the Popish bishops attempted to evade the conditions of this famous treaty, but the succession of Charles to the vacant throne put an end to the arbitrary acts of the clergy, and secured impartial justice to the Protestants. At length, however, the Romanist party so far succeeded in gaining an influence over the mind of the king, that he was prevailed upon, at their instigation, to pass an edict, imposing various restrictions upon the Protestant pastors. Such public enactments were extorted from Charles completely in opposition to his own individual wishes; and on all fitting occasions, therefore, he lent his powerful protection to the oppressed adherents of the Protestant cause, defending them, as far as he possibly could, from their sworn enemies—the Jesuits. But in secret defiance of the royal inclination, freedom of conscience and of religious worship were little more than nominally enjoyed. At length the complaints which reached the king were so numerous, that a royal commission was summoned to meet at Pesth on the 16th March, 1721, with the view of adjusting matters between the two great religious parties in the country. The attempt proved utterly abortive. The commission was completely divided in opinion. Warm debates arose, and at length the king found it necessary to adjourn the meeting sine die.

Charles was at heart an amiable and kind-hearted person. He grieved over the feuds and animosities which so much disturbed the tranquillity of his kingdom. Many were his efforts to establish harmony and peace, but all had hitherto been unsuccessful. At length he hoped to find a remedy for these crying evils, in the establishment of a new court, which he constituted under the name of a deputy privy council. It consisted of twenty-two members, nominated by the king—the Palatine being always president; and the purpose for which it had been appointed, was to publish and to watch over the execution of the laws of the land. This council, however, completely disappointed the expectations of the king. Instead of being impartial, all its decisions were one-sided; so that it was well termed by one of the Popish bishops of the time, the "hammer of the heretics." The king's influence in favour of the Protestants was now gradually decreasing. He summoned a diet at Presburg in 1729, but without the least effect. Still the Protestants hoped, that when the report of the Pesth Commission should be given in and examined, the king would have good ground for publishing an authoritative edict in their favour.

Here, also, their hopes were blasted. Charles issued a series of resolutions, which infringed upon the rights of the Protestants, and gave no small encouragement to the Popish party. In vain did the Protestants remonstrate. The king followed up his "Resolutions" by an Imperial decree, directing all the churches still in possession of the Protestants, which had not been guaranteed to them, to be confiscated.

The sovereign was now completely under the influence of the Jesuits. The kingdom was ruled on the principles of Rome. No promise, no contract, no oath, was kept with heretics. Even the private religious exercises, in the families of the Protestant nobility, were often prohibited on the most frivolous and vexatious grounds. The writings of Protestant authors were subjected to a strict censorship, which was entirely in the hands of the Jesuits, whose arbitrary decisions knew no limits. Feeble attempts were made by the Court of Vienna to check the tyrannical domination exercised over the Protestants; but Rome has a thousand means of defeating the temporal power, and the persecution therefore, though perhaps in a more concealed form, raged as fiercely as ever.

At length Charles VI. died, and was succeeded by his daughter, Maria Theresa, who was crowned on the 18th March 1741. Shortly after the new sovereign had ascended the throne, and even before her coronation, a deputation appeared in Vienna, and presented a petition, setting forth, in strong colours, the numerous grievances of the Hungarian Protestants. To this petition, the queen, by the advice first of her chancellor, and then of her privy council, returned no answer. The queen and the Protestant cause were still in the hands of the Jesuits. The utmost restrictions were put upon the Protestant schools. The popish bishops and archdeacons interfered in a most provoking way with all the affairs of the Protestant churches. In many cases the marriage with Protestants was forbidden unless the Protestant party should consent to join the Church of Rome; or if it was tolerated, all the children were regarded as by right belonging to that church. The husband was no longer "the head of the wife" in this respect, but all must be subject to the priests, who made themselves "lords over God's heritage."

Several foreign powers, but more especially the King of Prussia, attempted to interfere on behalf of the Protestants, but without much effect. The Jesuits and their colleagues, the Romish bishops of Hungary, continued to carry on the work of persecution. Heavy fines were imposed for holding religious meetings; the Protestants were removed from all civil offices, and their pastors were subjected to examination by the bishops and archbishops.

It is impossible to enumerate the complicated trials and sufferings to which the Protestants in Hungary were exposed under the reign of Maria Theresa. The Seven Years' War with Prussia broke out, but brought with it no relief to the persecuted Protestants; and when at length, in 1763, the peace of Hubertsburg was ratified, Popish intolerance continued as strong as ever.

On the death of her husband, Francis First, who was cut off in 1765, Maria Theresa gave her son Joseph a share in the government. This arrangement was productive of little improvement in the state of the Protestants. About this time the Romanists commenced a system of active proselytising in Hungary, erecting missionary institutions in the districts where the Protestants chiefly resided, and engaging in street and field preaching, with the view of gaining over, if possible, some to the adoption of Popish principles. But these efforts were almost entirely fruitless. The Bible was so widely diffused among the Protestants, and they were so well acquainted with Scripture truth, that they had no relish for those idle legends and miraculous tales in which the sermons of the friars so much abounded.

It so happened, in the providence of God, that about this time the Emperor Joseph set out on a tour through his Hungarian dominions. This brought him much in contact with Protestants, with whom he freely conversed, and thus became intimately acquainted with their grievances. He was not long in discovering, that the Jesuits were the principal cause of all the calamities and immorality which prevailed. The influence, besides, of the minister Kaunitz over the mind of the Empress was considerable, and this influence he used to turn her against the Jesuits. In 1773, accordingly, was the order of the Jesuits suspended, and with the banishment of these enemies of the truth a new day dawned upon Hungary. The Protestant church now began to rouse herself from the torpor into which she had fallen. The Roman Catholic priests and bishops were prohibited from having any communication with Rome, otherwise than through the foreign secretary at the Court of Vienna. It was forbidden to apply to Rome for dispensations in case of marriage and for divorces. New decrees were from time to time published, limiting the authority of the priests and relieving the Protestants. On the 24th March, 1781, all connection was ordered to be broken off between the monasteries of the country and foreign monks or inspectors. None but natives could be received into the religious brotherhoods, and neither monks nor nuns dared collect money to send out of the kingdom. It was also ordered, that no papal bull should be published in any part of the empire without first having obtained the emperor's sanction.

This was the dawning of a bright day for the Protestants. But in this same year (1781) the great principles of Christian freedom were nobly vindicated by the publication of the Edict of Toleration, which gave full liberty to the Protestants to follow out their conscientious convictions without let or hinderance of any kind. Soon after the promulgation of this famous and welcome edict, a meeting of Protestants was held at Pesth, at which a vote of thanks to the emperor was passed, which was written in Latin and German, and sent to Vienna under charge of a numerous deputation.

The reforms introduced by Joseph were far from being agreeable to the Papists, who now felt that their authority and influence were completely destroyed. The Pope, Pius VI., became alarmed, and he resolved to pay a visit to the minister Kaunitz, hoping to gain him over to his side, and in this way perhaps to influence the Emperor. Kaunitz, however, received his Holiness without any ceremony, and cautiously avoided all allusion to ecclesiastical topics. The emperor hoped that the recent measures of toleration were approved by his Holiness, but assured him at the same time, that if they were not, he could dispense with his approbation. The Pope, having received from Joseph a present of a cross set with diamonds, value £20,000, went on his way to Rome, and the emperor pursued his course of reform quite unmoved. The Protestants were permitted to print their Bibles and other religious books in the country. The books, but especially the Bible, which had been confiscated during the previous reign, were ordered to be restored, and, shortly after, the compulsory attendance of Protestant children on Popish schools was dispensed with.

Such measures naturally enraged the adherents of the Church of Rome, and calumny, her usual weapon, was employed against the emperor—the report being widely spread, that he was disposed to leave the Romanist and join the Protestant party. So far had this groundless rumour been diffused, that Joseph found it necessary to publish a disclaimer in the most earnest terms. He did not however pause for a moment in the work of reform. A national school system, on the most liberal plan, was introduced, and the Protestant schools were placed on the best footing. In the year 1785 all bishops were removed from the civil and judicial offices which they held, and their power in other respects was very much limited. The time was not to be long, however, in which the Protestants could enjoy such favours. The emperor was hastening fast to his grave. On the 28th January, 1790, he was so far exhausted with the opposition made to his benevolent plans, that with his own hand he withdrew many of the reforms which he had introduced; but he still retained the famous Edict of Toleration and the new parishes which he had formed. In less than a month he was found sitting up in his bed in the attitude of prayer, but life had fled.

The reign of Leopold II., who succeeded to the throne on the death of Joseph, was very brief, but long enough to manifest with sufficient clearness that the new sovereign was resolved to follow in the steps of his predecessor. In February, 1792, he was cut off by a violent inflammation, and his son, Francis I., succeeded to the government. This was the commencement of a new series of an-noyances and persecutions which the Protestants experienced at the hands of the Romanists. The cruelties of the French Revolution gave the Roman party an opportunity of representing their church as the only bulwark against anarchy. According to them, the Revolution was the cause of all the evils in France. The king was often absent, and advantage was frequently taken of this circumstance to treat the Protestants with harshness and severity. Francis wanted firmness, and matters therefore grew gradually worse, until at length, in 1799, a complaint and petition, occupying sixty sheets, was handed to the emperor; but pretexts of one kind or another were constantly found to leave the Protestants without relief. Attempts were meanwhile made to reduce their number, by encouraging the youth to be sent to Roman Catholic schools.

The state of the Continent, for the first sixteen years of the present century, was such, that little could be done to protect the Hungarian Protestants against the persecutions of the Romanists. At length, in April, 1817, a deputation from both the Lutheran and Reformed Churches proceeded to Vienna, with the view of laying their grievances at the foot of the throne. The emperor received them with the utmost civility, and promised, along with the Prime Minister Metternich, to see that justice was done to the Protestants of Hungary. These promises, however, were far from being realized. A time of severe trial soon broke loose on Hungary, and the schools experienced the withering blast. When the king came to Hungary in 1822, a Protestant deputation again waited upon him, and was kindly received. After a lengthened audience, the deputation was dismissed with the assurance, that on his return to Vienna, the emperor would attend to all their grievances and have them redressed. In vain do we search for any of the good fruits which the Protestants anticipated from this interview with the emperor. A diet was summoned at Presburg in 1825, and here the Protestants did their utmost to obtain relief, but the majority was too heavy against them. Matters continued much in the same state until the death of the king in 1835.

With the death of the king the Protestants had expected a change of ministry, but Metternich still continued at the head of the government, and all went on as before. In 1843 a royal resolution appeared, declaring that all the different confessions should have equal rights and privileges, and at the same time recommending that the education of the children of mixed marriages should be left to the free choice of the parents, as they might choose to agree between themselves. This royal resolution was unsatisfactory both to Protestants and Papists.

The Hungarian insurrection, which broke out soon after this period, was not a little hastened on by the publication of an edict by General Haynau, threatening the extinction of the Protestant Church of Hungary. Sorrow, astonishment, and abhorrence, were the feelings awakened in the minds of the Protestants on the publication of this edict. Private meetings were held to consider how the impending evil was to be averted. Upwards of ten deputations in succession appeared before the throne, begging for relief in this critical emergency, but in vain. In the year 1851, the church wished to hold several meetings, and sent deputations to Vienna to state their wishes; but the deputations were refused permission to go to Vienna.

Recently both the Lutheran and Calvinistic communities in Hungary have begun to display an independent and energetic spirit, which has not a little surprised the government of Austria. They have positively rejected a ministerial programme of a "Constitution for the Protestant Church," and have taken steps to petition the Emperor to permit them to draw up a Constitution for themselves, and to lay it before him for his sanction. The resolutions which have been taken by the Lutherans beyond the Theiss, are, 1. To petition his majesty to permit a general synod to assemble and to draw up a Constitution. 2. That the ministerial draft was not acceptable, because it was in a spirit foreign to the Hungarian Protestant Church, and would tend to further principles which Hungarian Protestants can never subscribe to. What the Protestants require is, (1.) That the Protestant schools shall be under the exclusive direction of Protestants. (2.) That there shall be no hierarchy in the Hungarian Protestant Church, but that, as has heretofore been the case, the affairs of the communities shall be managed by laymen as well as clergymen. (3.) That the high Consistorial Council (Oberkirchenrath) shall be appointed by the synod, and not by the state. (4.) As a rule, publicity in clerical matters, but the consultations of the consistories shall be private. (5.) The communities shall be at liberty to give positive instructions to their deputies how to act. (6.) The protocols of the "Local Convent" shall be submitted to the elders, and those of the "Convent of Elders" to the superintendents. (7.) The spheres of action of the General Convent, District Convents, and General Synods, shall be the same as they are now. The superintendents and district inspectors shall be elected. (8.) The topographical distribution of the various superintendencies shall remain unchanged.

The Protestants in Hungary are earnestly desirous to reorganize their own church and schools, but they have sustained no small discouragement and damage from the stringent manner in which the Romish clergy carry out the provisions of the concordat which has been lately concluded between the Austrian government and the Papal see. The Hungarian Protestants are calculated to number somewhere about three millions, including both the Lutheran and the Reformed communions, and although the utmost efforts are put forth by the Romanists to prevent secessions from their body, numbers are every year found to join the ranks of Protestantism. "But to enable the Church of Hungary," we use the language of Merle D'Aubigné, "to take the position that belongs to her among the other reformed churches, the pure faith held by the children of God must become mighty within her. She must, in obedience to the Word of God, believe with the heart and confess with the mouth, the fall of man through Adam's transgression—his corruption through sin—his utter inability to raise himself from the miserable condition into which he has fallen—the eternal Godhead of the Son of God, who became man, and was offered up for us on the altar of the cross—justification by faith, which, resting upon that sacrifice, rescues the sinner from the death which he has deserved, and gives him eternal life;—finally, the Holy Ghost (God as well as the Father and the Son) ruling in the heart by the Word, and liberating it from the law of sin. It is necessary, then, that the Church of God in Hungary should confess in heartfelt sincerity, with Luther, as have also confessed Calvin and all the other Reformers: 'The first and principal article of our faith is, that Jesus Christ our God and Lord died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. All have sinned and are justified freely by his grace without works or merit of their own, by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus through his blood. No pious man can give up any portion of this belief, even if heaven, and earth, and all things, should be involved in ruin. In this belief is contained all that we teach, bear witness to in our lives, and act upon, in spite of the Pope, the devil, and the whole world.'

"If faith in these articles be a living principle in the church of Hungary, that church is secure. We demand then of that church to hold this belief, to proclaim it from the pulpit, to keep it alive in the heart. We make this demand for the sake of its forefathers, for the sake of its martyrs, for the sake of its own life and prosperity, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which is pronounced over the heads of all its children. This church has been illustrious in ancient times, and ought at the present period to rise up and again take her place among us. Perhaps she may only be able to raise herself amidst privation and tears, bound like Lazarus 'with grave-clothes, and swathed in a shroud;' but if she lives by faith, that is sufficient: her reward will not fail her."

HUNTINGDON'S (COUNTESS OF) CONNEXION, a denomination of Christians in England, which originated in the first half of the eighteenth century, with Lady Selina Shirley, Countess of Huntingdon. The mind of her Ladyship had been from early childhood impressed with the importance of Divine things, and though her views of the way of salvation were not then satisfactory and clear, yet even after she became involved in the cares and anxieties of a married life, she took a particular delight in the diligent and prayerful perusal of the Word of God. While thus carefully studying her Bible, and scrupulously observant of the outward ordinances of religion, this amiable lady was as yet a stranger to the power of a living Christianity. About this time, however, her attention was called to the earnest and energetic labours of the Methodists, who had recently commenced a work of revival and reformation in England. She became deeply interested in the missionary work, which was actively carried on by Whitefield, John and Charles Wesley, and others. Several of Lady Huntingdon's sisters had, through the instrumentality of these truly devoted and apostolic men, been brought to a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Amid the awakening influences of this time of revival, her Ladyship's mind began to be aroused to more serious reflection upon her state before God; and while in this condition of mental anxiety, having been seized with a severe and almost fatal illness, she availed herself of the opportunity which her sickness afforded for calm meditation and prayer, which, by God's blessing, resulted in inward satisfaction and peace.

No sooner had Lady Huntingdon recovered her wonted health than she set herself to commence a life of active usefulness. She attended steadily, accompanied by her husband, on the ministry of Mr. Whitefield, and so highly did she prize his valuable instructions, that she selected him to be her chaplain. The Methodists now entered upon a system of lay-preaching, which gave great offence to many pious members of the Church of England, but which, nevertheless, appeared to her Ladyship as a plan likely under God to be productive of much good. It was quite plain that the low state of religion at the time called for some extraordinary measures to prevent the light of the gospel from being altogether extinguished in many districts of the country. The zeal and energy, however, which Wesley and his followers displayed, attracted, as might have been expected, keen opposition from many, both in and out of the Established Church, and not only were the Methodists, in this early stage of their history, called to encounter much violent opposition from without, but they were also exposed to bitter dissensions and discouragements from within. Many of the Moravians had found their way into the infant sect, and sought actively to propagate among its members their peculiar opinions. The chief scene of the bitter contentions which ensued was Fetter Lane chapel, London, which was at length abandoned by the Methodists, and given up wholly to the Moravians. Lady Huntingdon retired with the Wesleys and their followers to the Foundry, Upper Moorfields. For a time Charles Wesley favoured the Moravian sentiments, and a rupture between the two brothers seemed to be impending, when, through the judicious intervention of Lady Huntingdon, not only was a separation prevented, but Charles Wesley was led to renounce the errors which he had adopted.

The itinerant labours of the Methodist preachers began to be attended with no small success, and some of the most determined enemies of lay preaching became its warmest friends. Lady Huntingdon was deeply impressed with the peculiar advantages of such a mode of extending the gospel, more especially among the simple peasantry of the rural districts. She resolved, accordingly, to try the plan in the neighbourhood of her own residence, Donnington Park. She despatched one of her servants, David Taylor, to preach the gospel in the surrounding villages and hamlets, and so favourable was the result, that, with her Ladyship's sanction, this plain pious man extended the range of his missionary labours to various parts of Cheshire and Derbyshire, where the fruits of his preaching were soon apparent in the conversion of not a few to the knowledge and experience of the truth.

Donnington Park now became a centre of attraction to pious men of all Christian denominations, but more especially to the adherents of Wesley and Whitefield. The first Methodist Conference was held in London on the 25th June 1744. It was attended by only six ministers and four travelling preachers. Lady Huntingdon, who was then in London, invited them to her house, and treated them with the utmost hospitality and kindness. This devout lady watched with the greatest interest every movement of the rising sect, sympathizing with them in their difficulties, and by her money, her counsel, her influence, and her prayers, she was of invaluable service to the Methodist body. No doubt, her exertions in their behalf exposed her to much reproach and bitter obloquy, but she had counted the cost, and was ready to endure all for Christ. But while she meekly bore the insults heaped upon herself, when the faithful men, who were preaching the gospel under her auspices were assailed, she came boldly forward and claimed the protection of government, and even the interposition of the sovereign in their behalf.

The leaders of the Methodist body were not men who would shrink from discharging their duty to their heavenly Master through fear of their fellow-men; they only waxed more and more bold under the persecution to which they were subjected. And at length the body asserted for itself a high and conspicuous place among the Christian denominations of the land. Their useful and self-denying labours in the diffusion of the gospel, both in town and country, secured for them the warm approval, and, in many cases, the earnest prayers and cordial co-operation of good men. Government itself extended its countenance as well as protection to the once reviled and calumniated Methodists, and Lady Huntingdon had the gratification of seeing the good work carried forward without molestation throughout all parts of England.

After the death of Lord Huntingdon, which happened in 1746, her Ladyship evinced a more active interest than before in the progress of the Methodist cause. Having soon after taken up her residence in London, she employed Mr. Whitefield to preach at her house twice a-week. Numbers, chiefly of the nobility, both English and Scotch, attended on these occasions, and some of them in consequence underwent a saving change.

Mr. Whitefield and Mr. Wesley laboured together for several years with unbroken harmony and peace. But in 1748 dissensions arose between them on some of the vital doctrines of Christianity; the views of the former being Calvinistic, and of the latter Arminian. Lady Huntingdon favoured the opinions of Mr. Whitefield, and when a separation took place between the two leaders of the Methodist body, she attached herself to the Whitefield or Calvinistic party. She contributed liberally to the erection of Tottenham-court chapel, and it afforded her sincere satisfaction, when, on the 7th November 1756, it was opened for Divine worship according to the forms of the Church of England. About this time Lady Huntingdon established a college at Trevecca in South Wales, for the education and training of young men for the office of the ministry. She erected also a number of churches at various places, such as Worcester, Gloucester, and Bath. In one year (1775) four chapels were erected by her Ladyship at Bristol, Lewes, Petworth, and Guildford. She spent some portion of every year at Trevecca, sending out the students to preach in the destitute districts of the country, and encouraging them to go forward in preparation for the work of the ministry. She sent some of the young men also to itinerate in Ireland, and at her suggestion several of them set out as missionaries to North America.

In the year 1770 a very important controversy arose between the Calvinistic and the Arminian Methodists. From the minutes of the Wesleyan Conference of that year, it appeared that several erroneous tenets were held and avowed by that division of the Methodist body. Lady Huntingdon and the Calvinistic Methodists generally, entered upon the controversy with an earnest desire to uphold what they considered to be the truth of God. A keen and protracted contest ensued, which, though suspended for a time in consequence of the excitement occasioned by the breaking out of the American war, was renewed and carried on for several years with great ardour and ability by Mr. Toplady and Mr. Rowland Hill on the one side, and Mr. Wesley and Mr. Fletcher on the other. The most bitter and caustic remarks were indulged in on both sides; and for several successive years the two sections of Methodists were more hostile to each other than any other differing sects in Christendom.

The unwearied exertions of Lady Huntingdon to promote the progress of evangelical religion throughout England, could scarcely fail to awaken the eager hostility of many. But the most determined of her opponents was the Rev. William Sellon, minister of St. James's, Clerkenwell, London, who raised an action against several devoted ministers belonging to the Establishment for the crime of preaching in her Ladyship's chapels. To avoid all further molestation it was resolved to take shelter under the Toleration Act; and, accordingly, several of the Established ministers seceded and took the oaths of allegiance as dissenting ministers—retaining such part of the church service as is allowed to the Dissenters by the canons. The processes raised in the Consistorial courts against several of the clergy of the Established Church, led Messrs. Romaine, Venn, Townsend, and others, to withdraw from the service of her Ladyship's connexion, though they continued still to hold the most friendly private intercourse with her and her ministers.

It had from the beginning been the earnest wish of Lady Huntingdon that both she and her connexion should not sever the tie which bound them to the Church of England. They were most reluctant to assume the position of Dissenters, but in consequence of the processes instituted in the Ecclesiastical courts, and the law laid down on the subject, which proclaimed them Dissenters, no alternative was left them, and, accordingly, in 1783, they were compelled to become a separate and independent body, at the same time retaining the Liturgy with a few modifications, the forms, and even the vestments of the Church of England, without its Episcopacy. A Confession of Faith, being in substance the same with the Thirty-Nine Articles, was drawn up in consequence of the altered position of the body, and a declaration was set forth, that "some things in the Liturgy, and many things in the discipline and government of the Established Church, being contrary to Holy Scripture, they have felt it necessary to secede."

One circumstance which forced on the Secession more quickly than it would otherwise have happened, was the refusal on the part of the English bishops to ordain the young men trained at Trevecca. Now therefore that the tie was completely severed, and the "Connexion" was left to its own independent action, the ordination of six students took place at Spa-fields chapel, which her Ladyship had recently purchased. The solemn service was conducted by two presbyters of the Church of England, who had resigned their charges and joined the new denomination. An attempt was now made on the part of the Ecclesiastical Courts to deny the legality of the proceedings of the Connexion, to shut up their chapels, and silence their ministers. But at length the regularity and completeness of the act of Secession having been recognized, the legal position of the chapels was fixed by the Spiritual Courts as Dissenting Chapels, and tolerated accordingly. The body was permitted therefore to prosecute its great work without further molestation or hindrance.

Hitherto the great burden of conducting the affairs of her numerous chapels had mainly devolved upon Lady Huntingdon herself, with the assistance of trustees in the different localities; but now feeling the infirmities of age, she was desirous of adopting some plan for perpetuating the great work which she had so successfully begun. With this view she took steps for the formation of an Association composed of ministers and laymen; but in consequence of the opposition of Dr. Haweis and Lady Ann Erskine, the scheme was abandoned. Her wishes in this matter being frustrated, she turned her attention to the best mode of settling her chapels on a proper basis. This was a point of some difficulty, in consequence of the existing state of the law of England, which declared all bequests of buildings or lands for religious or even charitable uses to be null and void. Her Ladyship, accordingly, having consulted with several legal friends on the subject, came to the resolution of adopting the only mode of settlement which remained to her, that of leaving the chapels and houses by will to certain persons, with unrestricted power to sell or dispose of the same to such uses as they might think proper. Following up this resolution, she bequeathed them to Dr. Haweis and his wife, Lady Ann Erskine, and Mr. Lloyd. These four trustees accordingly, at the death of Lady Huntington, which took place on the 17th June 1791, obtained possession of her chapels, and employed them strictly in accordance with her Ladyship's wishes. The college was also vested in seven trustees, who have the sole power of admitting and rejecting students, as well as of appointing and dismissing tutors. The young men are left at liberty when their studies are completed, "to serve in the ministry of the Gospel, either in the late Countess of Huntington's Connexion, or in the Established Church, or in any other of the churches of Christ." This theological seminary is one of the wealthiest of the Dissenting colleges in England. The allotted term of study is four years, the maintenance and education being entirely free. The lease of the college at Trevecca having expired in 1792, about a year after her Ladyship's decease, the institution was removed by the trustees to Chesham, where it still exists in a state of efficiency and usefulness.

Lady Huntington's Connexion is a trust rather than a separate sect or denomination; and is strongly bound by affinity with the Calvinistic Methodists. The original mode of supplying the churches was by itinerancy, as in the case of the Wesleyan body; but for some time a settled ministry has been deemed preferable. The Liturgy of the Church of England is generally used, while the ministers are also in the habit of offering extemporary prayers. Although the term "Connexion" is applied to the body, they do not exist in the form of a federal ecclesiastical union. The Congregational mode of church government is practically in operation among them; and of late years several of the congregations have joined the Congregationalist communion. The number of chapels returned in the Census of 1851, as belonging to Lady Huntington's "Connexion," or described as "English Calvinistic Methodists," was 109, containing accommodation for 38,727 persons. See METHODISTS (CALVINISTIC).

HUNTINGTONIANS, a class of ANTINOMIANS (which see) in England, towards the close of the eighteenth century. They were followers of William Huntington, or rather Hunt, who, though originally a coal-heaver, and the victim of dissipated habits, was rescued by the grace of God from his vicious propensities, and was for many years the popular minister of Providence Chapel, Gray's-Inn-Lane, London. His writings, which obtained a large circulation among his admirers, form twenty octavo volumes. To the crowds who stately waited on his ministry, as well as to multitudes who flocked to hear him, as he travelled on preaching tours throughout the country, he taught the most extravagant Antinomian opinions. He maintained that the elect are justified from all eternity, an act of which their justification in this world by faith is simply the manifestation; that God sees no sin in believers, and is never angry with them: that the imputation of our sins to Christ, and of His righteousness to us, was actual, not judicial; that faith, repentance, and holy obedience, are covenant conditions on the part of Christ, not on our part; and finally, that sanctification is no evidence of justification, but rather renders it more obscure. The sentiments of the Huntingtonians, indeed, were little more than a revival of the sentiments of the CRISPITES (which see) in the seventeenth century. In a number of chapels, particularly in Sussex, these doctrines continue still to be taught.

HURDWAR, a place of unequalled sanctity among the Hindus. To its temples pilgrims resort from all parts of Hindustan; the water of the Ganges being considered as so holy at this particular spot, that even the most notorious criminal will be cleansed by a single ablution; provided only that sufficient gold be given to the gods. The gold must be dropped in the river at the time of prayer, and the Brahmins as the reward of their services have alone the privilege of searching for the treasure. At the Mela or annual grand festival of Hurdwar, the pilgrims amount in number to from 300,000 to 1,000,000 souls, who resort to this sacred place in the hope of washing away in the waters of the Ganges all their numberless transgressions.

HUSCANAWER, a ceremony which was anciently practised among the North American Indians of Virginia, when they wished to prepare those who aspired at the dignity of the priesthood, or who sought to be enrolled among the number of their great men. The principal men of the place where the ceremony was to be performed, made choice of the handsomest and sprightliest youths to be their Huscanawers. They shut them up for several months together, giving them no other sustenance than the infusion or decoction of certain roots, which strongly affected the nervous system. They continued for some time under the influence of this maddening draught, during which they were enclosed in a strong place, built in a conical form, and provided with numerous air-holes. Here these novices, supplied with quantities from time to time of the stupefying liquor, quite lost their memory; they forgot their possessions, parents, friends, and even their language, becoming at length deaf and dumb. The Indians pretended that their sole motive for resorting to this singular practice, was in order to free their young people from the dangerous impressions of infancy, and from all those prejudices which they contracted before reason was capable of gaining the ascendant. They alleged further, that being then at liberty to follow the dictates of nature, they were no longer liable to be deceived by custom or education, and were thereby the better enabled to administer justice uprightly, without having any regard to the ties of blood or friendship. The ceremony now described cannot fail to remind the classical reader of the ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES (which see).

HUSSEYITES, the followers of Mr. Joseph Hussey, a learned but eccentric divine, formerly of Cambridge, who, besides other peculiarities of opinion, held the Antinomian views of Dr. Crisp. (See CRISPITES.) He maintained also the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, or rather of a spiritual or glorious body in which he appeared to Adam, Abraham, and others; this body being the image of God in which man was created. On the subject of the divine decrees, he was a supra-lapsarian Calvinist, and he published a treatise, entitled 'Operations of Grace, but no Offers,' in which he objected in the strongest manner to all offers of salvation, or invitations to the unconverted. See ANTINOMIANS.

HUSSITES, the followers of John Huss, the celebrated Bohemian reformer and martyr, who lived in the end of the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth century. The kingdom of Bohemia, though small in point of geographical extent, occupies a very prominent and conspicuous place in the religious history of Europe. It is probable that Christianity was first introduced into the country about the time of Charlemagne, who reduced it under his subjection, and compelled it to pay tribute. The successors, however, of that illustrious Emperor, were unable to retain the conquered province, which vindicated its independence of Germany, and placed itself under the protection of Svatopluk, king of Great Moravia, where Christianity had been established by the apostolical labours of Methodius and Cyrillus. Bohemia was thus brought completely within the range of Christian instruction and influence, which operated so effectively that Borivoy, duke of Bohemia, was baptized by Methodius, and the celebration of divine worship in the national language, along with the rites and discipline of the Greek church, was introduced into the country. The kingdom of Moravia was destroyed A. D. 907 by the Pagan Magyars or Hungarians; and when these conquerors were converted to Christianity, the Latin service was introduced, and the national Slavonic liturgy disappeared. Bohemia seems to have enjoyed the privilege for several centuries of retaining the liturgy in her own tongue, for L'Enfant relates upon the authority of Spondanns, that Pope Innocent IV. allowed the Bohemians about the middle of the thirteenth century to perform divine service in the national language. Such an arrangement must have had a powerful effect in diffusing a knowledge of Divine truth among the people, and accordingly, though the Bohemian church acknowledged the supremacy of the Pope, and thus formed as yet a branch of the Romish church, we find that numbers of those who were persecuted for their resistance to Roman domination, sought a refuge in Bohemia. This was the case with many of the Waldenses when compelled to flee from France, and it was the case even with the great reformer of Lyons, Peter Waldo himself. Thus the Protestant Bohemian writer Stranski, quoted by Count Krasinski, says: "As the purity of the Greek ritual was insensibly becoming corrupted amongst the people, either through the remains of Paganism, or by the influence of the Latins, there arrived in Bohemia in 1176 several pious individuals, disciples of Peter Waldo, very commendable, not only on account of their piety, but also by their knowledge of the Scriptures, and who had been expelled from France and Germany. They settled in the towns of Zatec and Lani. They joined the adherents of the Greek ritual whom they found there, and modestly corrected by the Word of God the defects which they discovered in their worship. Another Protestant writer, Francovich, better known under his assumed name of Illyricus Flaccius, relates that he had an account of the proceedings made by the Inquisition of Poland and Bohemia about 1330, which positively stated that it had been discovered that subscriptions were collected in these countries, and sent to the Waldensians of Italy, whom the contributors regarded as their brethren and teachers, and that many Bohemians visited these Waldensians, in order to study divinity. The Roman Catholic writer Hagee says,—"In the year 1341, heretics called Grubenheimer, i. e. inhabitants of caverns, again entered Bohemia. We have spoken of them above, under the year 1176. They settled in towns, but particularly at Prague, where they could better conceal themselves. They preached in some houses, but very secretly. Although they were known to many, they were tolerated, because they knew how to conceal their wickedness under a great appearance of piety."

The fact that Bohemia thus afforded shelter to many from Roman oppression, shows that she herself, though nominally subject to the authority of the Papal see, was disposed to some extent to assert her own independence. And it is not unlikely that the Waldensian pastors and people, who found a home in Bohemia, may have tended to foster that love of religious liberty, which afterwards shone forth as so conspicuous a feature in her bold and undaunted peasantry. It is no wonder, therefore, that Æneas Sylvius, afterwards Pope Pius II., should have asserted the Hussites to be a branch of the Waldensians.

Several important circumstances tended to prepare the way for the appearance of the great Bohemian reformer, and the terrible commotions which are commonly known by the name of the Hussite wars. Charles the First of Bohemia, and the Fourth of Germany, had no sooner ascended the throne than he set himself to develop the resources, physical, intellectual, and literary of the Bohemian kingdom. He reformed many abuses ecclesiastical and civil; repressed the exorbitant power and rapacity of the nobles; extended the municipal liberties of the towns; encouraged commerce and industry, and raised agriculture to a flourishing condition. To this enlightened prince, Bohemia owes the foundation of the University of Prague, A. D. 1347; and to him also she owes the first solid development of her national language and literature. Besides, Charles did much to arouse the martial spirit of the Bohemians, by introducing into the country a regular military organization. Such was the state of Bohemia in the end of the fourteenth century. "The country," to use the language of Krasinski, "was rich, enlightened, and warlike; but above all, the national feeling of her inhabitants had acquired an extraordinary degree of intensity, which I believe was the mainspring of the energy which they displayed in the defence of their political and religious liberty, and which I have no hesitation in saying, has no parallel in the pages of modern history."

Before the great Slavonic reformer entered on his mission, the way had been paved for him by several energetic ecclesiastics in the Bohemian church, who sought to reform the corrupted manners of the age, and protested against some of the errors of Rome, particularly the doctrine of communion in one kind only. Conrad Stiekna, John Milicz, and Matthew of Janow, may be mentioned as preparing the way for a reformation in the church of Bohemia. But to John Huss is due the merit of having originated that great revolution which marks an important era in the ecclesiastical history of Europe.

The Bohemian reformer was born in 1369, at a village called Hussinetz. He was of humble parentage, but his talents being of a high order, he was sent to the university of Prague, with the view of studying for the church. Here he distinguished himself by his extensive attainments as a scholar. By means of Wycliffe's works, which at that time had spread as far as Prague, John Huss was won over to the side of Augustin in theology, and to realism in philosophy. His eyes began to be opened to some of the most obvious errors of the church, and he was not ashamed to avow his adherence to most of the doctrinal opinions of the English reformer. The teachers at the university, who were chiefly Germans, were keen nominalists in philosophy, and equally keen opponents of Wycliffe in theology. The young Reformer, therefore, was exposed to the frowns and the reproaches of both his professors and fellow-students. With one man, however, who warmly sympathized with him in his admiration of Wycliffe, he contracted a close friendship, which afforded him no small comfort and encouragement. This individual was Jerome Faulisch, commonly called Hieronymus Pragensis, or Jerome of Prague.

Meanwhile Huss attracted great notice at the university by the solidity and extent of his learning. In 1393, he was made both Bachelor and Master of Arts, and in 1401, Dean of the Philosophical Faculty, having previously been honoured with the appointment of Confessor to the Queen, on whom he had a great influence. In the course of two years more, he began to preach in the national language, but it was not before the year 1409 that he commenced his public attacks upon the established church. The first abuse to which he called the attention of the synods was the corruption of the clergy. On this subject he spoke with the utmost freedom, and all the more readily as he had entrenched himself in popular favour, not only by preaching in the vernacular tongue, but by introducing, in conjunction with his friend Jerome of Prague, such alterations into the constitution of the university that the Germans were compelled to quit it. The decree which, through the influence of John Huss, Wenceslav, king of Bohemia, was persuaded to issue, was as follows: "Although it is necessary to love all men, yet charity ought to be regulated by the degrees of proximity. Therefore, considering that the German nation, which does not belong to this country, and has, moreover, as we have learnt from the most veritable evidence, appropriated to itself, in all the acts of the university of Prague, three votes, whilst the Bohemian nation, the legitimate heir of this realm, has but one; and considering that it is very unjust that foreigners should enjoy the privileges of the natives of the country, to the prejudice of the latter, we order, by the present act, under the penalty of our displeasure, that the Bohemian nation should, without any delay or contradiction, enjoy henceforward the privilege of three votes in all councils, judgments, elections, and all other academic acts and dispositions, in the same manner as is practised in the university of Paris, and in those of Lombardy and Italy."

The result of this decree, which tended so much to establish the popularity of Huss, was, that besides the professors, most of whom were Germans, no fewer than five thousand students, according to the statement of Æneas Sylvius, emigrated from Bohemia to Germany, where for their accommodation it was found necessary to establish a university at Leipsic, as well as other similar institutions at other places. The popularity which Huss had thus obtained contributed more than anything else to spread his doctrines in Bohemia. He was now elected rector of the university of Prague, and the high position which he had reached as a theologian and a popular preacher, gave him no common influence over the people. He translated several of the works of Wycliffe, and sent them to the principal noblemen of Bohemia and Moravia. It was not to be expected that such a course could be followed without calling forth the most determined opposition from the clergy. Šbínko, archbishop of Prague, in 1410, caused a number of the writings of Wycliffe to be publicly burnt; and still farther to work the overthrow of Huss, he procured from Pope Alexander V. full powers to forbid preaching in private chapels, or in any other places, except in parochial, conventual, and episcopal churches. This blow was aimed at the Reformer, who at that time preached in the Bethlehem chapel. This bull was no sooner proclaimed accordingly, than Huss was summoned to appear before the court of the archbishop on a charge of heresy. An excommunication was forthwith issued, but the king and queen, the nobility, and university took up and obtained a reconsideration of the matter. Meantime Huss continued to preach, defending the doctrines which he taught by a reference to the Word of God, and besides his sermons, he and his friends held public disputations in support of the writings of Wycliffe. At length, in consequence of the universal sympathy manifested in favour of the persecuted Reformer, the archbishop Šbínko felt himself compelled to revoke his accusation of heresy.

The opposition to the doctrines which Huss preached seemed now to be abandoned, but in a few short months circumstances occurred which kindled anew the flames of religious contention in Bohemia. The Pope, John XXIII., proclaimed a crusade against Ladislaus, king of Naples, promising a plenary indulgence to all who should take part in it, either personally or by pecuniary contributions. On this subject a papal legate was despatched from Rome to Bohemia, where he succeeded in obtaining from many of the people considerable sums of money. Huss and his friend Jerome of Prague, now publicly and solemnly protested against papal indulgences and other ecclesiastical abuses. This bold exposure of Rome's misdeeds called forth immediate fulminations from the Vatican; the writings of Wycliffe were condemned in a synod at Rome; John Huss was excommunicated, and the place of his residence laid under an interdict.

Bohemia was now the scene of the most bitter contentions, and although the king attempted to allay the disturbances by convoking a synod for the discussion of the disputed points, all his efforts were ineffectual. The Reformer was called upon to quit the capital, and accordingly, he retired to his native village of Hussinetz, continuing however to preach in the national language, and to expose the abuses of the church both from the pulpit and the press. In the agitated and convulsed state of the kingdom, the Emperor Sigismund applied to the Pope for a general council, which was accordingly summoned to meet at Constance on the 1st November 1414. A message was sent to Huss, inviting him to appear and defend himself and his doctrines in person. Provided, therefore, with a letter of safe-conduct from the Emperor, he arrived at the appointed place of meeting. His entry into Constance was no sooner known, than his enemies began to take steps for, if possible, effecting his destruction. False accusations of every kind were drawn up, and witnesses induced to come forward and establish them. In this way a long list of charges was preferred against him, and laid before the council. In the meantime, at the instigation of his enemies, particularly the Bohemian clergy, Huss was seized on the 28th of November, notwithstanding his safe-conduct, and thrown into prison, on a charge of heresy. Denied all opportunity of defending himself, he was called upon to make an unconditional recantation; and on his refusing to do this, he was committed to the flames on the 6th of July 1415. The council of Constance, in order to pacify the Emperor Sigismund for their flagrant breach of honour in disregarding his safe-conduct, passed a decree that no faith ought to be kept with heretics. The associate and friend of Huss, Jerome of Prague, soon after met a similar fate. The ashes of both the martyrs were carefully collected and thrown into the Rhine.

The death of Huss gave impulse and energy to the actings of his friends and followers. No sooner did the tidings of his bloody martyrdom reach Bohemia, than a universal cry of indignation rose against the perpetrators of the murder. The university of Prague came boldly forward to vindicate the memory of the Reformer, and addressed a manifesto on the subject to the whole of Christendom. A medal was struck in honour of the martyr, and a day in the calendar of saints, the 6th of July, was consecrated to him. His followers began now to be called Hussites, and their number was daily on the increase. One of the chief peculiarities for a time was, their demand for communion in both kinds. The council of Constance had sanctioned the ordinary usage of the church on this point, and pronounced all who were opposed to it to be heretics. But this decree, followed by the execution of Huss, roused the most violent ferment in Bohemia. Jacobellus, as he was commonly called, or James of Misa, a priest of Prague, defended the doctrine of communion in both kinds against the decree of the council, and a league was formed among the Bohemian and Moravian nobles for six years in support of purity of doctrine. The council of Constance, which was still sitting, summoned the nobles before them, but in vain. All this only added to the number and the influence of the Hussites. Unfortunately, however, they began to differ among themselves, some of the body going so far as to set aside entirely the authority of the church, and to admit no other rule than the Holy Scriptures, whilst others were contented with communion in both kinds, the free preaching of the gospel, and some reforms of minor importance. The former party afterwards took the name of TABORITES (which see), and the latter of CALIXTINES (which see).

The adherents of the Roman Catholic Church were a powerful minority at this time in Bohemia, and had the advantage of being backed by the authority of Rome, and also of the Emperor Sigismund, who had declared against the Hussites. Besides, the council of Constance thought it necessary to adopt the most stringent measures in order to quell the heretics of Bohemia. They summoned to their presence, therefore, about four hundred chief men of the Hussites, offering them a safe-conduct. But the example of Huss was too recent to permit his followers to put any confidence in promises of protection coming from such a quarter. The summons accordingly was disregarded; and the council issued a declaration against them extending to twenty-four articles, in the course of which they called upon King Wenceslav to make strenuous efforts to extirpate the heretics from his kingdom. A papal legate was sent to Bohemia to fulfil the wishes of the council, and carrying with him a bull from the new Pope, Martin V., addressed to the clergy of Bohemia, Poland, England, and Germany, which ordered that all the followers of Huss and Wycliffe should be examined, judged, and given over to the secular powers for summary punishment. To this papal bull were appended forty-five articles of Wycliffe, and thirty of Huss, which had been condemned by the council of Constance. On the arrival of the Pope's legate in Bohemia, he endeavoured to strike terror into the minds of the heretics by the execution of two Hussites, in a town called Slau; but such was the indignation which this act aroused against the papal emissary, that he found it necessary to quit the country, addressing a letter to the Emperor Sigismund, declaring that the Bohemians could only be reconciled to the church by fire and sword.

The whole kingdom of Bohemia was now in a state of indescribable ferment, and particularly the capital city, Prague. The Hussites felt that the time had come when they were imperatively called upon to take arms in defence of their religious liberties. All they wanted was a leader capable of regulating and directing their movements, and that leader they found in John Trocznowski, known in Europe by the name of Ziska, or the one-eyed, a Bohemian nobleman of extraordinary talents, and the most indomitable energy. Along with Nicholas of Hussinetz, another Bohemian noble of great wealth, he put himself at the head of the Hussite army, which was equipped for self-defence. They commenced with occupying a strong mountainous position, to which they gave the name of Tabor, and which they fortified in the most skillful manner. There thousands attended for the celebration of the Lord's Supper in both kinds, and on that eminence they afterwards founded the city of Tabor.

Ziska, in commencing the war, issued a proclamation to the Bohemians, which he caused to be circulated throughout the whole country. It ran as follows:—Dearest Brethren,—God grant, through his grace, that you should return to your first charity, and that, doing good works, like true children of God, you should abide in his fear. If he has chastised and punished you, I beg you, in his name, that you should not be cast down by affliction. Consider those who work for the faith, and suffer persecution from its adversaries, but particularly from the Germans, whose extreme wickedness you have yourselves experienced, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Imitate your ancestors the ancient Bohemians, who were always able to defend the cause of God and their own. For ourselves, my brethren, having always before our eyes the law of God and the good of the country, we must be very vigilant; and it is requisite that whoever is capable to wield a knife, to throw a stone, or to lift a cudgel, should be ready to march. Therefore, my brethren, I inform you that we are collecting troops from all parts, in order to fight against the enemies of truth and the destroyers of our nation; and I beseech you to inform your preachers, that they should exhort, in their sermons, the people to make war on the Antichrist, and that every one, old and young, should prepare himself for it. I also desire, that when I shall be with you there should be no want of bread, beer, victuals, or provender, and that you should provide yourselves with good arms. It is now time to be armed, not only against foreigners, but also against domestic foes. Remember your first encounter, when you were few against many,—unarmed against well-armed men. The hand of God has not been shortened. Have courage and be ready. May God strengthen you!—Ziska of the Chalice, in the hope of God, chief of the Taborites."

Multitudes of the Bohemian peasantry flocked to the standard of Ziska, and entering Prague he was gladly received by the population generally. His first assault was upon the Roman Catholic churches, and the civil authorities having interfered, a fierce riot ensued, in which several of the magistrates were killed, and many churches and convents pillaged. This turbulent outbreak so affected King Wenceslav, that he died in a fit of apoplexy. The kingdom now devolved upon his brother, the Emperor Sigismund, who, being engaged at the time in a war with the Turks, found it difficult to adopt measures for repressing the Hussites, who committed in consequence the most deplorable excesses, destroying churches and convents, and murdering Romish priests, monks, and nuns. Besides, the Bohemians were most unwilling to submit to the rule of Sigismund, whom they hated, and a complete anarchy ensued. The new sovereign commenced his reign by offering a complete pardon to the Hussites, on condition that they should return to the church; and this offer being rejected, he prepared to reduce the heretics by force of arms. The city of Prague was in the hands of the Hussites; but the castle of that city was occupied by an imperial garrison. Twice in the course of the year 1420 did the emperor attempt, but in vain, to wrest Prague from the Hussites. They continued to hold the capital against the enemy, fighting with all the enthusiasm which a war on religious grounds is fitted to excite. In the front of the Hussite army, as it marched, were priests bearing chalices in token of their adherence to the doctrine of communion in both kinds, while the warriors followed singing psalms, and the rear was brought up by the women, who wrought at the fortifications and took care of the wounded.

The hatred which the Bohemians bore to the now reigning sovereign tended to combine political with religious motives in their proceedings. A diet was assembled to deliberate on the affairs of the country, when they declared Sigismund unworthy of their crown, and resolved to offer it either to the King of Poland, or to a prince of his dynasty. At this meeting, also, they drew up four articles, to which they resolved to adhere in all their negotiations, both with the government and the church. These celebrated articles, which occupy a conspicuous place in the history of the period, were as follows:

"1. The Word of God is to be freely announced by Christian priests throughout the kingdom of Bohemia and the margraviate of Moravia.

"2. The venerable sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ is to be given in two kinds to adults as well as children, as Jesus Christ has instituted it.

"3. The priests and monks, of whom many meddle with the affairs of the state, are to be deprived of the worldly goods which they possess in great quantity, and which make them neglect their sacred office; and their goods shall be restored to us, in order that, in accordance with the doctrine of the gospels and the practice of the apostles, the clergy should be subject to us, and, living in poverty, serve as a pattern of humility to others.

"4. All the public sins which are called mortal, and all other trespasses contrary to the law of God, are to be punished according to the laws of the country, by those who have the charge of them, without any regard to the persons committing them, in order to wipe from the kingdom of Bohemia, and the margraviate of Moravia, the bad reputation of tolerating disorders."

This diet, at which several Roman Catholics attended, established a regency, consisting of nobles and burghers, at the head of which was Ziska. Sigismund made proposals with a view to conciliate the diet; but all were rejected, and he accordingly entered Bohemia with an army composed chiefly of Hungarians, but in several successive engagements the imperial forces were repulsed by Ziska and his army. Not contented with repelling the invading army, the Hussites made aggressive incursions into the adjacent German territory. Flushed with success, the Hussites, though by no means united either in their political or religious views, Bohemia being then divided into three parties, nevertheless agreed in their hatred of the emperor, and now that he had taken the field against his own subjects, they disowned his authority, and offered the crown to the King of Poland. Vladislav Jaguillon, who then occupied the Polish throne, was flattered by the offer, and while, from his advanced age as well as other motives, he declined to become the sovereign of the Bohemians, he despatched his nephew Coributt with five thousand cavalry, and a sum of money, to aid them in defending their country against the assaults of Sigismund. The arrival of Coributt was hailed by the Hussites with great satisfaction, and a strong party wished to elect him king; but the project was defeated by Ziska, who declared that he would not submit to a foreigner, and that a free nation had no need of a king. On further reflection, however, he acknowledged Coributt as regent of Bohemia, and marching with him into Moravia, which was partly occupied by the imperialists, he was seized with the plague, which cut him off on the 11th October 1424.

The death of their leader excited great consternation in the Hussite army, which now divided into three parties. "One of them," says Krasinski, "retained the name of Taborites, and chose for their chief Procop Holy, i. e., the Tonsured, whom Ziska had pointed out as his successor. The second declared that they would have no commander, as there was not in the world a man worthy to succeed Ziska; and took, on that account, the name of Orphans. These Orphans elected, however, some chiefs to command them; and they always remained in their camps, fortified by waggons, and never went into towns, except on some unavoidable business, as, for instance, to purchase victuals. The third party were the Orebites, who had taken this name from a mountain upon which they had assembled for the first time, and to which they had probably given the biblical appellation of Horeb on that occasion. They always followed the standard of Ziska with the Taborites, but now chose separate leaders. Yet although the Hussites were thus divided into several parties, they always united whenever it was necessary to defend their country, which they called the Land of Promise, giving to the adjacent German provinces the names of Edom, Moab, Amalek, and the country of the Philistines."

The war continued, and in almost every encounter the imperialists were defeated. At length the Emperor Sigismund endeavoured to obtain by negotiation what he despaired of accomplishing by force of arms. In this, however, he was as unsuccessful as he had been in the field. The Hussites of all parties cordially acceded to the proposal of Procopius to invade Germany. He entered that country, laying waste Saxony, Brandenburg, and Lusatia, and returned to Bohemia laden with spoil. Encouraged by success he collected a still larger army, and the following year (1431) he ravaged Saxony and Franconia. These successful invasions spread consternation throughout Germany, and on application the Pope proclaimed a third crusade against the Bohemians, which, however, failed as signally as the two former had done. It was now plain to both the emperor and the Pope, that nothing could be effected against the Hussites by force; and hence the council of Basle, at the suggestion of Julius Cesarini, the papal legate who had accompanied the last crusade, resolved to open negotiations with the heretical Bohemians. After some delay, Hussite ambassadors, to the amount of three hundred, appeared at Basle, and an unsuccessful disputation was held at the council, almost exclusively founded upon the celebrated four articles, the concession of which the delegates declared to be the point on which all negotiations in reference to peace must turn. After residing three months the deputies returned to Bohemia without accomplishing the object of their mission. The council, however, were unwilling to surrender all hope of an amicable settlement, and they despatched, therefore, an embassy to Prague to renew the negotiation. On the arrival of the ambassadors a diet was summoned to meet them, and the result of the conference was, that the Bohemians agreed to receive the four articles of Prague, with certain modifications, which the council confirmed under the name of the Compactata; and their acceptance was followed by the acknowledgment of the Emperor Sigismund as legitimate king of Bohemia. This mutual compact was agreed to on the 30th November 1433, and solemnly ratified at Iglau, though the extreme Hussites, including the Tabornites, the Orphans, and the Orebites, were much dissatisfied with the arrangement, being still unwilling to recognize Sigismund as their king.

A deadly feud now arose between the Calixtines, who were the main instruments in obtaining the Compactata, and the extreme Hussite parties, headed by Procopius. The two armies met in mortal combat on the plains of Lipan, about four miles from Prague, when Procopius was defeated and slain. With this unhappy battle between two divisions of the Hussites themselves may be said to have ended the Hussite war, in which the comparatively small kingdom of Bohemia, for fifteen years, withstood the armies of Germany and Hungary, and even laid waste large provinces of these hostile countries.

The Calixtines and the Roman Catholics now received the Emperor Sigismund as their lawful monarch, and he, on his part, swore to maintain the Compactata and the liberties of the country. The Taborites silently, though sullenly, acquiesced, and no longer mingling in public affairs, they sought peacefully to discharge their duties as private citizens. About 1450 they dropped the name of Tabornites, exchanging it for that of the Bohemian Brethren, and in the course of a few years more they began to form themselves into a separate religious community distinct from that of the rest of the Hussites or Calixtines. They were, for a number of years, exposed to severe persecution, not only at the hands of the Roman Catholics, but of their former associates the Calixtines. In the face of all opposition, however, they established themselves as a regular Christian denomination, being the first Protestant Slavonic church which was ever formed. The organization of the body only brought upon them more determined opposition, and the church was compelled to hold its synods, and to perform Divine worship in dens, and caves, and forests, while its members were loaded with the most opprobrious epithets, being termed Adamites, Picardians, and robbers. Notwithstanding all the sufferings which they were called to endure, so rapidly did the Bohemian Brethren increase in numbers, that, in 1500, they were able to reckon two hundred places of worship. Again and again did the Romish clergy excite severe persecutions against them, but the zeal of the Brethren continued unabated. In 1506 they published a version of the Bible in their own language. The succession of the Austrian dynasty to the Bohemian throne proved fatal to the interests of these Slavonic Protestants. In 1541 the diet of Prague enacted rigorous laws against them; their places of worship were shut up, and their ministers imprisoned; and in 1548 Ferdinand the First issued an edict, enjoining the Brethren to leave the country under the most severe penalties in forty-two days. A great number of them, including their chief ministers, emigrated to Poland, where they became the founders of flourishing churches. See POLAND (PROTESTANT CHURCH OF).

Some remnants of the Brethren were scattered in Moravia, which afterwards gave rise, in the eighteenth century, to the sect of the MORAVIAN BRETHREN (which see). The further history of the moderate Hussites is detailed under the article CALIXTINES (which see).

HUTANGI, an apartment which is generally found in the houses of the wealthy Chinese, and devoted to ANCESTOR-WORSHIP (which see). On entering the Hutangi there is seen on a large table set against the wall an image, which is generally that of the most illustrious ancestor of the family, and there are also several small boards on which the names of all the men, women, and children of the family are arranged in order. Twice a-year, generally in spring and autumn, the relations hold a meeting in this room, when rich presents, of various kinds of meats, wines, and perfumes, with wax tapers, are laid upon the table with great ceremony as gifts to their deceased ancestors. Where the circumstances of the family do not admit of a separate Hutangi, lists of their ancestors are hung up in some conspicuous place in the house.

HUTCHINSONIANS, a school of English divines which arose in the early part of the eighteenth century, deriving its origin and name from John Hutchinson, Esq., a learned layman, who published various works containing peculiar philosophical and philological opinions. The fundamental principle of the mode of Scripture interpretation adopted by the Hutchinsonians was, that the Hebrew language contains in its construction and radical terms certain concealed truths; being not only the primitive language of the human race, but expressly revealed to them from heaven. The Hebrew Scriptures, accordingly, were interpreted by this school as by the COCCESIANS (which see) of Holland in a typical sense. The Hebrew roots were considered as having each of them an important meaning, which ran through all their various derivative forms. Thus, by a careful and minute study of the original language, discarding, however, its points and accents as of human invention, this school of philological theologians imagined that they had found the true key of the meaning of Scripture. For example, the Hebrew name of God in the Old Testament, Elohim, which they pronounced Aleim, was not only considered as a plural noun, thereby indicating a plurality of Persons in the Godhead, and in its connection with a singular verb as indicating the unity of the Divine essence under a plurality of Persons; but it was supposed, in its radical meaning, to denote Covenanters, in allusion to the covenant entered into by the Three Persons in the Godhead, for the redemption of man. Mr. Hutchinson, in a work which he published in 1724 and 1727, endeavoured to show that the Scriptures contained a complete system of physical science, which, in his view, was wholly at variance with the Newtonian system of the universe. The Hebrew word shemin, the heavens, he regarded as, in its radical meaning, denoting "names" or "representatives," and that, therefore, the heavens, in their threefold condition of fire, light, and spirit, were thus framed in order to be an emblematic representation of the Trinity in Unity. Another word of mysterious signification in this system, is that of Cherubim. In the cherubic form, the ox, the lion, and the eagle, Mr. Hutchinson saw a typical representation, first, of the trinity of nature, fire, light, and air; and, secondly, of the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead; while the junction of the lion and the man in this emblematic figure, he understood as pointing out the union of the human nature of the Son of God, who is called "the Lion of the tribe of Judah."

On the publication in 1748 of the philosophical and theological writings of Mr. Hutchinson, several English divines openly avowed their partiality for his peculiar mode of Scripture interpretation, and among these were several Oxford heads of houses. A formidable opponent of the system, however, appeared in the person of Archdeacon Sharp, who, in 1750, published a treatise assailing, with great ability and learning, those points which formed the main props of the system. Several Hutchinsonian divines replied to Mr. Sharp, and the controversy was carried on for a few years with considerable talent on both sides. Among the leading defenders of the new system, were Mr. Spearman, Mr. Parkhurst, the lexicographer, Bishop Horne, Lord President Forbes, and Mr. Cateott of Bristol, who wrote a defence of Hutchinsonianism in Latin, which was afterwards translated into English, with a valuable Introduction and Notes by Mr. Maxwell. Various other writers of eminence ranged themselves on the same side; but although not a few Scripture interpreters and expositors have, from time to time, appeared, evincing a decided leaning towards the peculiar scheme of interpretation followed by the Hutchinsonians and Cocceians, the system itself has now given way to hermeneutical principles of a more solid and accurate description.

HUTTERIANS, the followers of Hutter, an Anabaptist leader in Moravia in the sixteenth century. See ANABAPTISTS.

HVERGELMIR, in the ancient Scandinavian cosmogony, a spring of hot water from which issue twelve rivers. It is located in Niflheim, a region of ice, and night, and mist.

HYACINTHIA, a great national festival anciently celebrated annually at Amyclæ in Greece. Some writers affirm that it was instituted in honour of Amycleus Apollo, others, of Hyacinthus, and others of both together. The festival lasted for three days, on the first and last of which sacrifices were offered to the dead, and lamentations were held for the death of HYACINTHUS (which see), all the people laying aside their garlands and partaking only of simple cakes, with every sign of grief and mourning. The intermediate day, however, between the first and the last was spent in mirth and rejoicing, pæans being sung in honour of Apollo, and the youth spending the day in horse-racing, games, and other amusements. Sacrifices were offered and splendid processions took place. Much importance was attached to this festival by the Amycleans and Lacedæmonians, who were careful in no circumstances to neglect it.

HYACINTHIDES, the daughters of HYACINTHUS (which see), who suffered themselves to be sacrificed, some say to Athena, others to Persephone, that Athens might be delivered from famine and the plague, to which it was exposed in the war with Minos. According to some traditions, the Hyacinthides were daughters of Erectheus, and derived their name from a village called Hyacinthus, where they were sacrificed. But this confounds them with the HYADES (which see).

HYACINTHUS, a Lacedæmonian, who is said to have been commanded by an oracle to sacrifice his daughters for the deliverance of Athens from the two direful calamities of plague and famine. See preceding article.

HYADES (Gr. the rainy), a class of nymphs in the mythology of ancient Greece, daughters of Atlas and Æthra. Authors differ both as to their number and their names. In return for their kindness in saving the life of the infant Dionysus, Zeus is said to have raised them to the heavens, where they form a constellation of stars, five in number. When the Hyades rose along with the sun, it was considered as betokening rainy weather, and hence their name.

HYLÆÆ, a name applied by Porphyry to the priestesses of Mithras or the sun.

HYDRA, a fabulous serpent in the lake Lerna, which, according to ancient heathen mythology, had a hundred heads; and when any one of these heads was cut off, another presently sprang up in its place, unless the blood which issued from the wound was stopped by fire. Hercules destroyed the monster by staunching the blood of each head as he cut it off.

HYDRIAPHORIA (Gr. hudor, water, and phero, to carry), a ceremony in which the married alien women carried a vessel with water for the married females of Athens as they walked to the temple of Athena in the great procession at the PANATHENÆA (which see).

HYDROMANCY (Gr. hudor, water, and manteia, divination), a species of divination practised by the ancient heathens, in which, with the employment of certain incantations, they imagined that they beheld the images of the gods in the water. "Numa," says Augustin, "unto whom neither prophet nor angel was sent, was obliged to have recourse to Hydromancy to get sight in the water of the images of those gods, or rather illusions of demons, to be instructed by them what ceremonies and what sort of religious worship he was to introduce among the Romans." This kind of divination, according to Varro, was brought from Persia, and practised by Numa and Pythagoras, who, after having offered certain sacrifices, used to inquire of the infernal demons. See DIVINATION.

HYDROPARASTATÆ. See AQUARIANS.

HYEMANTES, a name given by the Latin Fathers of the Christian church to demoniacs, as being tossed about as in a winter storm or tempest. The council of Ancyra, in one of its canons, orders certain notorious sinners to pray in the place allotted to the Hyemantes; in other words, in that part of the church where the demoniacs stood, which was a place separate from all the rest. See EXERCISES.

HYETIUS, a surname of Zeus as sending rain, and thereby softening the earth, and rendering it fruitful. Under this name Zeus was worshipped at Argos, and had a statue in the grove of Trophonius near Labadeia.

HYGIEIA, the ancient Grecian goddess of health. She was the daughter of Aesclepius, and was worshipped along with him in various cities of Greece. She had a statue also at Rome in the temple of Concordia. Hygieia was, besides, a surname of Athena.

HYLATUS, a surname of Apollo, derived from the town of Hyle in Crete, which was sacred to this god.

HYLE, matter, or the material principle of the universe, which, in the philosophy of Plato, was self-existent, and, therefore, from all eternity out of God. In thus explaining the existence and continuation of evil by the introduction of a Dualistic system which recognized God and Hyle or matter, as equally eternal and self-existent, Plato wished to avoid the necessary consequence of referring the principle of evil, as matter was considered to be, to God, viz. that it destroyed the purity of the divine essence. The notion of Plato was, that evil exists necessarily in the Hyle, or the material principle, only so far as it is not informed by the divine ideas. In acting upon it, God tends to destroy evil by bringing the Hyle into subjection to the proper laws of idea, and the creation, throughout its whole duration, is nothing but the development of this divine conflict. This Platonic notion of the Hyle was adopted into the Gnostic system of the second century, and the predominance of this notion formed, in fact, the characteristic of the Alexandrian, as distinguished from the Syrian, Gnosis. "This Hyle," says Neander, "is represented under various images—as the darkness that exists along with the light; as the void in opposition to the fulness of the divine life; as the shadow that accompanies the light; as the chaos, the stagnant, dark water. This matter, dead in itself, possesses by its own nature no active power, no nisus. As life of every sort is foreign to it, itself makes no encroachment on the divine. But since the divine evolutions of life (the essences developing themselves out of the progressive emanation) become feebler the further they are removed from the first link in the series; since their connection with the first becomes more loose at each successive step, hence, out of the last step of the evolution proceeds an imperfect, defective product, which cannot retain its connection with the divine chain of life, and sinks from the world of Æons down into the chaos;—or—which is the same notion somewhat differently expressed—a drop from the fulness of the divine life spills over into the bordering void. Now first, the dead matter, by commixture with the living, which it wanted, receives animation. But at the same time also, the divine living particle becomes corrupted by mingling with the chaotic mass. Existence becomes multiform; there springs up a subordinate, defective life. The foundation is laid for a new world; a creation starts into being beyond the confines of the world of emanation. But since now, on the other hand, the chaotic principle of matter has acquired a sort of life, hence there arises a pure active opposition to the godlike—a barely negative, blind, ungodly nature-power, which obstinately resists all plastic influence of the divine element: hence, as products of the spirit of the Hyle, Satan, malignant spirits, wicked men, in all of whom no reasonable, no moral principle, no principle of a rational will, but blind passions only have the ascendancy. There is the same conflict here as in the scheme of Platonism, between the soul under the guidance of divine reason, and the soul blindly resisting reason—between the divine principle and the natural."

From this view arose the Gnostic notion that a class of men represented by the Pagans, suffered themselves to be so captivated by the inferior world as to live only a hylic, or material life of which the Hyle or matter is the principle. The hylic principle was viewed as subject to death, and according to many Gnostics those who remain under its control throughout their lives will then be completely annihilated. According to the Valentinian Gnostics, from the mixture of the mundane soul with the Hyle, springs all living existence in numberless gradations, higher or lower, in proportion to the extent of their freedom from contact with the Hyle. This sect regarded Satan as the representative of the Hyle. Tatian and the Encratites derived the evil or hylic spirits, as he called them, from the hypothesis of an ungodlike spirit of life wedded to its kindred matter. They regarded the human soul as a hylic spirit, and, therefore, by its own nature mortal; but they held that the first man living in communion with God had within him a principle of divine life, which enabled him to rise above the influence of the hylic spirit, and that this constitutes the divine image by which man is rendered immortal. The fall made him subject to matter and mortality. See DUALISM, GNOSTICS.

HYLOBIANS. See GYMNO SOPHISTS.

HYMENÆUS, the god of marriage in the ancient Greek poets, and thought by many to be a personification of the Hymeneal or marriage song. (See EPITHALAMUM.) This deity was said to be the son of Apollo, and one of the Muses; others considered him to be the son of Dionysus and Aphrodite. He was worshipped by newly married women, and it was customary, during nuptial ceremonies, to sing a hymn to Hymenæus.

HYMNIA, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped in Arcadia. The priestess of this goddess was at first a virgin, but afterwards a married woman.

HYMIR, a giant referred to in the records of the ancient Scandinavian mythology, in connection with the Midgard serpent. The Prose Edda thus speaks of him: "Thor went out of Midgard under the semblance of a young man, and came at dusk to the dwelling of a giant called Hymir. Here Thor passed the night, but at break of day, when he perceived that Hymir was making his boat ready for fishing, he arose and dressed himself, and begged the giant would let him row out to sea with him. Hymir answered, that a puny stripling as he was could be of no great use to him. 'Besides,' he added, 'thou wilt catch thy death of cold if I go so far out and remain so long as I am accustomed to do.' Thor said, that for all that, he would row as far from the land as Hymir had a mind, and was not sure which of them would be the first who might wish to row back again. At the same time he was so enraged that he felt sorely inclined to let his mallet ring on the giant's skull without further delay, but intending to try his strength elsewhere, he stilled his wrath, and asked Hymir what he meant to bait with. Hymir told him to look out for a bait himself. Thor instantly went up to a herd of oxen that belonged to the giant, and seizing the largest bull, that bore the name of Hlinnibrjót, wrung off his head, and returning with it to the boat, put out to sea with Hymir. Thor rowed aft with two oars, and with such force, that Hymir, who rowed at the prow, saw, with surprise, how swiftly the boat was driven forward. He then observed that they were come to the place where he was wont to angle for flat fish, but Thor assured him that they had better go on a good way further. They accordingly continued to ply their oars, until Hymir cried out that if they did not stop they would be in danger from the great Midgard serpent. Notwithstanding this, Thor persisted in rowing further, and in spite of Hymir's remonstrances was a great while before he would lay down his oars. He then took out a fishing-line, extremely strong, furnished with an equally strong hook, on which he fixed the bull's head, and cast his line into the sea. The bait soon reached the bottom, and it may be truly said that Thor then deceived the Midgard serpent not a whit less than Utgard-Loki had deceived Thor when he obliged him to lift up the serpent in his hand: for the monster greedily caught at the bait, and the hook stuck fast in his palate. Stung with the pain, the serpent tugged at the hook so violently, that Thor was obliged to hold fast with both hands by the pegs that bear against the oars. But his wrath now waxed high, and assuming all his divine power, he pulled so hard at the line that his feet forced their way through the boat and went down to the bottom of the sea, whilst with his hands he drew up the serpent to the side of the vessel. It is impossible to express by words the dreadful scene that now took place. Thor, on one hand, darting looks of ire on the serpent, whilst the monster, rearing his head, spouted out floods of venom upon him. It is said that when the giant Hymir beheld the serpent, he turned pale and trembled with fright, and seeing, moreover, that the water was entering his boat on all sides, he took out his knife, just as Thor raised his mallet aloft, and cut the line, on which the serpent sunk again under water. Thor, however, launched his mallet at him, and there are some who say that it struck off the monster's head at the bottom of the sea, but one may assert with more certainty that he still lives and lies in the ocean. Thor then struck Hymir such a blow with his fist, nigh the ear, that the giant fell headlong into the water, and Thor, wading with rapid strides, soon came to the land again."

HYPAPANTE. See CANDLEMAS-DAY.

HYPATUS (Gr. the Most High), an epithet sometimes applied by the Greek poets to Zeus, and under this surname he was worshipped at various places throughout Greece, more especially at Sparta and Athens, in the latter of which places he had an altar on which only cakes were allowed to be offered.

HYPERCHEIRIA (Gr. hyper, over, and cheir, a hand), a surname given to Hera at Sparta, where, at the command of an oracle, a sanctuary was built to her, when the country was laid waste by the overflow of the river Eurotas.

HYPERDULIA (Gr. hyper, over or beyond, and doulia, service), one of the three species of ADORATION (which see), maintained by Romish divines. This degree of worship was first devised by Thomas Aquinas, and ascribed by him to none but the Virgin Mary. To her alone, accordingly, Romanists still consider this degree of worship as due.

HYPERENOR, a hero-god worshipped at Thebes, as having been one of the men who sprung from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus.

HYPERION, one of the TITANS or Giants, a son of Uranus and Ge, and according to Hesiod, the father of Helios, Selene, and Eos by his sister Theia.

HYPEROCHE, one of two maidens, who, according to Herodotus, were honoured with certain religious rites at Delos, in consequence of having been commissioned by the Hyperboreans to carry to that place sacred offerings enclosed in stalks of wheat.

HYPOPSALMA. See ABCEDARIAN HYMNS.

HYPORCHEMA, the sacred dance around the altar, which, especially among the Dorians, was wont to accompany the songs used in the worship of Apollo. Both men and women were engaged in it. The Hyporchema was practised in Delos, apparently down to the time of Lucian, who refers to this species of religious dance.

HYPORCHEMATA, the songs which were sung in the worship of Apollo in Delos, and were accompanied by the sacred dance called Hyporchema (see preceding article).

HYPOSTASIS, a theological term, brought into use more especially in the controversies on the Trinity, which took place in the fourth century. This word was for a time rather doubtful in its meaning, and contending theologians used it in two different senses indiscriminately, first, as denoting an individual particular substance, and secondly, a common nature or essence. Two different significations being thus attached to the word Hypostasis, some confusion was liable to be introduced into theological disputes, in which Hypostasis and Ousia were not sufficiently distinguished from each other. At length, chiefly through the influence of Augustin, it was agreed that the term Ousia should be used to denote what is common to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, or the abstract; and the term Hyposta- sis should be used to denote the individual, the concrete. Before a distinct understanding was come to on the subject, some theologians asserted that there were three Hypostases in the Godhead, while others refused to make such an assertion. The former meant simply to declare that there were three Persons in the Godhead, while the latter understanding the word Hypostasis to mean the essence of the Godhead, were afraid of being charged with the belief of Three Gods.

HYPOSTATICAL UNION, an expression used in speaking of the constitution of the person of Christ, to denote the union of his human and divine natures, so as to form two Natures in one Person, and not, as the Nestorians assert, two Persons in one Nature.

HYPOTHETICAL BAPTISM, an expression sometimes employed to denote baptism administered to a child of whom it is uncertain whether he has been previously baptized or not. The rubric of the Church of England states, that "if they who bring the infant to the church, give such uncertain answers to the priest's questions as that it cannot appear that the child was baptized with water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," the priest in baptizing the child is to use this form, "If thou art not already baptized, N—, I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

HYPOTHETICAL UNIVERSALISTS, a name sometimes applied to the AMYRALDISTS (which see).

HYPSISTARIANS (Gr. hypsistos, the Highest), a small heretical sect which arose in the fourth century, who, like the EUPHEMITES (which see), with whom Neander thinks, they may have been identical, worshipped only the Supreme, the Almighty God. Gregory of Nazianzum, whose father at first belonged to the sect, charges them with combining Jewish with Pagan elements, worshipping fire with the Pagans, and observing the Sabbath and abstinence from meats with the Jews. Ullmann, in a monograph upon this sect, explains their origin, from a blending together of Judaism and Parsism; Böhmner, who has also devoted a separate treatise to the subject, regards them as identical with the Messalians, and perceives in them the remnant of a monotheism, derived from primitive revelation, but afterwards disfigured by Tsabaism. Gesenius classes them with the Abelians, a sect of the same century.

HYSSOP, a plant much used in the ancient Hebrew ritual for ceremonial sprinklings. Thus when the Israelites came out of Egypt, they were commanded to take a bunch of hyssop, to dip it in the blood of the paschal lamb, and to sprinkle with it the lintel and the two door-posts of their houses. The same plant was used also in the solemn ceremony followed for the purification of lepers, when the Jewish priests dipped a bunch of vegetable and animal matter, composed of hyssop, the branches of cedar, and red wool, in water, and mingling with it the blood of a bird, sprinkled the leper. David, in Ps. li. 7. speaking of spiritual purification, says, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean." Great difficulty has been experienced by commentators in fixing upon the precise plant to which reference is made in Scripture. In 1 Kings iv. 33, the sacred historian, in speaking of the wisdom and extensive learning of Solomon, says, "he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes." This passage would seem to indicate that it was one of the smallest of plants, and moreover, grew out of a wall. Hasselquist, followed by Linnæus and Sir James Smith, declared the hyssop of Solomon to be the Gymnostomum fasciculare, because he found that minute moss growing in profusion on the walls of the modern Jerusalem. A passage, however, occurs in the New Testament, which seems completely to upset this idea. The Apostle John, in describing the details of the crucifixion of Christ, says, xix. 29, "Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth." This statement would seem to imply, that the hyssop here spoken of could not be a small and feeble plant of the musci tribe, such as is referred to in the passage already quoted in reference to the wisdom of Solomon. Bochart, in his erudite 'Hierozoicon,' discusses the claims of no fewer than eighteen different plants. Dr. Kitto, in the Pictorial Bible, states his preference for the Phytolacca decandra, and certainly the length and straightness of the stem which form a characteristic of the various species of phytolacca, seem to explain why the Roman soldier at the crucifixion placed a sponge filled with vinegar upon hyssop in order to raise it to the lips of the Saviour upon the cross. And another circumstance which makes it not unlikely that some plant of the Phytolacca genus, corresponds to the hyssop of Scripture, is the fact that all the species of this genus have peculiar detergent qualities, containing as they do a considerable quantity of potash, so that a hundred pounds of its ashes afford forty-two pounds of pure caustic alkali. Thus such plants are obviously suitable for purification or cleansing. The Phytolacca usually grows to about a foot and a half in height, but in Palestine it sometimes exceeds two feet.

IACCHAGOGI, those whose office it was to carry the statue of IACCHUS (which see), in solemn procession at the celebration of the Eleusinian Mysteries. When thus engaged their heads were crowned with myrtle, and they beat drums and brazen instruments, dancing and singing as they marched along.

IACCHUS, the name applied to the mystic Bacchus in the ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES (which see). He was regarded as a child, the son of Demeter and Zeus, and is by no means to be confounded with Dionysus the son of Zeus and Semele. The name of Iacchus was evidently given to the Phrygian god, because of the festive song of that name, which was sung in honour of him. The sixth day of the Eleusinia was specially dedicated to him, and on that day which bore his name, the statue of the god of vintage carrying a torch, and crowned with a myrtle wreath, was carried triumphantly from the Ceramicos to Eleusis. Then it was that the famous torch procession was held, the people who took part in it being decorated with vine leaves, and marching to the melody of instrumental music, while a numerous procession of the initiated carrying mystic baskets, chaunted in a most tumultuous manner the festive song of Iacchus. Then, moreover, the votaries paused on the bridge of the Cephissus, to ridicule those who passed underneath, and on re-entering the sacred precincts by a gateway, called the mystical entrance, were admitted during the night to the most solemn of all the rites, being themselves thereupon designated the epoptæ or the fully initiated.

IALDABAOTH, the name given by the Ophite sect of Gnostics in the second century to the DEMIURGE (which see), or world-former. In opposing the Judaizing sects of Gnostics, the Ophites evidently inclined to the side of Paganism. The distinction in regard to the Demiurge, between the classes of Gnostic sects, is well pointed out by Neander: "The Ophite system," says he, "represented the origin of the Demiurge, who is here named Ialdabaoth, in altogether the same way as the Valentinian; moreover, in the doctrine of his relation to the higher system of the world, it is easy to mark the transition-point between the two systems. The Valentinian Demiurge is a limited being, who in his limitation imagines he acts with independence. The higher system of the world is at first unknown to him; he serves as its unconscious instrument. In the phenomena, or appearances coming from that higher world, he is at first bewildered and thrown into amazement; not, however, on account of his malignity, but his ignorance. Finally, he is attracted, however, by the godlike, rises from his unconsciousness and ignorance to consciousness, and thereafter serves the higher order of the world with joy. According to the Ophitic system, on the other hand, he is not only a limited being, but altogether hostile to the higher order of world, and so remains. The higher light he is possessed of in virtue of his derivation from the Sophia, he only turns to the bad purpose of strengthening his position against the higher order of the universe, and rendering himself an independent sovereign. Hence the purpose of 'Wisdom' is to deprive him of the spiritual natures that have flowed over into his kingdom, and to draw them back into itself, that so Ialdabaoth with his entire creation, stripped of every rational nature, may be given up to destruction. According to the Valentinian system, on the contrary, the Demiurge constitutes through eternity a grade of rational, moral existence, of subordinate rank indeed, but still belonging to the harmonious evolution of the great whole. Yet here again we can trace a relationship of ideas in the two systems; inasmuch as the Ophites represent the Demiurge as unconsciously and involuntarily subservient to Wisdom, working towards the accomplishment of its plans, and ultimately bringing about his own downfall and annihilation. But if Ialdabaoth is, without willing or knowing it, an instrument to the purposes of divine wisdom, yet this gives him no distinction, as in the Valentinian system, but in this he is even put on a level with absolute evil:—it does not proceed from the excellence of his nature, but from the almighty power of the higher order of world. Even the evil spirit—the serpent form that sprang into existence when Ialdabaoth, full of hatred and jealousy towards man, looked down into the Hyle, and imaged himself on its surface, must against his will serve only as an instrument to bring about the purposes of wisdom."

According to the system of the Ophites, the empire over which Ialdabaoth rules is the starry world, and through the influence of the stars he holds the spirit of man in bondage and servitude. Ialdabaoth, and the spirits begotten by him, are the spirits of the seven great planets, the Sun, the Moon, Mars, Venus, Jupiter, Mercury, and Saturn; and to assert his authority as the self-subsistent Lord and Creator, he gives orders to the six angels under his command to create man after their own common image. The order is obeyed, and man is created a huge corporeal mass, but without a soul, until Ialdabaoth animates it with a living soul, a portion of himself. Thus, to the amazement and indignation of Ialdabaoth, in man was concentrated the light, the soul, the reason of the whole creation. Jealous of the newly formed man, he endeavours to reduce him to a state of blind unconsciousness, and thus of abject submission; but the mundane soul employed the serpent to tempt man to disobedience. Thus the eyes of the first man were opened, and he passed from a state of unconscious limitation to a state of conscious freedom. Man now renounced allegiance to Ialdabaoth, who, to punish him, thrust him down from the region of the upper air, where until now he had dwelt in an ethereal body, into the dark earth, and banished him into a dark body. Man is now in a perilous situation, exposed to the evil influences not only of the seven planetary spirits, but of the purely wicked and material spirits. Wisdom, however, never ceases to support man's kindred nature by fresh supplies of the higher spiritual influence, and thus there is preserved in every age a race in which the seeds of the spiritual nature are saved from destruction.

Ialdabaoth, the god of the Jews, was said by the Ophites to have brought about the crucifixion of Jesus, because by the revelation of the unknown Father he sought to subvert Judaism. After his resurrection, they alleged Jesus remained eighteen months upon the earth, during which time he acquired a clearer knowledge of the higher truth which he communicated to a few of his disciples. Upon this he is raised by the celestial Christ to heaven, and sits at the right hand of Ialdabaoth, unobserved by him, for the purpose of receiving to himself every spiritual nature that has been emancipated and purified by the redemption, and in proportion as Jesus becomes enriched by the attraction to himself of kindred natures, Ialdabaoth is deprived of all his higher virtues. The end is by means of Jesus to procure the enlargement of the spiritual life, confined in nature, and bring it back to its original fountain, the mundane soul, from which all has flowed.

IAPETUS, a Titan, a son of Uranus and Ge, and the father of Prometheus. Hence he was regarded by the ancient Greeks as the ancestor of the human race.

IASO, a daughter of Asclepius, and sister of Hygieia, and worshipped among the ancient Greeks as the goddess of recovery from sickness.

IASONIA, a surname of Athena at Cyzicus.

IBERIAN CHURCH. See GEORGIAN CHURCH.

IBIS, a bird held in the highest veneration among the ancient Egyptians, being consecrated to Thoth, who is generally represented with the head of an Ibis. This bird is known in natural history as the Ardea Ibis, and belongs to the order of birds called the Grallatores or Waders. Its colour is entirely black: its beak remarkably crooked: its neck long and flexible. In general appearance it considerably resembles the stork. By destroying the serpents, frogs and toads which bred in the miry ground and slimy pools after the ebbing of the Nile, it became noted for its usefulness; and so highly were its services valued, that to kill one of these birds was a capital crime. Hasselquist, Savigny, and others, consider the Ibis as identical with the Namenius albus of Cuvier. They admit that it devoured the worms and insects which lay scattered over the muddy nitrous precipitations of the overflowed fields of the Egyptians; and affirm that it was held sacred, not on account of its usefulness in this respect, but simply as being a hieroglyphical symbol of the Nile. It was regarded as presiding over all sacred and mystical learning of the Egyptian hierarchy, and accordingly it was often embalmed; hence many skeletons and mummies of this bird are found in the British Museum. The Numenius albus was considered by Cuvier as identical with the Aboulaunes, a species of curlew which was frequently seen by Bruce on the banks of the Nile.

IBUM, the marriage of a Jew with the widow of his deceased brother, according to the arrangement of the Law of Moses. Thus in Dent. xxv. 5, it is expressly commanded, "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her." See LEVIRATE.

ICELANDERS (RELIGION OF). See SCANDINAVIANS (RELIGION OF ANCIENT).

ICELUS, the son of Somnus, and the brother of Morpheus, a god believed by the ancient Romans to preside over dreams. Ovid says that this deity was called Icelus by the gods, but Phobetor by men.

ICHNEA, a surname of the ancient Greek goddess Themis, derived probably from Ichne, where she was worshipped. Ichne was also a surname of Nemesis.

ICHTHUS (Gr. a fish), a technical word sometimes used among the early Christians to denote Christ, because the initial letters of his names and titles in Greek, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, our Saviour, technically put together make up the name Ichthus. This is alluded to by Tertullian and Optatus, the latter of whom alleges that from this circumstance the font in Christian churches was termed Piscina or fish-pool. A curious allusion to this subject occurs in the work of Tertullian on Baptism, where he says, "We fishes are born in water, conformable to the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, Ichthus, a fish;" and Optatus, when speaking of this technical name, says, "This is the Fish," meaning Christ, "which is brought down upon the waters of the font in baptism by invocation and prayer."

ICHTHYOCENTAURI, fish-centaurs, fabulous beings in the ancient heathen mythology, having the upper part of their bodies of human shape and the lower in the form of a fish; besides a peculiarity which distinguished them from Tritons, was that the place of the hands was supplied with horses' feet.

ICONOCLASTS (Gr. eikon, an image, and klazo, to break), image-breakers, a name which was given to those who rejected the use of images in churches, on account of the zeal which they occasionally displayed in destroying them. It was particularly applied in the eighth century to Leo the Isaurian and his followers, who sought in many cases by deeds of violence to show their abhorrence of IMAGE-WORSHIP (which see).

ICONODULI AND ICONOLATRI (Gr. eikon, an image, and dulia and latria, worship), terms applied to those in the eighth century who favoured the worship of images.

ICONOSTASIS, the screen in Greek churches which separates the holy table, prothesis, and vestry from the nave or body of the church. Within this screen the clergy alone are permitted to enter; there are even express canons to prohibit women going within it. This screen is called Iconostasis, because several ikons or pictures of a sacred character are usually painted upon it. The idea of this screen or veil seems to have been taken from the veil which separated the holy place from the holy of holies in the Jewish temple.

ICOXUS, a sect of religionists in Japan, originating from an individual so esteemed for his sanctity, that his devotees celebrate his festival every year. On that occasion multitudes assemble from all parts of the empire of Japan, imagining that he who first sets foot in the temple is entitled to peculiar blessings. The excessive anxiety of every one to obtain this privilege sometimes leads to fatal consequences from the pressure of the crowd.

IDA, a sacred mountain in Crete, celebrated among the ancient Romans as being the nursing-place of Jupiter. There was a mountain also, or rather a chain of mountains, in Troas, famed as having, according to Homer, been frequented by the gods during the Trojan war.

IDEA MATTER, a name sometimes applied to the goddess CYBELE (which see).

IDÆI DACTYLI. See DACTYLI IDÆI.

IDALIA, a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the town of Idalion in Cyprus.

IDE, one of the Idæan nymphs, to whose care Rhea intrusted the infant Zeus. This was also the name of one of the Idæan nymphs by whom Zeus became the father of one of the Idæan Dactyls.

IDEALISTS, a class of philosophic thinkers, which has chiefly arisen in modern times. They may conveniently be divided into two classes, the subjective idealists, who absorb every thing in the subject, the me; and the objective idealists, who reduce everything to the one infinite, unchangeable, objective substance or being, of which, and in which all things consist. The first in modern times who laid the foundation of idealism in philosophy was Des Cartes, who derived some of our most important notions from the inward activity of the mind, without any reference whatever to sensation, or to the material world around us. By thus removing the notion of matter to a distance, and concentrating the whole attention of the mind upon its own innate ideas, he brought out into peculiar prominence the notion of the infinite and all-perfect Being. Male-branche, pushing to its legitimate conclusions the idealism of Des Cartes, taught that the human mind sees everything in the Divine, and that God himself is our intelligible world. All secondary causes were thus merged in the one infinite cause, and human liberty was lost in a continued succession of Divine impulses. It was Spinoza, however, who developed the ultimate results of the Cartesian principles. He absorbed both man and nature in God, our whole individuality being absorbed in the Divine substance, human freedom giving place to the most absolute fatalism, and God being deprived of all personality, becoming synonymous with the universe, embracing in himself alone all its endless phenomena.

In England, Herbert, Cumberland, and Cadworth came forward as advocates of the idealist system, declaring certain connate principles or laws of nature as being at the foundation of the whole social nature of man, as well as the framework of society. The "connate principles" of Cumberland are the "pure conceptions" of Cadworth, and are no other than the eternal truths of Plato, which existed from all eternity in the mind of God, and towards which the mind may ever strive to attain. With Locke commenced a reaction against idealism, and the introduction of a system of sensationalism which struck at the root of those fundamental principles which are so important to the interests of morality and religion. Lord Shaftesbury was the first to point out the dangerous influence of the sensational system of Locke. Clarke and Butler followed with powerful arguments in favour of God and revealed religion drawn from the mental and moral constitution of man. So far all was moderate and useful. But Bishop Berkeley appeared, setting forth a system of extreme idealism, which went far to ignore the existence of an external world, and to make man live only in a world of objectless ideas. The idealistic system of Berkeley, combined with the idealistic scepticism of Hume, threw the utmost discredit upon the whole speculative philosophy of the idealists, and led to the formation of a school of Scotch philosophy, which, by a combination of all that was good in both the sensationalist and idealist systems, tended to reconcile the two conflicting philosophies on the ground of common sense.

It is Germany, however, that may properly be considered as the native soil of Idealism. The German mind is naturally prone to idealistic views, which, accordingly, form the staple of their most profound philosophical systems. Previous to the days of Leibnitz it had been a recognized axiom, that "all that exists in the understanding, previously existed in sensation," and to that illustrious philosopher belongs the high merit of having first made the important remark, "except the understanding itself." Hence he drew the inference that there are necessary truths, the certainty of which is founded not on experience, but on intuition. He saw plainly that the idealism of Des Cartes, Malebranche, and Spinoza went to deprive the universe of a cause, and to render all created things nothing more than modes of the one infinite and unalterable existence. To obviate this difficulty he supposed material objects to be all of them of a compound character, consisting of monads or ultimate atoms, each of them containing an inward energy, by virtue of which they develop themselves spontaneously. The absolute, the original monad, is God, from which all other monads have their origin, both the conscious atoms of soul, and the unconscious atoms of matter. The atoms are all of them independent of one another, and, therefore, can have no mutual action and reaction. To explain this, Leibnitz devised the doctrine of a pre-existent harmony, whereby all the monads, though acting separately and independently, act nevertheless in complete unison and harmony, so as to accomplish the great purpose of their creation. Thus, in the view of Leibnitz, God has brought into actual operation the best possible order of things. "Hence again," says Mr. Morell, "his theory of metaphysical evil, as consisting simply in limitation; of physical evil, as the result of this limitation; and of moral evil, as being permitted for the sake of a greater ultimate good. Hence, lastly, his support of the doctrine of philosophical necessity, as being the only kind of liberty which is consistent with the pre-established order of the universe. In the view, therefore, which Leibnitz took of the innate faculties of the human mind, as opposed to the empiricism of Locke; in his dynamical theory of matter, making it ultimately homogeneous with spirit; in his denial of the mutual influence of the soul and the body, thus destroying, to say the least, the necessity of the latter in accounting for our mental phenomena; in all this we see the fruitful seeds of idealism, which only needed to be cast into a congenial soil, to expand into a complete and imposing system."

But the eminent German thinker, who gave a decided form and shape to the Idealist philosophy, was Immanuel Kant. He set himself to discover the primary elements of consciousness, and to lay down with simplicity and clearness the possibility, value, and extent of à priori notions or intuitions. The true tests of such à priori conceptions were, according to Kant, universality and necessity, and by applying these tests we discover two universal and necessary ideas attached to every perception, namely time and space. Our knowledge, then, is strictly phenomenal under the two fixed forms of time and space; and all investigations into the essence of things must necessarily be fruitless. We are furnished, according to the philosophy of Kant, with another faculty, that of understanding, which gives form and figure to the material furnished by sensation. He discovered, also, certain necessary forms of our understanding, which he called categories, or fixed relations. Thus, by a close analytical investigation, he was able to unfold the quantity, quality, relation, and mode of ex istence of all objects whatever. The sensitive faculty affords the matter of a notion, and the understanding the form. That which connects the two, and which forms the schema of our notions, is Time. The highest faculty in the Kantian philosophy is pure reason, which aims at the final, the absolute, the unconditioned in human knowledge. "But now the best," to quote the language of Morell, "the most satisfactory, and by far the most useful part of the Kantian philosophy is to come, that, namely, in which he sets aside the results of speculative reason by those of the practical reason. The immortality of the soul, the freedom of the will, the existence of God, and all such supersensual ideas cannot, it is true, be demonstrated; but, says Kant, our reason has not only a speculative movement, it has also a practical movement, by which it regulates the conduct of man, and does this with such a lofty bearing and such an irresistible authority that it is impossible for any rational being to deny its dictates. (Categorical imperative.) Ideas, therefore, which in theory cannot hold good in practice are seen to have a reality, because they become the cause of human actions, an effect which could never take place if there were not some real existence to produce it.

"That man has indisputably a moral nature, and that he is imperatively commanded to act according to it, no good man will deny. But what does this moral nature and this command to action imply? Manifestly it implies the freedom of the will, for otherwise action on moral principles is impossible; it implies also the existence of God, otherwise there were a law without a lawgiver; and it implies, lastly, a future state as the goal to which all human actions tend. In this part of his philosophy, therefore, Kant rendered good service to the true interests of morality; neither can we too much admire the force with which he repels all the low, selfish, and utilitarian grounds of morality, basing it all upon the categorical imperative, the authoritative voice of the great Lawgiver of the universe, as its everlasting foundation. It is true that all these matters lie beyond the region of actual science, but nevertheless they are within the bounds of a rational faith (vernunft-glaube), the dictates of which every good, virtuous, and religious mind will readily admit."

Thus Kant laid a new foundation for philosophy upon the twofold ground of the pure and the practical reason, making scientific knowledge almost entirely subjective.

The modern German school of philosophy is in its true character essentially idealistic. It concerns itself little with the ever-changing phenomena, whether of the internal or the external world, but directs its whole energies to the solution of the great problems which relate to the existence and the nature of God, of the universe, and of human freedom. It passes from the finite and the conditioned to find a solid foundation for all its inquiries in the infinite and unconditioned. "The philosophy of the absolute," says one of the most recent historians of modern philosophy, "that which seeks to penetrate into the principles of things,—although it may seem strange to our modes and habits of thought, yet has played a great part in the scientific history of the world. It formed the basis of the early speculations of the Asiatic world. It characterized some of the most remarkable phases of the early Greek philosophy, particularly that of the Eleatic school. Plato, with all the lofty grandeur of his sublime spirit, sought for the absolute, in the archetypes existing in the Divine mind. The Alexandrine philosophers aimed at the solution of the same problem; mingling their theories with the mysticism of the East, and calling, even, to their aid, the lights of the Christian revelation. In more recent times Spinoza originated similar investigations, which were soon moulded into a system of stern and unflinching pantheism; and in him we see the model, upon which the modern idealists of Germany have renewed their search into the absolute ground of all phenomena. It is, in fact, in the various methods, by which it is supposed, that we are conducted to the absolute, whether by faith, intuition, or reason, that the different phases of the German metaphysics have originated; and, consequently, it is by keeping our eye upon this point, that we shall possess the most ready key to their interpretation."

Kant led the way in Germany towards subjective idealism, but Fichte went far beyond his master in the same direction, making self or the Ego the absolute principle of all philosophy both intellectual and moral. The outward universe was, in his view, nothing more than the reflex of our own activity. All reasoning being thus necessarily limited within the narrow circle of our own conscious existence, it was plainly impossible to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion in reference to the existence of God. Nature and God alike disappeared in the system of Fichte: and self, or the Ego became the sole existence in the universe. At this point the idealism of Germany reached its climax and consummation. In his later years, Fichte felt the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of maintaining the position in which he had at first entrenched himself. If self is the sole absolute existence by which the whole universe is constructed, the question naturally arises, What is the foundation of this activity of the Ego, which we term mind? Is there not something real at the foundation of these subjective phenomena? Questions of this kind led to a modification by Fichte of his philosophical system, by introducing another absolute principle besides the Ego or self. Hence the philosophy of Identity, which, though originating with Fichte, was afterwards matured and systematized by Schelling. Self was no longer viewed as the one absolute existence, but the one absolute existence was now asserted to belong both to the subject and the object, the me and the not-me, self and the universe, both of which are identical, being alike manifestations of one and the same absolute Divine mind, or actual modifications of the Divine essence. God and the universe, as well as God and self are pronounced to be identical: "This infinite Being, containing everything in itself potentially which it can afterwards become actually, strives by the law which we have above indicated after self-development. By the first movement (the potency of reflection) it embodies its own infinite attributes in the finite. In doing this, it produces finite objects, i. e. finite reflections of itself, and thus sees itself objectified in the forms and productions of the material world. This first movement then gives rise to the philosophy of nature. The second movement (potency of subsumption) is the regress of the finite into the infinite; it is nature, as above constituted, again making itself absolute, and reassuming the form of the Eternal. The result of this movement is mind, as existing in man, which is nothing else than nature gradually raised to a state of consciousness, and attempting in that way to return to its infinite form. The combination of these two movements (the potency of reason) is the reunion of the subject and object in divine reason; it is God, not in his original or potential, but in his unfolded and realized existence, forming the whole universe of mind and being."

According to this extreme idealistic system, there is no difference between God and the Universe. The system was as completely as that of Spinoza, a system of absolute pantheism, and the whole universe, both of mind and matter, was made one necessarily acting machine. Schelling felt that his philosophy was liable to this serious and even fatal objection, and after revolving the whole subject more maturely, he gave to the world his Positive Philosophy, as he called his new system, in opposition to his former views, which he termed his Negative Philosophy. The one system was not intended to contradict, but to complete and perfect the other.

The following admirable resumé of Schelling's new or positive philosophy is given by Morell: "In order to rise above the pantheistic point of view, we must distinguish between the Absolute, as ground of all things, and Godhead, as one particular manifestation of it. The primary form of the Absolute is will or self-action. It is an absolute power of becoming in reality what it is in the germ. The second form in which it appears is that of being; i. e. the realization of what its will or power indicated to be possible. But as yet there is no personality, no Deity properly so called. For this we must add the further idea of freedom, which is the power that the Absolute possesses of remaining either in its first or its second potency, as above stated. In this unity, which contains the three ideas of action, of existence, and of freedom, consists the proper idea of God. God, before the existence of the world, is the undeveloped, impersonal, absolute essence, from which all things proceed; it is only after this essence is developed, and has passed successively into the three states of action, of objective existence, and of freedom, that he attains personality, and answers to the proper notion of Deity.

"With regard to creation, we can now explain the existence of the world without identifying it with Deity, as is done in the ordinary pantheistic hypothesis. The absolute is the real ground of all things that exist, but the absolute is not yet Deity. That element in it, which passes into the creation and constitutes its essence, is not the whole essence of Deity: it is not that part of it which, peculiarly speaking, makes it divine. The material world then, is simply one form or potency in which the absolute chooses to exist; in which it freely determines to objectify itself, and consequently is only one step towards the realization of the full conception of Deity, as a Divine Person.

"Man is the summit of the creation—he is that part of it in which the absolute sees himself most fully portrayed as the perfect image or type of the infinite reason. In him, objective creation has taken the form of subjectivity; and hence he is said, in contradistinction to everything else, to have been formed in the image of God.

"To solve the problem of moral evil, we must keep in mind, that man, though grounded in the absolute, still is not identified with Deity; since the divine element, namely, the unity of the three potencies of the original essence, is wanting to him. Still, man bears a perfect resemblance to God, and therefore must be free, and fully capable of acting, if he choose, against his own destiny. This actually took place, inasmuch as he attempted, like God, to create, separating the three potencies, which were shadowed forth in him as the image of Deity, and not being able in doing so to retain their unity. Hence the will of man was removed from the centre of the divine will, attempted to act independently, and brought confusion and moral obliquity into his nature. Man would become like a God, and by attempting to do so, he lost the very image of God which he did possess."

The idealist views of Fichte and Schelling, though agreeing in some respects, start from two different and even opposite points; the former setting out from the subjective, and the latter from the objective, the one regarding self as the absolute, the other, the infinite and eternal mind. Hegel, however, has carried to its extreme limit the idealism of Germany. He denies the existence alike of the subject and the object, self and the universe, and considers the only real existence to be the relation between the two, and the universe therefore to be a universe of relations. God, instead of being an absolute and self-existent reality, is a constantly developing process, manifesting itself in the progress of the human consciousness. He is an eternally advancing process of thinking, going onward in a threefold movement, the first, being thought simply considered in itself, the second, thought in its objective aspect, which is nature, and the third, thought returning to itself, which is mind. Thus with Hegel, God is not a person, but a series of thoughts of an eternal mind.

Germany, during the last quarter of a century, has been the scene of an almost uninterrupted struggle between Bible theologians and Atheistic or rather Pantheistic Idealists. Nowhere else has the pernicious influence of Idealism upon the religion of a country been felt so sensibly as in Germany. There we find a class of writers terming themselves Rationalists, and carrying with them a large body of intelligent and thoughtful men, who have reasoned themselves into a rejection of the whole objective element of Christianity, leaving nothing but the a priori religious conceptions of the human mind. And even these original conceptions are not left intact by this baneful philosophy. The belief in the existence of a God, for example, what does it become in the hands of a German idealist, who has arrived at the conviction that God is one with the universe itself? Such a natural theology is nothing less than pure unblushing infidelity in a different form from that which it was wont to assume. The infidel has often declared that God is the universe, and the modern German Idealist affirms that the universe is God. In both cases alike, the one personal God is lost in a vague abstraction which can neither attract our love nor awaken our fears.

For a time, in consequence of the extreme views put forward by Strauss and the Tübingen school, a reaction took place, and idealism began to lose its prestige and influence, but between 1844 and 1848, in Northern Germany more especially, the system was revived in its worst forms by the Friends of Light, headed by Uhlich of Magdeburg, and the German Catholics, headed by Ronge. This movement, though it excited a great sensation while it lasted, was fortunately only temporary in its duration; and for some years past Idealistic Infidelity has been giving place throughout almost every part of Germany to a practical Christianity, which, by means of Young Men's Associations, Inner Missions, and other religious and philanthropic movements, is rapidly diffusing a love of evangelical truth among all classes of the people. See HEGELIANS, INFIDELS, INTUITIONISTS.

IDENTITY (PHILOSOPHY OF), that system of philosophical belief which originated in Germany in the present century with Fichte, and was carried out to its full extent by Schelling, whereby an entire identity was maintained to exist between God and the Universe. See IDEALISTS.

IDINI, the term used to denote sacrifice among the Kafirs. This rite is performed to their ancestors, not to the Supreme Being. They seem to think that by burning fat or rather bones to them, they can appease their anger. The Idini was rarely practised, and only in cases where they wished to avert some apprehended evil.

IDIOTÆ (Gr. private men), a name applied by some of the early Christian writers to the private members of the church as distinguished from the clergy and those who held public office in the church. The same term was applied by the Jews to private judges or arbiters, chosen by private parties to settle disputes, and they received the name of Idiotæ, because they were the lowest rank of judges, and not settled as a standing court by the Sanhedrim.

IDMON, a son of Apollo and Asteria, worshipped by the Megarians and Boeotians at Heracleia as the protector of the place.

IDOL, a fancied representation of a heathen god. According to the popular traditions of ancient Greece, there never was a time when the gods had not a visible representation of one form or another. It is probable indeed, that for a long period there existed in Greece no other statues than those of the gods. According to Eusebius, the Greeks were not worshippers of images before the time of Cecrops, who first of all erected statues to Minerva. Plutarch informs us, that Numa forbade the Romans to represent the deity under the form of a man or an animal. Lucian says that the ancient Egyptians had no statues in their temples, and Herodotus affirms that the ancient Persians had no images of their gods, while Cæsar alleges that the Germans had few. Tacitus, speaking of the last-mentioned people, says, "Their deities were not immured in temples, nor represented under any kind of resemblance to the human form. To do either, were in their opinion to derogate from the majesty of superior beings."

Idols were probably at first of the rudest form, being nothing more than shapeless blocks of wood or stone. The Phœnicians indeed in very remote times worshipped the BÆTYLIA (which see), or large meteoric stones which had fallen from the atmosphere, and which were believed to be sent down by the gods themselves as their images. Hence these stones were sometimes called heaven-stones. The worship of the Bætylia, however, was not limited to the Phœnicians; a holy stone was held as sacred to Cybele in Galatia; another to the sun-god Heliogabalus in Syria; and another still to Apollo at the temple of Delphi. Jablonski also declares that the principal idol among the ancient Arabians was a square black stone, four feet high, and two feet broad, to which they gave the name of Dysares. In the same category may be classed the Kaaba of the modern Mohammedans.

From the barbarous and uncouth appearance of the idols of many heathen tribes, it may be inferred that the earliest efforts of the theopoiot or god-makers must have been sufficiently unartistic. And yet from several passages in the Iliad of Homer, we learn, that both temples and statues of the gods existed in the early ages of Grecian history. The Ionians of Asia Minor were more especially remarkable for their sculptured representations of the gods. The first efforts at statuary, both in the colonies and in the mother-country of Greece, were undoubtedly statues of their divinities. For private and domestic devotion, rather than public worship, idols were constructed of baked clay. Those which were designed to be placed in temples were composed more generally of wood, but afterwards of marble and bronze, executed in what is called the archaic or hieratic style, which was so scrupulously followed for a long period that Greek art in this department was stationary. The ancient forms of the gods were strictly preserved, even when improvement had taken place in the material of which they were composed, wood being exchanged for marble, bronze, ivory, and even gold. In one class of statues of the gods, those namely which were dedicated in the temples as anathemata, no such rigid adherence to traditional custom was demanded, and here, accordingly, artists gradually rose to a higher style of art. When Athens, however, in the end of the fifth and beginning of the fourth century before Christ, became the centre of the fine arts in Greece, statuary became emancipated from its ancient restrictions, and the representations of the gods were executed in a style of surpassing beauty approaching even to the sublime. The statue of Pallas by Phidias, and much more that of the Olympian Zeus by the same artist, were universally admired. After the Peloponnesian war, the school of Scopas and Praxiteles arose, which was for a time considered as superior even to that of Phidias; but though their female statues were probably unrivalled, the productions of this school, generally speaking, failed to affect the mind of the spectator with those pure and ennobling feelings which were excited by the contemplation of the statues which came from the hand of Phidias. In the various kingdoms which arose out of the conquests of Alexander the Great, statues of the gods were seldom made, and the arts both of painting and statuary finding ample scope in secular objects, ceased to direct their exclusive or even their happiest efforts to representations of pagan deities. Nay, the vanity of kings tended to introduce a new kind of statues, the bust of a king being sometimes placed upon the body of a statue of a god. Etruscan art combined the Grecian style of statuary with the old Asiatic or Babylonian, which, while it constructed idols of a colossal size, formed them of a composite character of beasts and men, being intended rather as typical and emblematic figures than statues of gods.

The Romans are believed to have had no images of the gods before the time of the first Tarquin: and for a long time after that period they were indebted to Etruscan artists for their statues of wood or clay. The earliest metal statue of a deity is asserted by Pliny to have been a statue of Ceres, about B.C. 485. Livy, however, mentions a metal colossal statue of Jupiter Capitolinus, as having been made about B.C. 490. During the Empire, artists sometimes flattered the Emperors by representing them in statues under a deified character, and the ladies of the imperial family as goddesses.

The introduction of Christianity, and more especially its establishment in the Roman Empire in the fourth century of our era, proved the destruction of pagan idols, however skilfully and elegantly formed. This crusade against the statues of the gods commenced in the latter part of the reign of Constantine, and continued gradually to advance, until under Theodosius the Younger it pervaded all parts of the Empire. Not that the Christians despised the arts, or were incapable of appreciating æsthetic excellence whether in painting or in sculpture, but their hostility to pagan idols was wholly of a religious nature. They detested idolatry, even though decorated with the most attractive charms of artistic beauty. It is enough to point to the remarkable progress of art in the middle ages, in order to vindicate Christianity from the charge which has sometimes been ignorantly brought against it, that the spirituality of its character has rendered it the enemy of the fine arts.

Idols, in the early ages, were usually coloured not so much from a love of ornament as to convey emblematic truths. On this subject Mr. Gross makes the following judicious remarks: "The colours of the images of the gods were usually of symbolical import, and they seem to require a brief notice in this place, as they are a constituent element of iconology. According to Winckelmann, 'On Allegory,' Bacchus was clad in a red or scarlet robe, the emblem of wine, or as some suppose, of the victory which the jolly god achieved over mankind when he introduced among them many of the arts and comforts of life. Pan, Priapus, the Satyrs, etc., were likewise painted red, and Plutarch assures us that red was originally the prevailing colour of the idols. Osiris—the personification of the solar year of the Egyptians—was represented in a painting of vast dimensions, with a blue face and blue arms and feet, and resting on a black ground; symbolical of the sun in its subterrestrial orbit. Black and blue also distinguished the portrait of the planetary god Saturn, and were typical of the sun in Capricorn, or its southern declension to the zone of sable Ethiopia. As the king of the lower regions, Serapis was painted black among the Egyptians, while the image of Jupiter among the same people, was ash-grey or scarlet; that of Mars a red stone, and Venus's dyed with the same colour; that of Apollo shone in the lustrous hue of gold, and Mercury's was covered with the modest blue. The natural colours of the stones of which the images of the gods were formed, were often selected on account of their allegorical significance. Thus that indefatigable traveller, Pausanias, informs us that the river-gods of the ancients were made altogether of white marble, and that only for the statue of the Nile, a black stone was chosen to denote the Ethiopic origin of the fluvial divinity: a Nilie bust in the Napoleon-museum confirms this statement. Agreeably to their cosmogony, the Hindoos selected the dark-blue colour to typify water as the primordial element of creation. Hence this colour also designated Narajan, the mover of the primitive waters. According to Jones' Dissertations relating to Asia, a handsome image of this god wrought in blue marble, might be seen at Catmandu, the principal city of Nepal, in a reclining attitude, and in the act of swimming. On the first of January, the Roman consul, clothed in a white toga, and mounted upon a white horse, rode up to the Capitol: it was in honour of Jupiter, who—as we learn from Pherocydes, was adored there as the sun-god of the Romans, as also in commemoration of the victory of that deity over the giants, when the many-eyed and many-handed Briareus—winter, as the mischievous leader of the rebellious host, was himself most signally defeated. This consular ceremony presented the living image of the solar deity, imbued with the hue of light. Finally, Ceres was the black or the refulgent goddess, accordingly as she spent her time in the hadean or supernal regions; and Vesta, as the earth, was green, while in her capacity of fire-goddess, the colour of flame defined and illustrated her divinity."

The idea which heathens generally have formed of idols is, that after they are consecrated with certain ceremonies the gods come down and take up their abode in them, so that the images are honoured as the mansions of the gods. And Augustin, giving an account of the opinions of the Egyptian Hermes Trismegistus, says, "He maintained images to be, as it were, the bodies of the gods; certain spirits had their residence in them, having been invited thither by their worshippers, and had great power in granting the prayers and bringing about such things as were requested of them. This uniting of invisible spirits with images, and forming them into one animated body, he termed the making of gods; and held that there were people who were masters of that great and wonderful art." This was the common opinion among the heathens. Dr. Pococke asserts, that the adoration which the ancient Arabs paid their gods was founded on this indwelling principle; and he informs us from their writers that when Mohammed and his followers destroyed their idols at Mecca, they believed the spirits which dwelt in them were to be seen in tears bewailing and lamenting their condition as being deprived of their earthly abodes.

IDOLATERS, worshippers of idols, or persons who ascribe to created objects qualities and attributes peculiar to the Creator. It is difficult to ascertain at what precise period mankind began to swerve from the worship of the only true God into idolatry. There is some reason to believe that the Antediluvian world was not altogether free from this heinous sin. In Gen. vi. 11, we are told that "the earth also was corrupt before God," which is interpreted by the Jewish doctors as referring to the prevalence of impurity or idolatry. And when it is said, in reference to the days of Enos, the son of Seth, "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord,"

Maimonides and the Rabbis generally translate the passage thus: "Then was there profanation by invoking the name of the Lord," implying in their view that the name of God was given to creatures. But whether such a rendering of this passage be allowable or not, a comparison of Gen. vi. 5, with Rom. i. 23, seems to favour the notion that idolatry was practised before the Flood. And Sanchoniatho, one of the oldest of profane writers, states, that the sun came to be worshipped in the second generation from Adam, and pillars or rude stones in the fifth generation, and statues and eminent persons in the ninth.

Soon after the Deluge we find idolatry prevailing in the world. The family of Abraham worshipped idols beyond the river Euphrates in Ur of the Chaldees, and Laban of Mesopotamia had teraphim or idols, which Rachel secretly carried with her when she left her father's house. The Egyptians were given to idolatry before Jacob and his sons went down thither; and from Josh. xxiv. 14, it appears plain that the Israelites served idols in the land of Egypt. On their departure from the land of bondage, we find them worshipping idols, and when they had settled in the land of Canaan, they adopted various deities, which were worshipped by the Canaanites and other neighbouring nations.

The first of the Jewish kings who introduced idolatry as a national worship was Solomon, who not only himself served strange gods, but caused temples to be erected throughout the country in their honour, and burnt incense to them. Jeroboam, who headed the rebellion of the ten tribes, set up the worship of two golden calves, one at Bethel, and the other at Dan. Nor was the king of Judah guiltless of this gross sin; on the contrary, his people excelled their fathers in the homage which they paid to false gods, for we are told 1 Kings xiv. 23, that "they also built them high places, and images, and groves, on every high hill, and under every green tree." Many of the kings of Judah were idolaters, but Ahaz surpassed them all. He walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, made molten images of Baalim, and it is related of him in 2 Kings xvi. 3, "But he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, yea, and made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel." The brazen serpent which Moses had made at the command of God had been converted into an idol, and incense was burned to it, but Hezekiah, in his zeal for the worship of the true God, broke it in pieces, and called it Nehushtan, a mere piece of brass. The succeeding princes vied with each other in their attachment to idols with the honourable exception of good king Josiah. After the return of the Jews, however, from their seventy years' captivity in Babylon, they wholly renounced idolatry by the advice of Ezra and Nehemiah.

known by the name of Tsabaism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, namely, the sun, moon, and stars. This seems to have prevailed among the Babylonians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians. To that may have succeeded the worship of the elements, particularly of fire, which was practised at an early period in Chaldea and Persia. "Each element," says Mallet in his Northern Antiquities, "was, according to the faith of primeval man, under the guidance of some being peculiar to it. The earth, the water, the fire, the air, the sun, moon, and stars, had each their respective divinity. The trees, forests, rivers, mountains, rocks, winds, thunder, and tempests, had the same; and merited on that score a religious worship, which at first could not be directed to the visible object, but to the intelligence with which it was animated."

An idea has prevailed among almost all heathen nations, that the authority and influence of the gods were limited to particular localities. Hence in 2 Kings xvii. 26, the colonists sent by the king of Assyria to Samaria, attributed a severe calamity with which they were visited to their ignorance of the manner of the local deities. "Wherefore they spake to the king of Assyria, saying, 'The nations which thou hast removed, and placed in the cities of Samaria, know not the manner of the God of the land: therefore he hath sent lions among them, and, behold, they slay them, because they know not the manner of the God of the land.'" And again, 1 Kings xx. 23, we find the servants of the king of Syria endeavouring to persuade their master that the gods of the Israelites were gods of the hills only, and not of the plain. The same notion seems to have pervaded the whole mythology of Greece and Rome; for while the higher deities were regarded as having a more extensive range of authority in every separate department of nature, every city or single locality had its own special authority who presided over it. The greater deities also were imagined sometimes to clothe themselves in the bodies of men, and quitting Olympus for a time, to hold converse with the inhabitants of earth. Hence the exclamation in Acts xiv. 11, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men." In any great emergency it has been the custom of all heathen nations to seek to propitiate the favour of one or other of the gods; and any sudden deliverance or special event, whether wearing a good or evil aspect, has been generally ascribed to the interposition of their deities.

In the early Christian church, idolatry was accounted one of the great crimes which were punished with excommunication. There were several degrees of the sin. Some went openly to the heathen temples, and there offered incense to the idols, and were partakers of the sacrifices. Cyprian often styles such persons sacrificati and thurificati; and he draws a distinction between those who not only themselves sacrificed, but compelled their wives and children and servants to go and sacrifice along with them; and those who, to deliver their families and friends from persecution, went to sacrifice themselves alone. The latter he considered as less aggravated transgressors. In the same view of the case, the council of Ancyra, in its fourth canon, orders, "that they who were compelled to go to an idol temple, if they went with a cheerful air, and in a festival habit, and took share of the feast with unconcernedness, should do six years' penance, one as hearers only, three as prostrators, and two as co-standers to hear the prayers, before they were admitted to full communion again. But if they went in a mourning habit to the temple, and wept all the time they eat of the sacrifice, then four years' penance should be sufficient to restore them to perfection." The eighth canon of the same council orders, "Those who repeated their crime by sacrificing twice or thrice, to do a longer penance; for seven years is appointed to be their term of discipline." And by the ninth canon, "If any not only sacrificed themselves, but also compelled their brethren, or were the occasion of compelling them, then they were to do ten years' penance, as guilty of a more heinous wickedness." The seventh canon, however, assigns only two years' penance to those who neither sacrificed nor eat things offered to idols, but only their own meat on a heathen festival in an idol temple. In extreme cases, where a professing Christian lapsed into idolatry voluntarily, and without compulsion, severe punishment was inflicted. By one of the Nicene canons, they were appointed to undergo twelve years' penance before they were perfectly restored again to full communion. The council of Valence in France goes farther, and obliges them to do penance all their lives, and only to receive absolution in the hour of death. The council of Eliberis goes beyond even this, and denies such deliberate apostates communion in the very last extremity: declaring, "That if any Christian took upon him the office of flamen or Roman priest, and therein offered sacrifice, doubling and trebling his crime by murder and adultery, he should not be received to communion at the hour of death."

Another class of professing Christians who lapsed into idolatry, and were in consequence charged with renouncing the faith, received the name of Libellatici, from certain libels or writings, which they either gave to the heathen magistrates or received from them, in order to be excused from doing sacrifice in public. Some of this order of idolaters gave a written statement subscribed with their own hands, declaring themselves not to be Christians, and professing their readiness to sacrifice when called by the magistrate to do so. Others, in order to screen themselves from an open avowal of apostasy, sent a heathen friend or servant to sacrifice in their names, and thus to procure a written testimonial, which might make them pass for heathens. Others, still, confessed openly to the heathen magistrates that they were Christians, and could not sacrifice to idols, but at the same time they offered a bribe to obtain a libel of security. Cases actually occurred of Christians who feigned madness to avoid being called upon to offer sacrifice, and it sometimes happened that individuals would go forward to the heathen altar as if to offer sacrifice, and would fall down suddenly, as if in an epileptic fit, in order to excite the compassion of the magistrate, and lead him to exempt them from the performance of the heathen rite. This was of course looked upon by the church as an act of dissimulation, and by the penitential rules of Peter, bishop of Alexandria, the persons who were guilty of it were subjected to penance for six months. And not only those who were directly chargeable with sacrificing to idols, but all who in any way promoted or encouraged or even connived at idolatrous practices, were visited more or less severely with ecclesiastical censures. Thus the trade of making idols for the heathen was accounted by the early Christians a scandalous profession, and no man who lived by such a calling could be admitted to baptism, unless he promised to renounce it. Tertullian charges it as a great crime upon Hermogenes, that he followed the trade of painting images for idolatrous worship. From the remarks of Tertullian in his book on Idolatry, it would appear that in his time the discipline of the church in regard to idol-makers was so lax, that such offenders were permitted not only to communicate, but to take orders in the church. The same Father considers those involved in the charge of idolatry, who contributed toward the worship of idols, either by erecting altars, or building temples, or making shrines, or beautifying and adorning idols. He denounces also those whom he terms purveyors for idolatry, among whom he includes all merchants selling frankincense to the idol-temples, and all who made a trade of buying and selling the public victims.

At a very early period in the history of the Christian church, a dispute arose as to the lawfulness or unlawfulness of eating meats offered in sacrifice to idols. The apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. viii., places the question in a clear and convincing light. He admits that an idol is nothing, and that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is nothing, or of no importance, abstractly considered. But much depends upon the circumstances in which the action is performed. If a Christian man enters an idol temple, and there sits down with idolaters, partaking of their feast upon that which has been sacrificed to idols, he is plainly guilty of an abuse of his Christian liberty, a direct encouragement of idolatry, and an offence against the conscientious scruples of his Christian brethren. In the Acts of Lucian the martyr, he is said to have chosen rather to die with hunger than to eat things offered to idols, when his persecutors would allow him no other sustenance in prison. In doing so Lucian acted on clear Christian principle, well knowing that his heathen enemies wished to involve him in what they considered a connivance at idolatry. And Baronius, in his Annals, gives a similar instance in the case of the Christians of Constantinople, who, when Julian the Apostate had ordered all the meat in the shambles to be polluted with idolatrous lustrations, firmly and resolutely abstained from purchasing the polluted food, and used boiled corn instead of bread, thus defeating the intention of the Emperor. It was regarded even as a breach of Christian duty to be present at an idol-sacrifice through mere curiosity, although no active part was taken in it,—an indirect encouragement of idolatry which was forbidden by the council of Eliberis, under the penalty of ten years' penance. And the council of Ancyra made a decree, that such as feasted with the heathen upon any idol festival, in any place set apart for that service, though they carried their own meat and eat it there, should do two years' penance for it. Among the Apostolical canons there is one which forbids Christians to carry oil to any heathen temple or Jewish synagogue, or to set up lights on their festivals, under the penalty of excommunication. Every kind of idolatry was visited in the primitive ages with the censures of the church. Thus the Angelici were accounted heretics for worshipping angels; the Simonians and Carpoerations for worshipping images; and the Collyridians for worshipping the Virgin Mary. Nay, so far does Tertullian carry his views of this subject that he determines it to be a species of idolatry for a schoolmaster to teach the names of the heathen gods to his scholars, or for a Christian to bear arms or fly in times of persecution. But while such extreme opinions are nowhere found in the writings of the earlier Christian fathers, one great principle pervades the whole, that no creature, of whatsoever excellence, was to be worshipped with religious worship except the Living and the True God. Idolatry of every kind was viewed with the utmost abhorrence, and called down the heaviest spiritual censures which the Church could inflict.

IDRIS. See EDNIS.

IDUNA, the wife of BRAGI, (which see) in the Scandinavian mythology. She is alleged to keep in a box the apples which the gods, when they feel old age approaching, have only to taste to become young again. Thus they are kept in renovated youth.

IDYA, the knowing goddess among the ancient Greeks, the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and the wife of Æetes the king of Colchis.

IFAYS, wooden tablets among the Japanese of a peculiar shape, containing inscriptions commemorative of the dead, mentioning the date of his decease, and the name given to him since that event. The ifays are carried in the funeral procession along with the body to the grave, and one of them is placed over it, remaining there for seven weeks, when it is removed to make way for the grave-stone. Another of the ifays is set up during the period of mourning in the best apartment of the house of the deceased. Sweetmeats, fruits, and tea are placed before it, and morning, noon, and night, food is of ferred to it, served up as to a living person. Two candles, fixed in candlesticks, burn before it, night and day, and a lighted lantern is hung up on either side. The whole household of both sexes, including the servants, pray before it morning and evening. This is kept up for seven weeks, and during each week a priest attends each day and reads hymns for an hour before the ify. He is each time supplied with ornaments and paid a fee of from five to six mas.

IGLAU (TREATY OF), a celebrated compact ratified at Iglau in Bohemia, which closed the long protracted war between the Hussites and the Roman Catholics. The date of this treaty is the 30th November 1433. See HUSSITES.

IGNATIUS (ST.) FESTIVAL OF, a festival observed by the Greek church on the 20th December annually, in honour of Ignatius, the Christian martyr, who perished in the reign of Trajan, in the beginning of the second century.

IGNISPICIUM, a species of divination practised by the ancient Romans, consisting of observations made on the flames ascending from the sacrificial altar. See DIVINATION.

IKONOBORTSI, a small sect of dissenters from the Russo-Greek Church (which see), who are so violently opposed to images, that they will not suffer even pictures in their places of worship; and renounce all superstitious reverence for the buildings themselves, declaring their steadfast adherence to the scriptural statement, that the Almighty dwelleth not in temples made with hands. They rest their rejection of pictures and images on the second commandment.

IKO-SIU, the sect of the worshippers of AMIDAS, (which see), the most numerous and powerful ecclesiastical body in Japan. See JAPAN (RELIGION OF).

ILAH (Arab, the divine) of AKBAR, a system of philosophic Deism introduced by Akbar, the emperor of Delhi, who ascended the throne in 1556, and reigned for the long period of fifty-one years. His desire was to found a new creed on the basis of universal toleration, so as to combine in one religious body the Hindus, Mohammedans, and Christians, along with the followers of Zoroaster. His object, in establishing a new creed, was both political and religious; he was the only one of the Delhi emperors who regarded India as his country, and who sought to efface from the memory of the Hindus that they were a conquered people. He hoped that the adoption of a new and common creed would efface the distinction between the conquerors and the conquered; but the task was too mighty for even imperial resources, and his project perished with him, the Mohammedan system being revived under the auspices of Jehanghir, Akbar's son and successor.

By means of the commercial establishments of the Saracens in the Indian Ocean, a knowledge of the Mohammedan faith had, even in the ninth century, been diffused among some minor tribes on the coasts of the Indian peninsula. The creed of Islām, however, though extensively prevalent in the northern provinces, has never penetrated to the southern parts. About A. D. 1000, the Sultan Mahmūd, the first great monarch of the Ghizni dynasty, entered India, and effected a permanent establishment in the north-west, destroying the Hindu temples and idols, and erecting mosques in all the chief towns of the district. At first the usual warlike measures were adopted to compel the people to renounce the Brahmanical creed, and adopt that of Islām. Soon, however, a system of mutual toleration was adopted, which continued to be maintained after the Mongolian conquest, the effect of which was, that a mixture to some extent of the two creeds took place, the Mohammedans, on the one hand, adopting some Brahmanical practices, and many of the prejudices of caste, and the Hindus, on the other, learning to speak with respect of Mohammed and the prophets of Islām.

When Akbar mounted the throne of the Mogul emperors, in the sixteenth century, he was only fourteen years of age; but being of an active inquiring mind, he was early led to forsake Mohammedanism, and although ignorant of the pure Christian faith, he was still disposed to favour the Gospels rather than the Koran. It did not escape his observant eye that the adherents of two religions so essentially different as Brahmanism and Islamism lived, nevertheless, in harmony and peace, as they had done for nearly six hundred years before, tolerating, and even apparently respecting, one another's faith. In these circumstances, with a mind naturally inclined to liberality, or rather latitudinarianism, he bethought himself of framing a new religion, which might combine his whole subjects in one religious community. The materials thus proposed to be amalgamated were by no means of a promising kind, including, as they did, Mohammedans, Hindus, the followers of Zoroaster, and even Jews and Christians. Nevertheless, the difficulty of the task, and the discouragements which he was sure to encounter in seeking to accomplish it, did not prevent Akbar from making the attempt.

Ilahi, or the divine system, as its founder proposed to call it, was essentially eclectic in its character, its elements being drawn from different religions. In accordance with the Mohammedan views in which he had been educated, the fundamental point on which Akbar insisted was the great doctrine of the Divine Unity, which he declared was but obscurely revealed to the prophets. But while he thus adopted a Mohammedan basis for his creed, he took care at the same time to declare his entire disbelief of the divinity of the Koran. And the circumstances of the times peculiarly favoured him in doing so. It so happened that in 1575, a dispute arose among Mohammedan doctors as to the number of wives that a Moslem might legally marry. The Koran says, "two, or three, or four," but the conjunction (rau) which is translated "or," admits also of being translated "and," in which case the followers of Mohammed would be authorized in taking "two, and three, and four," or, in all, nine wives. The difficulty as to the real meaning of the passage was felt to be great, and, besides, it involved various other questions connected with marriage, which it seemed impossible satisfactorily to explain. Much both of learning and ingenuity was expended in the discussion of these disputed points, and the opinions of those versed in the Mohammedan law were so various, that the whole subject was thrown into inextricable confusion. Akbar availed himself of this opportunity to avow his scepticism, declaring that no religious system could assert a valid claim to be divine which involved such plain and palpable contradictions. From this time the emperor professed himself to be an impartial inquirer after truth, and, accordingly, he openly conversed with the teachers of every religion. The spirit by which he was actuated may be discerned in the following extract from a letter addressed in 1582 to the king of Portugal: "Your majesty knows that the learned and divines of all nations and times, in their opinions concerning the world of appearance and the intellectual, agree in this, that the former ought to be of no consideration in respect to the latter; yet the wise men of the times, and the great ones of all nations, toil much in perfecting themselves, as to this perishable and showy state, and consume the best of their lives, and the choicest of their time, in procuring apparent delights, being swallowed up and dissolved in fleeting pleasures and transitory joys. The most High God, merely through his eternal favour and perpetual grace, notwithstanding so many obstacles, and such a world of business and employment, has disposed my heart so as always to seek him; and though he has subjected the dominions of so many powerful princes to me, which to the best of my judgment I endeavour to manage and govern, so as that all my subjects are contented and happy; yet, praise be to God, his will and my duty to him is the end I propose in all my actions and desires. And as most people, being enchained by the bonds of constraint and fashion, and regarding the customs of their ancestors, relations, and acquaintances, without examining the arguments or reasons for it, give an implicit faith to that religion in which they have been brought up, and remain deprived of the excellency of the truth, the finding of which is the proper end of reason; therefore at times I converse with the learned of all religions, and profit by the discourses of each."

Akbar being earnestly desirous to arrive at some settled conviction on matters of religion, passed much of his time, and particularly the evening of Friday, the Mohammedan Sabbath, in conversing with learned men in reference to the nature and distinctive tenets of different religions. It fortunately happens that the substance, if not the exact words, of these discussions have been handed down to us in the Dabistân or School of Manners, an extraordinary work, containing much valuable information in reference to the principal religions of Central and Western Asia. An extract from the translation of that work published by the Oriental Translation Committee, probably affords as accurate a view as can be found anywhere of Ilahi of Akbar. A philosopher is introduced thus developing "the divine" creed: "Know for certain, that the accomplished apostle and perfect messenger from God is the illustrious Akbar; that is the imperial wisdom, on whom be the blessings of God! Nor can you require a stronger proof than this, his being from his own essence skilled in all knowledge, and that his precepts are such as are intelligible to the understandings of all men. And since reason proves that a wise and almighty Creator has formed this world, and has showered many blessings on the inhabitants of this temporary abode, which are deserving of praise and thanksgiving, let us, as far as the light of our understandings will enable us, meditate on the mysteries of his creation, and render praises unto him according to the extent of our knowledge of his sublime perfections. Then when we have obtained such knowledge, and have been led into the right path, should we deny his unity and become unmindful of his benefits, shall we not deservedly incur punishment? Since such is the case, why should we pay obedience to any man, who was a mortal like ourselves, and was subject to anger, and lust, and covetousness, and pain, and joy, and love or rank and power, even more than ourselves. For if this mortal should teach knowledge and thanksgiving, we have been already made acquainted with these by the assistance of our own understandings; and if he should teach what is contrary to reason, this would alone be a sufficient proof of his falsehood. For reason assures us, that the Creator of this world is wise, and a wise being would not prescribe to the created any worship which would appear to their reasons to be evil, since what appears evil cannot remain permanent. Now, all religions are founded on circumstances which must be considered as evil, such as believing in the conversations of God, the incarnation of the incorporeal essence in a human form, and his reascension into heaven in a human body; the ascension of men into heaven; the pilgrimage to particular edifices, and the ceremonies attending it; the throwing of stones, and running between two hills, and kissing the black stone. For if it be said, that it is impossible to adore God without some visible medium, and that it is therefore necessary to have some fixed point to which the mind can attach itself, it is evident that, for remembering and praising God, no medium nor particular place is at all requisite. But if they should be admitted to be necessary, the sun and the planets deserve the preference. Yet neither can be considered as exempt from a resemblance to Paganism, though the devout respect paid to particular edifices is most objectionable, as their being called the house of God may induce the ignorant to ascribe a corporeal form to God; and as also different prophets have conferred a sanctity on different places, such as the Kaaba and Jerusalem. Since therefore a resemblance to Paganism exists in all worship of stone, earth, and corporeal forms, the most proper objects on which to fix the mind are fire, water, and the planets. If then any object be necessary, let it be the sun and the planets."

From the view of his system thus given in the Dabistan, which was written by Mohsan Fani, a Persian, who arrived in Northern India while the attempts of Akbar to found a new religion were still fresh in the minds of the people, it appears that the design of this Mohammedan reformer was to revive the religion of Zoroaster in a modified form; he was a firm believer in astrology, and according to Mohsan Fani, he borrowed this portion of his creed from Jenghiz Khan, whom he claimed as his ancestor. Having acquired sufficient influence over the theologians, doctors of the law, and learned men, to secure their public recognition of him as the sole protector of the faith, Akbar propounded his creed, which was accepted by several Hindus and Mohammedans. Encouraged by his success, he now ordered the abolition of the old confession of Islam, "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet," and the substitution of the following formula in its stead, "There is no God but God, and Akbar is the vicar of God." Thus did this ambitious Mogul Emperor boldly claim the place of the great Prophet of Arabia.

Having succeeded so far in abolishing the creed of Islam, he found little difficulty in ordering the discontinuance of its outward forms and ceremonies. He abrogated the five daily prayers, the ablutions, fasts, alms, and pilgrimages enjoined upon the faithful. He abolished the religious services observed on Fridays, and dismissed the Muezzins or criers of the mosques. He ordered that that should be considered as clean which was declared by the Koran to be unclean. He permitted the sale of wine, and the practice of games of chance. He forbade the marriage of more than one wife, and enjoined the postponement of the circumcision of boys until twelve years of age, when even then the ceremony was to be entirely optional. The more effectually to abolish the memory of the ancient religion, he ordered the era of his own accession to the throne to be used instead of the Hegira. In these innovations, Akbar was at first supported by the Shiites, who thought thereby to gain a triumph over the Sonites, but on perceiving the tendency of the new creed wholly to destroy Islamism, they withdrew the partial encouragement they had given, and contended earnestly for the old Mussulman faith. To gain over the Hindus to his system Akbar proceeded with the utmost caution, knowing well the obstinacy with which they adhered to ancient institutions. He issued no edict against idolatry, but contented himself with ordering trials by ordeal to be discontinued, and also the burning of widows on the funeral pile of their husbands. The abolition of Suttee, however, was violently opposed by the Hindu community, so that in a short time he was compelled to revoke his edict on that point.

Akbar had directed much of his attention to the establishment of the doctrines of his new system of religion, but he began soon to perceive that a ritual was necessary as well as a creed, and after much careful consideration, he decided upon adopting the forms and ceremonies of the religion of Zoroaster; insisting much upon due reverence being paid to the sun and planets as the most glorious symbols of Deity. Among the innovations which the Emperor introduced there was one which, simple though at first sight it may appear, and even unimportant, proved the death-blow of Ilahi. This was the edict which he issued,—forbidding his subjects to wear beards. On this point the reforming monarch met with determined resistance; for several years he contended with his subjects on this trifling matter; the progress of his religion was now arrested, and when the son of Akbar succeeded to the throne in 1605, Ilahi disappeared, and Islamism regained its wonted ascendancy. But though the Deistic system of Akbar never obtained root in Hindustan, but perished with its founder, it has not been altogether barren and unproductive of results, for to this source is to be traced in a great measure the success which afterwards attended the labours of Nanak, the Sikh reformer, as well as the rise and subsequent growth of the principles of the Persian Sufis, and of the Vedanti school of Hindu philosophy.

ILICET (Lat. ire licet, you may go), a solemn word pronounced at the conclusion of the funeral rites among the ancient Romans. It was uttered by the præfex or some other person at the close of the ceremony, after the bones and ashes of the deceased had been committed to the urn, and the persons present had been thrice sprinkled with pure water from a branch of olive or laurel for the purpose of purification. From the occasion on which the word Ilcet was employed, it is sometimes used proverbially among Roman authors to signify, "all is over." See FUNERAL RITES.

ILLUMINATED, a title given sometimes in the early Christian church to those who had been baptized. Some commentators suppose that the Apostle Paul refers to this use of the word in Heb. x. 32, "But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions." Justin Martyr says, that this name was given because of the knowledge which the baptized were understood to possess; all the mysteries being revealed to them which were concealed from the catechumens. Others allege that the name arose from a lighted taper being put in the hands of the baptized.

ILLUMINATI, a Christian sect which appeared in Spain in 1575, under the Spanish name Alumbra-dos or enlightened. They are charged with maintaining a kind of perfection in religion; and many of them were banished or executed by the Inquisition at Cordova. Though thus apparently suppressed for a time, the sect appeared in 1623 in the diocese of Seville. The Bishop Don Andreas Pacheco, Inquisitor-General of Spain, having apprehended seven of the ringleaders, caused them to be burnt, and gave their followers the alternative either of abjuring their errors or quitting the kingdom. The doctrines imputed to them were,—that by means of mental prayer and union with God they had reached such a state of perfection as to stand in no need of good works or the sacraments of the church, and that whatever they might do, they could not possibly commit sin.

After the suppression of the Illuminati in Spain, another sect of the same description, and bearing the same name, appeared in France. It sprung up in the reign of Louis XIII., by whose orders its members were so incessantly harassed and persecuted that the sect totally disappeared in 1635. Among other extravagant notions they are said to have held that one Anthony Buquet, a friar, had received from heaven a revelation of a certain system of faith and practice, so complete that by means of it any one might arrive at a state of perfection equal to that of the Saints and the Virgin Mary; and that by going forward in the same course their actions would become divine, and their minds wholly under the constraining influence of the Almighty.

ILLUMINATEN, a secret society in Germany professing philosophical Atheism, which was founded in 1777 by Dr. Adam Weishaupt, professor of canon law in the university of Ingolstadt. The ostensible object of the association was of a strictly philanthropic character, embracing "the plan of diffusing light, union, charity, and tolerance; of abolishing the slavery of the peasantry, the feudal rights and all those privileges which, in elevating one portion of the community, degraded the other; of disseminating instruction among the people, of causing merit to triumph, of establishing individual and political liberty; and gradually and without a shock, of meliorating the social order." But while these were the open and avowed objects which the Illuminaten had in view, they had also a secret or esoteric doctrine, and their whole proceedings were conducted on a plan of mysterious signs. Each individual, on joining the society, assumed a new name, drawn generally from Grecian or Roman history, Weishaupt, the founder, taking to himself the name of Spartacus. The names of places also were changed, ancient names being given to them; thus Munich was called Athens, and Vienna Rome. They adopted the Persian calendar and gave new names to the months, commencing their era in A.D. 630. They had a secret alphabet of cyphers, in which the numbers were reversed. They had also a mock priesthood, and went through various ceremonies designed obviously to ridicule Christianity. The real intention of the association indeed was to abolish Christianity and establish a propaganda for the diffusion of Illuminism (which see). After a few years Weishaupt's plan was combined by Knigge with Free-Masonry, and in this form the institution received a large accession to its numbers. "In the many grades which it contained," says Dr. Kahnis, "it afforded scope to the various stand-points; by a true Jesuitical system of observance and guidance it secured the single individuals, and put into the hands of the heads, reins which could be easily employed for the management of the whole." Perthes, quoted by Kahnis, gives the following detailed account of the construction of the order: "At the head of it stood, as Primus or National, the founder. Under him, the order was organically divided into a number of inspections, which is differently stated; the inspection was divided into provinces; and in the provinces were the Illuminati meetings of the individual towns. At the head of each division was a director, assisted by a chapter. In order to secure the existence of the order, and the employment for one object of all the powers of the order, manifold trials and solemnities preceded the reception. The action of the consecration—so it was called—takes place either by day in a solitary, retired, and somewhat dark place, e. g., in a forest; or by night, in a silent, retired room, at a time when the moon stands on the sky. He who was to be received, confirmed by an oath the declaration that with all the rank, honours, and titles which he might claim in civil society, he, at bottom, was nothing else than a man. He vowed eternal silence, inviolable fidelity, and obedience to all the superiors and ordinances of the order; he solemnly renounced his private opinions, and every free use of his power and faculties. In order afterwards, also, to keep every member of the order in the most complete dependence upon the order, every superior, not only kept the most minute records of the conduct of all his inferiors, but every inferior also was obliged, by filling up certain prescribed schedules, to give information about the state of the soul, the correspondence, the literary employment, not only of himself, but also of his relatives, friends, and patrons. Of those to be received, they preferred 'persons of from eighteen to thirty years of age, who were wealthy, eager to acquire knowledge, manageable, steady, and persevering.'

The Abbé Barruel in France and Professor Robison in Scotland sounded a loud note of warning against this secret society, as being a conspiracy against all the religions and governments of Europe. Great was the alarm excited in many minds by the startling revelations of these two authors, derived as they were from the most undoubted evidence, and collected from the most authentic sources. But however formidable were the designs of the "Illuminaten," the society was of short duration, for, in 1785, it came to an end, partly through the machinations of the ex-Jesuits in Bavaria, and partly in consequence of the accession of Frederick William II. to the throne of Prussia.

ILLUMINISM, the name given to that system of Deism and Infidelity which prevailed so extensively in Germany during the latter half of the eighteenth century. It rejected all that is positive in religion, and professed a philosophic Deism, which confines its belief to natural religion, or the religion of common sense. Whatever in Christianity, or any other positive religion, cannot be reduced to natural religion, was, in the view of Illuminism, either frivolous or false. This system of infidelity was simply a combination of French and English Deism; the latter represented by Herbert, Hobbes, Toland, Tindal, Chubb, Shaftesbury, Bolingbroke, and others; the former by Rousseau, Voltaire, Diderot, and Helvetius. The head quarters of Illuminism was Prussia, under Frederick II., a monarch who contributed much to the spread of deistic tendencies, especially among the higher classes. One of the ablest and most powerful agents, however, in diffusing the principles of Illuminism, was Nicolai, the Editor of the 'Allgemeine Deutsch Bibliothek,' or the Universal German Library. His periodical was commenced in 1765, and during the first period of its existence, it enjoyed unlimited authority in the literary world, of which it most effectually took advantage to sap the foundations of the faith of the country, promulgating Deism and Infidelity in a covert and insidious manner. While the most pernicious principles were thus being instilled into the minds of the literati, Basedow and Campe were busily spreading them in families and schools by means of their imposing and plausible Philanthropinism. (See HUMANISTS.) The German people had before this time lost their relish for systematic theology; religion was reduced to a mere code of morals, bearing only upon the present comfort and well-being of man. The works of Wieland, besides, had no small influence in scattering among the people deistic, and even immoral, principles. And to crown the whole, the association of the ILLUMINATEN (which see), formed by Weishaupt in 1777, and joined by great multitudes from all classes of society, including the most eminent men of the time, gave to Illuminism an importance and an influence which it would never otherwise have enjoyed.

When Frederick William II. succeeded to the throne of Prussia, he had sagacity enough to perceive that if Illuminism should gain the ascendancy in the country, both church and state would be ruined. He, therefore, issued an edict on the 9th July 1788, commonly called Wollner's Religious Edict, the preamble of which ran as follows: "With grief it has been remarked that so many clergymen have the boldness to disseminate the doctrines of the Socinians, Deists, and Naturalists under the name of Illuminism. As sovereign and sole lawgiver in our state, we command and enjoin, under the penalty of immediate deposition and still severer punishment and visitation, according to circumstances, that henceforth no clergyman, preacher, or teacher of the Protestant religion, shall make himself guilty of the indicated and other errors, by venturing to spread such errors, in the discharge of his duty, or in any other way, publicly or secretly." The king was too late, however, in issuing his edict; the poison had already diffused itself throughout all classes too extensively to be arrested forcibly by a royal edict. Illuminism had become, to a great extent, the religion of Germany, just as Deism had become the avowed religion of France. And the wide-spread influence of such principles soon produced its natural results. The French Revolution broke forth with a frenzied violence which burst all barriers, and covered the country with anarchy and bloodshed.

At the time when Wollner's religious edict was issued, Bahrdt conceived a plan whereby to propagate Illuminism secretly, and thus defeat the object of the king. In conjunction, accordingly, with a Leipzig bookseller, named Dagenhard Pott, he formed a society called the German Union, the aim of which was declared to be "to carry out the great object of the sublime Founder of Christianity, viz. the enlightenment of mankind, and the dethroning of superstition and fanaticism." Though numbers were ensnared by the plausible representations of Bahrdt, the dangerous tendencies of the German Union soon began to be suspected, and the Prussian authorities, having apprehended the author of the scheme, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in a fortress, which was mitigated by the king to one year's imprisonment.

The publication of the Wolfenbüttel Fragments, from 1774 to 1778, edited by Lessing, gave great impulse to the progress of Illuminism. The principle uniformly insisted on by all who held this species of Deism was, that clearness was the test and standard of truth. It was not likely that, in a speculative age and country, this could form a resting-place. Men pushed their inquiries farther, and having thrown aside all belief in a positive written revelation, they rushed onward in the path of error, until from Illuminists many of the most able theologians of Germany became RATIONALISTS (which see).

IMAGES, representations or similitudes in sculpture or painting of persons or things used as objects of religious homage or adoration. A distinction is drawn by ecclesiastical writers between idols and images; the former being the representations of fictitious objects, the latter of real and actually existing objects. But most commonly the words are used indifferently to signify one and the same thing.

Among the early Christians religious images were first introduced for private ornament rather than in their churches. The Pagans, with whom they mingled in the ordinary intercourse of every day life, were accustomed to have images of their gods in their houses and shops, and even to wear them about their persons. The sight of such objects, therefore, became familiar to the Christians, and they naturally thought of supplanting these tokens of a false and idolatrous worship, by emblems more in accordance with their own pure religion. The dove as a representation of the Holy Spirit, the fish as a sign of the ICHTHUS (which see), or anagram of Christ's name, a ship as a symbol of the church, or an anchor as a symbol of hope, were sometimes engraven on their rings, or otherwise used as personal or domestic ornaments. It was not, however, till the end of the third century that images of this kind were found in Christian churches. In the year 303 the council of Elvira passed a decree forbidding "the objects of worship and adoration to be painted on the walls." Before this time probably visible figures of the cross came to be used both in houses and churches, this being regarded as the most significant emblem of that faith in Christ crucified which they gloried in as their peculiar distinctive doctrine. But even in the fourth century we have a striking evidence of the hostility manifested to the use of images in churches, by a remarkable letter from Epiphanius to John of Jerusalem, in which he says, "Having entered into a church in a village of Palestine, named Anablatha, I found there a veil, which was suspended at the door, and painted with a representation, whether of Jesus Christ, or of some saint, for I do not recollect whose image it was, but seeing that, in opposition to the authority of Scripture, there was a human image in the church of Jesus Christ, I tore it in pieces, and gave orders to those who had care of that church, to bury the corpse with the veil." From this letter, it is plain, that in the end of the fourth century, when it was written, the use of images in churches, even for ornament alone, was regarded as unscriptural, and therefore unlawful.

Some of the Christian Fathers, for example Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen, carried their opposition to all sorts of images to such an extent, as to teach that Scripture forbids the practice of both statuary and painting. "It is an injury to God," says Justin Martyr, "to make an image of him in base wood or stone." Augustine says, that "God ought to be worshipped without an image; images serving only to bring the Deity into contempt." The same Father says, that "it would be impious in a Christian to set up a corporeal image of God in a church; and that he would be thereby guilty of the sacrilege condemned by St. Paul, of turning the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man." "The primitive Christians," says Mr. Gibbon in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, "were possessed with an unconquerable repugnance to the use and abuse of images, and this aversion may be ascribed to their descent from the Jews, and their enmity to the Greeks.

The Mosaic law had severely proscribed all representations of the Deity, and that precept was firmly established in the principles and practice of the chosen people. The wit of the Christian apologists was pointed against the foolish idolaters, who had bowed before the workmanship of their own hands:—the images of brass and marble, which, had they been endowed with sense and motion, should have started rather from the pedestal to adore the creative powers of the artist. The public religion of the Christians was uniformly simple and spiritual; and the first notice of the use of pictures is in the censure of the council of Hiberis, three hundred years after the Christian era. Under the successors of Constantine, in the peace and luxury of the triumphant church, the more prudent bishops condescended to indulge a visible superstition, for the benefit of the multitude, and, after the ruin of Paganism, they were no longer restrained by the apprehension of an odious parallel. The first introduction of a symbolic worship was in the veneration of the cross, and of relics. The saints and martyrs, whose intercession was implored, were seated on the right hand of God; but the gracious, and often supernatural favours, which, in the popular belief, were showered round their tombs, conveyed an unquestionable sanction of the devout pilgrims, who visited, and touched, and kissed these lifeless remains, the memorials of their merits and sufferings. But a memorial, more interesting than the skull or the sandals of a departed worthy, is a faithful copy of his person and features, delineated by the arts of painting or sculpture. At first the experiment was made with caution and scruple, and the venerable pictures were discreetly allowed to instruct the ignorant, to awaken the cold, and to gratify the prejudices of the heathen proselytes. By a slow, though inevitable progression, the honours of the original were transferred to the copy, the devout Christian prayed before the image of a saint, and the pagan rites of genuflection, luminaries, and incense, again stole into the Catholic church."

The intense love of art which prevailed among the Pagan Romans, and which led them to construct the statues and images of their gods with æsthetic refinement and skill, took an entirely different direction on the introduction of Christianity as the established religion of the Empire. Art no longer exhausted its resources on a false, but sought to embellish and adorn the true religion. In place of the remains of old pagan art, Constantine substituted on the monuments with which he embellished the imperial city, figures and scenes taken from the Old and New Testaments. Abraham offering up Isaac, Daniel in the lions' den, the good Shepherd, and similar scenes, were at this time favourite subjects of Christian art. Constantia, the sister of Constantine the Great, applied to Eusebius, bishop of Casarea, for an image of Christ. Images of martyrs, monks, and bishops, were often engraven on the seals of Christians, and painted on their cups and goblets, and the walls of their apartments. Their very garments were in many cases embroidered with Scripture scenes, which they considered as an evidence of remarkable piety in the wearer. No better instance could be selected from the writers of the fourth century, of determined opposition to images, than is afforded by the letter of Eusebius, in a reply to the application of Constantia for an image of Christ. "What do you understand, may I ask, by an image of Christ?" says he. "You can surely mean nothing else but a representation of the earthly form of a servant, which, for man's sake, he for a short time assumed. Even when, in this, his divine majesty beamed forth at the transfiguration, his disciples were unable to bear the sight of such glory; but now the figure of Christ is become wholly deified and spiritualized,—transfigured into a form analogous to his divine nature. Who, then, has power to draw the image of such a glory, exalted above every earthly form? Who, to represent in lifeless colours the splendour which radiates from such transcendent majesty? Or could you be satisfied with such an image as the Pagans made of their gods and heroes, which bore no resemblance to the thing represented? But if you are not seeking for an image of the transfigured godlike form; but for one of the earthly, mortal body, so as it was constituted before this change, you must have forgotten those passages in the Old Testament, which forbid us to make any image of that which is in heaven above or on the earth beneath. Where have you ever seen any such in the church, or heard of their being there from others? Have not such things (images, therefore, of religious objects) been banished far from the churches over the world?" And in the close of the letter he beautifully remarks: "But we, who confess that our Lord is God, we must let the whole longing of our hearts be directed to the intuition of him in his divine character; we must therefore cleanse our hearts with all earnestness, since none but the pure in heart can see God. Still, should any one be anxious to see an image of the Saviour, instead of beholding him face to face, what better could he have, than that which he himself has drawn in the sacred writings?"

Asterius, in the same century, objected as strongly as Eusebius to all images designed to represent Christ, but at the same time he expressed his approval of the pictures of suffering martyrs. In the sermons of Chrysostom, not the slightest allusion is made to images in the churches. In the fourth century, however, the custom seems to have gradually crept in, of adorning the churches with images, but it did not become general till towards the close of the century. Those churches, more especially, which were built in memory of particular martyrs, were frequently adorned with pictures representing their sufferings, and with striking scenes drawn from the Bible. To this practice, both at its first introduction, and for some time after it, many pious Christians objected in the strongest manner; but in spite of all remonstrances, the use of images in churches became more and more common, and thus an inlet was afforded to that flood of idolatry which in the course of a few centuries swept away every vestige of true spiritual Christian worship. See next article.

IMAGE WORSHIP. On the first introduction of images and pictures into Christian churches, which took place in the course of the fourth century, the only design of such a manifest deviation from the simplicity of primitive Christianity appears to have been in order to decorate and thus do honour to buildings erected specially for divine worship. Churches were sometimes built at the sole expense of wealthy men, who sought not only to rear substantial and even elegant fabrics, but to embellish them with the rich and attractive adornments of images and pictures. And besides, it was alleged, that these artistic ornaments served a most important purpose, inasmuch as they both entertained and instructed the ignorant and uncultivated among the Christians, who had no opportunity of receiving information through the medium of books. Pictures of saints and martyrs, and even of the Redeemer himself, under the emblem of a kind and careful shepherd, naturally attracted the unlettered masses, who learned to gaze upon them with delight and admiration as works of art, and with veneration for the sacred persons and objects thus presented vividly before the eye. The slightest knowledge of human nature will moderate our surprise, that the reverence paid to saints should be transferred to their pictures. As early, accordingly, as the end of the fourth century, we find Augustin complaining that many worshippers of images were to be found among the rude Christian multitude; and so far had this practice gone, that the Montanists charged it upon the whole church.

In the Eastern church, as might have been expected from the warm imaginations of the Orientals, and their love of pictorial representations, image-worship spread with great rapidity, and was even defended by the clergy with much acuteness and plausibility. In the course of the sixth century, it had already become a universal custom in the Greek church for persons to prostrate themselves before images as a token of reverence to those represented by them. This formed a plausible ground of accusation on the part of the Jews against the Christians as being guilty of idolatry, and a palpable breach of the Divine commandments. It was argued in defence of the Christians, that the images were not their gods, but simply representations of Christ and his saints, which are venerated for their sakes, and in honour of them, but not adored with Divine homage. There were not wanting many, however, who endeavoured at the outset to resist, even in the East, the introduction of the dangerous innovation of prostration before images; some of the clergy, indeed, to prevent the evil, causing the images to be removed from the churches.

Not in the East alone, but in the West also, images were in general use in the churches in the sixth century, not however for purposes of worship, but as helps to the memory, and books to instruct the ignorant. With this view, Gregory the Great, in the beginning of the seventh century, allowed the barbarian Franks, on their conversion to Christianity, to continue the use of images in their churches, that they might not be suddenly and without due preparation withdrawn from their idolatrous practices. The Western churches took advantage of this incautious proceeding on the part of the Pope, and before the commencement of the eighth century image-worship had become general throughout the whole of Christendom. In A. D. 713, the Pope Constantine issued an edict pronouncing an anathema upon all who "deny that veneration to the holy images which is appointed by the church." Both in the Latin and the Greek churches, the practice of thus adoring images was now fully established; but more especially among the members of the Greek church it had come to be mixed up, not only with their public worship, but with their social and domestic customs. "Not only," says Neander, "were the churches and church-books ornamented with images of Christ, of Mary, and the saints, but the same images were employed to decorate the palaces of the emperor, the walls of private houses, furniture, and even clothes. The artists, many of whom were monks, emulated each other in framing these images, sometimes of the most costly materials, and at other times of wax. The reverence for images was closely connected with the excessive veneration entertained for Mary and the saints. That which relics were in the Western church, images were in the Eastern. On various occasions of necessity, people threw themselves prostrate before the figures of saints, and many images were celebrated for effecting miraculous cures. It being believed that the saints were themselves present in their images, these latter were often employed as witnesses to baptisms, and children were called after their names. In that uninquiring age, many popular sayings were allowed, without further proof, to be taken as sufficient evidence of the honour due to images. There were some to which epithets were applied signifying that they were not made with hands, and which were regarded as especially deserving of respect, and most valuable as amulets. Of these, some derived their supposed worth from the belief that they had been miraculously made by Christ himself; others were treasured because their origin was utterly unknown."

The evil had now come to a height. Jews, Mohammedans, and heretics of every kind, were loud in their reproaches against the Christian church, as violating the Divine law, by bowing down before graven images. The extensive prevalence of this idolatry attracted the notice, and impressed the mind of the Greek Emperor Leo, the Isaurian. He resolved, therefore, to check if possible this growing superstition, and to restore the primitive simplicity of Christian worship. In A. D. 726, accordingly, he issued an edict forbidding any worship to be paid to images, but without ordering them to be demolished or removed from the churches. This edict was no sooner issued than a commotion arose of the most serious and alarming description. Leo was denounced by his subjects as a tyrant and a persecutor. Germanus, bishop of Constantinople, declared his determination to oppose the emperor, and without delay he made application for aid to Gregory II., the then reigning Pope. From this time commenced a controversy between the Greek emperors and the Popes of Rome on the subject of image-worship, which lasted for more than half a century. The proceedings of Leo, in the commencement of the struggle, were marked by the utmost prudence and moderation. He set out with summoning a council of senators and bishops, and with their approval issued an order that all the images in the churches should be removed to such a height on the walls, that though they might be seen, the people could not fall prostrate before them. This attempted compromise of the matter was productive of no good, but only excited greater hostility against the emperor; and even his friends urged him to adopt the decided conduct of Hezekiah, who broke in pieces the brazen serpent which had become an object of idolatrous worship to the Jews.

The emperor, wishing to act with mildness and moderation, endeavoured to win over Germanus, the bishop of Constantinople, to his views; but finding all his attempts ineffectual, he deposed him from his see, putting in his place Anastasius, who was opposed to the worship of images. In A. D. 730, an imperial edict was issued, authorizing and enjoining the destruction of images, or their removal from the churches. On news of this edict reaching Rome, the statues of the emperor were pulled down and trodden under foot. All Italy was in a state of ferment, and the Pope issued an injunction to his people not to pay tribute any longer to Leo. In the midst of this excitement and turmoil, the life of Gregory came to a close A. D. 731, and he was succeeded in his office by Gregory III., who was an ecclesiastic of a kindred spirit, and of similar sentiments. On his elevation to the chair of St. Peter, the new Pope addressed an insolent letter to the emperor, calling upon him to cease to persecute images. All hope of conciliation was now entirely excluded. Gregory, in a council held in A. D. 732, formally excommunicated all who should remove or speak contemptuously of images. And to show his utter disregard of the imperial edict, he expended immense sums on pictures and statues to adorn the churches at Rome. Keen was the hostility, and bitter the contention between Gregory and Leo; but their dissensions were arrested by the death of both, which happened about the same time, in A. D. 741. The Emperor Leo was succeeded by his son Constantine V., surnamed Copronymus, and Pope Gregory, by Zachary, a native of Greece.

The new emperor followed in the steps of his father, using all the means at his command for the extirpation of image-worship. His exertions, however, to rid the land of idolatry were for a time interrupted by the usurpation of his brother-in-law, Artabasdu, who, taking advantage of the absence of Constantine on an expedition against the Saracens, stirred up the people to insurrection, and took possession of the throne, restoring the worship of images, and forbidding any one to question its lawfulness upon pain of exile or of death. The usurpation of Artabasdu, however, was of short duration. In a few months Constantine recovered his throne, and renewed his former edicts against image-worship, at the same time promising to the people that as soon as possible he would refer the whole matter to a general council. In fulfilment of this promise, the emperor, in A. D. 754, during the pontificate of Stephen II., summoned a council at Constantinople. This council, the largest that had ever yet been known in the history of the church, consisted of 388 bishops. It met on the 10th of February, and continued in session till the 17th of August, when with one voice the assembly condemned the use and the worship of images, declaring "that to worship them or any other creature is robbing God of the honour that is due to him alone, and relapsing into idolatry." This council is reckoned by the Greek church the seventh general council, but its title to this name is disputed by the Romish church on account of its prohibition of image-worship. The Emperor finding his views supported by so numerous a council, proceeded to burn the images, and to demolish the walls of churches on which were painted figures of Christ, of the Virgin and Saints.

On the death of Constantine, in A.D. 775, the throne of the Greek empire passed to his son, Leo IV., who, like his father and grandfather, was a determined iconoclast; while his wife, Irene, was an equally determined favourer of image-worship. The reign of Leo was brief and his end sudden, caused, as some writers believe, and Mosheim plainly asserts, by poison administered by his wife in revenge for his opposition to her proposal to introduce the worship of images into the palace. The natural successor to the throne was Constantine VI., the son of the deceased Emperor; but to obtain the government for herself, Irene, with a barbarity and cruelty almost unparalleled, caused the young man to be seized and his eyes to be put out. "In the mind of Irene," says Gibbon, "ambition had stifled every sentiment of humanity and nature, and it was decreed in her bloody council, that Constantine should be rendered incapable of the throne, her emissaries assaulted the sleeping prince, and stabbed their daggers with such violence and precipitation into his eyes, as if they meant to execute a mortal sentence. The most bigoted orthodoxy has justly execrated the unnatural mother, who may not easily be paralleled in the history of crimes. On earth, the crime of Irene was left five years unpunished, and if she could silence the voice of conscience, she neither heard nor regarded the reproaches of mankind."

Irene had now established herself on the throne by the murder, if not of her husband, at all events of her son, and her great anxiety now was to undo all that for several reigns past had been done in the matter of image-worship. In conjunction with Pope Adrian she summoned a council to be held at Nice in support of the worship of images. This famous council, which Romanists call the seventh general council, while the Greek church disowns it, met at Nice A.D. 787. The number of bishops who attended on this occasion was 350, and the result of their deliberations was, as might have been expected from the combined influence of Irene and the Pope, favourable to the complete establishment of image-worship. The decree of the council was to the following effect: "That holy images of the cross should be consecrated, and put on the sacred vessels and vestments, and upon walls and boards, in private houses and in public ways. And especially that there should be erected images of the Lord God, our Saviour Jesus Christ, of our blessed Lady, the mother of God, of the venerable angels, and of all the saints. And that whosoever should presume to think or teach otherwise, or to throw away any painted books, or the figure of the cross, or any image or picture, or any genuine relics of the martyrs, they should, if bishops or clergymen, be deposed, or if monks or laymen, be excommunicated. They then pronounced anathemas upon all who should not receive images, or who should apply what the Scriptures say against idols to the holy images, or call them idols, or wilfully communicate with those who rejected and despised them, adding, according to custom, 'Long live Constantine, and Irene, his mother—damnation to all heretics—damnation on the council that roared against venerable images—the holy Trinity hath deposed them.'" Thus was image-worship at length established by law and sanctioned by the second council of Nice, which reversed the decree of the council of Constantinople, pronouncing it to be an illegitimate council. This decree, however, decided and explicit though it was, did not long remain undisputed either in the west or in the east. In A.D. 794 Charlemagne assembled a council at Frankfort, consisting of 300 bishops, who reversed the decision of the second Nicene Council, and unanimously condemned the worship of images. And in A.D. 814 the Greek Emperor, Leo, imitating Charlemagne, summoned another council at Constantinople, which declared the reversal of the decree of the second council of Nice and the abolition of image-worship in the Eastern churches. Still another council, however, was called at Constantinople, in A.D. 842, by the Empress Theodora, who held the reins of government during the minority of her son:

and this assembly, in conformity with the imperial wishes, restored the decrees of the second Nicene council, and re-established image-worship in the East. To confirm this decision an additional synod was held at Constantinople, in A.D. 879, which ratified and renewed the decrees of the second Nicene council. So much delighted were the Greeks with the decision of this synod that a festival was instituted in commemoration of it, which received the appropriate name of the feast of Orthodoxy.

In the West also, the decision of the council of Frankfort, in opposition to image-worship, though confirmed by a synod assembled at Paris A.D. 824, by Louis the Meek, has been entirely thrown aside by the church of Rome and her firm adherence given to the decrees of the second council of Nice. Thus the council of Trent, by whose decisions she acknowledges herself to be implicitly bound, decreed in its twenty-fifth session: "Images are not only to be placed in temples but also to be worshipped; as if the persons represented thereby were present." The creed of Pope Pius IV. which, among Romanists, is equally authoritative with the decrees of the Holy Synod of Trent, declares in its ninth article: "I most firmly assert that the images of Christ and of the Mother of God, ever Virgin, and also of other Saints, are to be had and retained; and that due honour and veneration are to be given to them." Romish divines are by no means agreed as to the nature of the worship which ought to be rendered to images. Some think, and the idea is borne out by the Tridentine decree, that they ought to be worshipped with the same degree of worship which the parties whom they represent would have received had they been present; others would yield to all of them the Latria or the highest degree of worship; while others would assign them only the Dulia or lowest degree of worship, that namely which is paid to saints and angels.

In the Greek church not images but pictures of saints are used in the churches, and the worship paid to them is alleged to be merely a secondary or relative, not a primary and absolute worship. The following definition on this subject given by the second Nicene or seventh general council, to whose decisions they profess to adhere, shows what was the nature of the worship which that important synod considered to be warrantably due to the images of the saints. "We define, with all accuracy and distinctness, that the venerable and holy images, fitly prepared with colours and inlaying, or any other matter, according to the fashion and form of the venerable and life-giving Cross, are to be dedicated and placed and kept in the sacred temples of God; on sacred vessels and garments also, on walls and tables, in private houses and in public ways: but, chiefly, the image of the Lord and God our Saviour Jesus Christ; next, that of our unspotted Lady, the Mother of God, those of the venerable angels, and all holy and pure men. For, as often as these painted images are looked at, they who contemplate them are excited to the memory and recollection and love of the prototypes, and may offer to them salutation and an honorary adoration: not that which, according to our faith, is true worship, latria, and which pertains to the Divine Nature alone; but in like manner as we reverently approach the type of the venerable and life-giving cross, and the Holy Gospels, and the other sacred things, with oblations of censers and lighted tapers, according as this custom was piously established by the ancients. For the honour done to the image redounds to the prototype; and he who does obeisance to the image, does obeisance through it likewise to the subject represented."

Although only pictures are allowed to be used in Greek churches, this rule is sometimes transgressed, and in Russia particularly, carved images are sometimes found. The same degrees of worship which are recognized in the Romish church, are also maintained among the Greeks. Thus they consider that the Virgin Mary ought to be worshipped with hyperdulia; saints and angels by direct dulia, referring both to their relation to God and their own sanctity; and the pictures and relics of the saints, and holy places, and articles such as crosses and sacramental vases, by indirect dulia; while latria is to be exclusively reserved for the Divine Being. The writer, whose sentiments on the subject of image-worship are most in accordance with those of the Greek church, is John of Damascus, one of the most acute and able champions of what they term orthodoxy on this point. "The Lord called his disciples happy," says this acute controversialist, "because their eyes had seen and their ears heard such things. The apostles saw with bodily eyes Christ, his sufferings, his miracles; and they heard his words. We also long to see and hear such things, and so to be accounted happy. But as he is not now bodily present, and we hear his word by books, and venerate those books, so we also, by means of images, behold the representation of his bodily form, of his miracles and sufferings; and we are thereby sanctified, and filled with confidence and delight. But while we behold the bodily form, we reflect as much as possible on the glory of his Godhead. Since, moreover, our nature is twofold,—not spirit merely, but body and spirit,—we cannot attain to the spiritual without sensible aids; and thus as we now hear with the ears, and by means of sensible words learn to think of what is spiritual, so by sensible representations we attain to the view of what is spiritual. Thus, too, Christ assumed a body and a soul, because man consists of both; and baptism, and the Lord's Supper, and prayer, song, lights, incense, all, in short, are twofold, and are, at the same time, corporeal and spiritual."

IMA'M. or IMA'UM, a minister among the Mohammedans, who conducts the services of a mosque or place of worship. They correspond to our parish ministers, and are generally chosen from the Muezzins or criers, who call the people to prayers. The only qualifications required for an Imám are a good moral character and ability to read the Koran. The Moslems of the vacant mosque recommend to the Vizier the person whom they consider as best fitted to undertake the office of Imám; on which the Vizier orders him to read some verses of the Koran, and he is forthwith admitted to the position of a Mohammedan priest without any farther ceremony. The Imáms do not pretend to any indelible sacredness of character, and may become laymen, and lay aside their priestly character without any formality. They say the prayers aloud at the appointed time. Every Friday they read some verses of the Koran in the mosque. They sometimes preach, but on great festivals this duty is performed by the Hadjis, who are at once doctors, preachers, and lawyers. The people when in the mosque are bound to repeat all that the Imám says, as well as to imitate all his movements. To pass by the Imám during his prostrations renders their prayers ineffectual.

IMÁ'M, a name applied by way of excellence to each of the chiefs or founders of the four principal sects of the Mohammedan religion.

IMÁ'MATE, the office of an IMÁ'M (which see), or Mohammedan priest.

IMÁ'MS (THE TWELVE), the twelve chiefs of the faith of Islám, according to the Persian Mohammedans, who belong to the Shiíte sects. They reckon ALI (which see) the first Imám, and the immediate successor in spiritual dignity, of the Prophet, and in this view they take no account of the usurpations of Abubeker, Omar, and Othman. So high is the estimation, indeed, in which Ali is held by the Shiítes, that a number of them consider him as superior to the Prophet himself, alleging that he was chosen by God to propagate Islámism, but that the angel Gabriel by mistake delivered the letter to Mohammed. Others again pretend that Mohammed was commanded to deliver his revelations in the name of Ali, but that from motives of pride and ambition he falsely proclaimed himself to be the chosen apostle of God. HASSAN (which see), the eldest son of Ali, was the second Imám, a pious but feeble-minded prince, who was persuaded to surrender his caliphate or civil dignity into the hands of his rival Moáwiyah, but of course retained his Imámate, which was considered inalienable. At his death, which happened from poison, administered by his wife Jaadah, he was succeeded in his spiritual office by his brother HOSSEIN (which see), who is accordingly reckoned the third Imám, and held in such estimation by the Shiítes, that the anniversary of his martyrdom in the month Mohurram is celebrated with great pomp and ceremony both in Persia and India. The fourth Imám was Ali, the son of Hossein, who, from his constancy in prayer, has been named "the Imám of the Carpet," because Mussulmans, when they pray, usually kneel on a square piece of carpet. He is also termed "the glory of pious men," and his body having become deformed through his frequent devotional prostrations, he has sometimes received the name of "the possessor of callosities." At his death, which happened A. D. 712, he was succeeded by his son Mohammed, the fifth Imám, who is called by the Shiítes the "possessor of the secret," because he spent much of his time in the study of magic. He is also termed "the director," because in an age which peculiarly abounded in heresy, he directed the Mohammedans in the right way. During the period that Mohammed held the Imámate, the Buddhistic notion was introduced among the Persian Mohammedans, that the soul of one Imám passed into that of his successor. This idea gave additional strength of course to the house of Ali, and in jealousy the Caliph Hesham caused Mohammed to be poisoned. Some of the Shiítes however believe that he is not yet dead, but that he wanders secretly over the earth.

The sixth Imám was Jaafar, the son of Mohammed, who was believed to be secretly if at all inferior in learning to Solomon. It is alleged that he wrote a supplement to the "Book of Fate," originally composed by Ali. So highly is the memory of this Imám esteemed, that an entire sect received the name of Jaafarites, from the respect which they entertain for him. When Nadir Shah wished to combine into one religion the Mohammedanism of Turkey and that of Persia, and to render the Shiíte system a fifth orthodox sect, he proposed that the Imám Jaafar should be regarded as the head of the national faith. His efforts, however, to combine the rival systems of the Sunnites and the Shiítes were utterly ineffectual. To this day they continue in determined hostility to each other.

Jaafar nominated his son Ismail his successor, but the heir-apparent having prematurely died, he named his second son Moussa his heir. Ismail, however, had left children, and as a number of the Shiítes regarded the office of Imám as hereditary, they denied the right of Moussa to the Imámate. Hence arose a new sect called the ISMAELIANS or ISMAILIYAH (which see), and ASSASSINS (which see), or followers of the Old Man of the Mountain, whose name was once an object of so much dread both in Europe and Asia. The Sultavean monarchs of Persia, claiming to be descended from Moussa, have strenuously advocated his claim to be the seventh Imám, and this claim is now universally admitted throughout Persia. Ali, the son of Moussa, was the eighth Imám. He is called by the Shiítes "the beloved," and his tomb, termed Mesched Ali, is a favourite object of pilgrimage. The ninth Imám was Mohammed, the son of Ali, who lived in retirement at Bagdad, where he died at an early age, leaving behind him so high a character for charity and benevolence, that he has received the name of "the Generous." His son, Ali, the tenth Imám, was but a child when his father died, and having been seized by the Caliph Motawakkel, who was a determined enemy of the Schiites, he was confined for life in the city of Asker; hence deriving the name of "the Askerite." He was poisoned by order of the Caliph A. D. 868. His son and successor, Hassan, also perished by poison, leaving the sacred office to his son, Mohammed, the twelfth and last Imám, who, at his father's death, was a child of only six months old. He was kept in close confinement by the Caliph, but at the age of about twelve years he suddenly disappeared. The Sunnites allege that he was drowned in the Tigris, but the Schiites deny the fact of his death, and assert that he is wandering over the earth, and will continue so to wander until the appointed period shall arrive when he shall claim and receive universal empire. "The belief in the eternal existence of the last Imám," says Dr. Taylor, "is common to several Schiite sects; the Nosairians stop at Ali the first Imám, the Ismaelians at the seventh, the Druses give the title to Hamza, whose descent from Ali, however, is equivocal, but the great majority acknowledge twelve Imáms. They all say, that the earth will not have a legitimate sovereign until the re-appearance of the last Imám. The Persian kings of the Saffavean dynasty, or the Sophis, as they were anciently called in England, styled themselves 'slaves of the lord of the country,' that is of the invisible Imám; they always kept two horses bridled and saddled in the royal stables at Ispahan, one for the twelfth Imám, whenever he should appear, the other for Jesus Christ, by whom they believed that he would be accompanied. Impostors have frequently appeared, who called themselves the last Imám or Imám Mahdi, that is 'the directed,' or 'the director;' the Fatimite Khaliphs of Egypt asserted that the soul of the last of the Imáms animated them in succession, and made this pretext the foundation of their authority. Some of the Oriental Christians have adopted this curious superstition; they say, that the last Imám became converted to the faith of the Gospel, and that he and the prophet Elijah are the two witnesses spoken of in the Book of Revelations."

IMBRAMUS, a surname of Hermes.

IMBRASIA, a surname of Artemis and also of Hera.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. See CONCEPTION (IMMACULATE).

IMMANUEL (Heb. God with us), a name applied to Jesus Christ both in the Old and New Testaments. It was first communicated to the prophet Isaiah, when the people of Israel were in great distress, being beset by two powerful enemies. In these circumstances it was revealed to them as a sign of perfect security, and an earnest of their deliverance, that the Messiah was their omnipotent Immanuel, or God with us, which is equivalent to God in our nature, engaged in our behalf, and manifested for our salvation. This name is also applied to Christ in Matt. i. 23, "Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which, being interpreted, is, God with us,"—a passage which clearly shows that the prophecy of Isaiah on this subject was fulfilled in Jesus Christ, who was possessed both of a divine and a human nature.

IMMARCALIN, officers among the ancient Jews whose precise duties have not been distinctly ascertained. They were seven in number; they carried the keys of the seven gates of the court of the Temple, and one could not open them without the rest. It has been also alleged, that there were seven rooms at the seven gates, where the holy vessels and vestments were laid up, these seven men keeping the keys, and having the charge of them. The office of the Immarcalin was perpetual, like that of the high-priest.

IMMATERIALISTS, a name applied to those who believe the soul to be a spiritual substance distinct from the body—an opinion which forms a part not of the Christian religion alone, but of all other religions, Jewish, Mohammedan, and Pagan, with the single exception, perhaps, of the Badhist faith. The immateriality of the human soul is denied, in deed, by a class of infidels, who, from this article of their creed, receive the name of MATERIALISTS (which see).

IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL. That the soul of man is not material, or composed of matter like his body, has been the general, nay, almost universal, belief of the human race in all ages, with the exception of a few atheists who, led astray by the phantoms of a vain philosophy, have attempted to account for every thing by matter and motion. But the question meets us at the very outset. What reason have we to believe that matter thinks? All that we know of matter is, that it is inert, senseless, and lifeless. It is an entirely gratuitous assumption, therefore, to maintain, that, in addition to these qualities which we see it to possess, it is invested with the quality of thinking. "It was never supposed," says Dr. Samuel Johnson, "that cogitation is inherent in matter, or that every particle is a thinking being. Yet if any part of matter be devoid of thought, what part can we suppose to think? Matter can differ from matter only in form, density, bulk, motion, and direction of motion: to which of these, however varied or combined, can consciousness be annexed? To be round or square, to be solid or fluid, to be great or little, to be moved slowly or swiftly one way or another, are modes of material existence all equally alien from the nature of cogitation. If matter be once without thought, it can only be made to think by some new modification, but all the modifications which it can admit, are equally unconnected with cogitative power." Thought is, in its nature, simple and indivisible; but if each atom were a thinking being, then millions of these thinking beings would go to constitute man. And matter being divisible, if thought be an essential quality of matter, thought must be divisible also. But that this is not the case is plain from the fact, that each particle of any one of the organs of sense does not possess the same qualities which are possessed by the entire organ. Neither does each particle of the brain, which is believed to be the organ of the mind, possess the same qualities which belong to the entire brain.

Further, if the soul be material, then is it like the body liable to decay, so that man, without a single principle of identity being left him, changes all that constitutes himself, soul and body, some ten or twelve times during his life. Thus the moral responsibility of man is entirely destroyed, and he ceases individually to be chargeable with sins, which must necessarily have been performed by a plurality of beings under the fiction of one name. Reason, in short, in a thousand forms, proclaims the utter folly and absurdity of that philosophy which would explain all the actings of the human soul by matter and motion. "All that is pure in love," as Mr. Godwin eloquently describes it in his Lectures on the Atheistic controversy, "all that is exalted in friendship, that is tender in maternal regard, is only the result of some mechanical action or chemical affinity. All the bright visions of glory that stood before the mind of a Milton, were but the dance of certain atoms in his brain,—the enlarged conceptions and the profound reasonings of Newton, by which he generalized innumerable insulated facts, and discovered the great law of nature, was only a lucky congregation of certain medullary particles, that meeting together most appropriately, and in a most fortunate position in his brain, kindled a light that diffused itself through the whole world of mind, and commenced a new era in science. Every virtue that adorns, every grace that beautifies, and every sublime trait of magnanimity that ennobles the human character:—the daring of the hero, the devotion of the patriot, the benevolence of the philanthropist, and the piety of the martyr, are nothing but the properties of that food which, after having existed in a vegetable form, entered into the composition of the animals on which man has fed; which having been taken into the stomach and digested, and received into the general mass of blood, after having passed through all these parts and processes, became all that was brilliant, and powerful, and lovely in mind!"

But while reason shuts us up to a belief in the immateriality of the human soul, the Scripture determines the point beyond debate. "Then," says Solomon, referring to the period immediately after death, "shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." In this passage a clear distinction is established between the mortal body and the immortal soul. The one returns to the earth; the other returns to God. In Ps. cxxi. 5, David says, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit," and Stephen immediately before death, prayed to Christ in these words, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." In Isa. xxxi. 3, the distinction between the material body and the immaterial soul is thus expressed: "Now the Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses flesh, and not spirit." Paul again, in 2 Cor. v. 6, says, "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord."

Thus both reason and revelation alike declare, that the soul of man is in its nature and constitution immaterial, and therefore, as we are authorized in concluding, immortal.

IMMENSITY. See INFINITY.

IMMERSIONISTS. See BAPTISTS.

IMMOLATION, a ceremony performed in offering sacrifices among the ancient Romans; the head of the victim before it was killed being generally strewed with roasted barley meal mixed with salt. This composition was called mola salsa, a salted cake, and hence an entire sacrifice was often called an immolation. See SACRIFICE.

IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL. The doctrine of the soul's immortality is clearly taught in the Word of God, and it is, besides, a prominent article in the religious creed of every nation on the face of the earth. So nearly universal, indeed, has been the belief in this tenet, that it seems as if it were a natural deduction of human reason. Frequent allusions to a state of existence allotted to man beyond the grave, are found in the most approved writers of heathen antiquity, but withal so obscure and indistinct as scarcely to convey to the mind of the candid reader the impression that by any individual in these remote ages the doctrine was steadily and undoubtingly believed. Even Socrates, though a martyr to the comparative purity of his doctrines, and held forth by Bishop Warburton as of all the ancient philosophers the only believer in a future state, must needs in his last moments, when his view of immortality might have been expected to have been at the strongest, remind his friend that he owed a cock to Æsculapius; and Cicero himself, with all his high notions of moral truth, could reach no farther in his belief of a future state, than the ardent longing after immortality. "If I err," says he, "I willingly err." That the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is to some extent taught by human reason, is capable of being proved by the whole analogy of natural objects, by innumerable facts in the past history of the human mind and by some of the noblest aspirations of our intellectual and moral nature.

The immortality of the human soul may be proved not only from the fact of the universal belief of the doctrine prevailing in all ages and countries, but from the equally extensive prevalence of a dread of annihilation. The mind of man revolts at the very idea of ceasing for ever to exist. The only approach to a belief in such a dread negation of existence is to be found in the NIRWANA (which see) of the Buddhists, which they are said to regard as the highest object of human desire. With this strange unaccountable exception, existence even in the very depths of misery is less dreadful to the human mind than the thought of eternal non-existence.

Another argument in favour of the soul's immortality is sometimes drawn from the capability of the human mind progressively to advance in knowledge, without reaching perfection in this world. The brute creation soon arrives at certain limits, beyond which generation after generation cannot pass; but no such limits are imposed upon the human being. He goes indefinitely onward from one degree of attainment to another, investigating with ever-increasing anxiety every department of inquiry in the realms both of mind and matter. Can we suppose that the soul thus endowed with an insatiable thirst for knowledge, which it incessantly seeks to gratify, without ever being sated, will after the lapse of a few years be arrested in its onward course and plunged into eternal non-existence? How much more rational is it to suppose that when the body has mouldered in the dust, the soul will still exist and advance progressively in the attainment of higher and higher degrees of knowledge throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity? The same remark applies to the amiable affections and desires of the human heart; which both in their exercise and enjoyment are evidently fitted to last for ever.

Another argument in behalf of the immortality of the soul, may be derived from a contemplation of the attributes of God, as the Creator and Moral Governor of the world. He has endowed man with earnest longings after immortality, and it cannot be that he designs to mock us by rendering these desires utterly fruitless. And what is the moral aspect which this world presents? Vice often flourishes and triumphs, while virtue is doomed to linger out a weary life of affliction and disappointment and painful suffering. Whence this apparent anomaly? Should we not regard it as far more consistent with our conceptions of the Moral Governor of the universe, that if there is to be no hereafter, the righteous should be rewarded, and the wicked punished on this side the grave. To account, therefore, for the obvious discrepancies which meet us everywhere in the survey of God's providential dealings with men, we are forced to the conclusion that the soul of man will exist in a future world, where the righteous will be duly rewarded, and the wicked justly punished.

But while powerful presumptive arguments for the immortality of the soul are discoverable by the light of natural reason, it is in the Gospel of Christ that life and immortality have been clearly brought to light. We cannot for a moment believe, however, as Dr. Warburton, followed by Dr. Whately, has taught, that the Jews under the law were entirely unacquainted with this important doctrine. That obscure intimations of a future state may be afforded even by unassisted reason, is sufficiently obvious, we think, from the fact that it has been in all ages a matter of speculation and anxious discussion; and if so, can we believe that a system of policy so complete as that of the Mosaic economy would have contained not the remotest allusion to a matter of paramount interest to the whole human family? This it may be said is the language which has been currently adopted by the sceptic and the infidel, when objecting to the Divine authority of the Jewish law; and yet it is language in which we would cordially join. With all deference to the distinguished author of 'The Divine Legation,' we would be far from thinking it necessary to change our position, and endeavour to show his omission of the doctrine of a future state, to have been any proof that Moses was divinely inspired. It is giving no undue advantage, as Dr. Whately would seem to imagine, to the adversaries of our holy faith, should we admit the doctrine to be set forth in the law not prominently and directly but by implication. This is precisely the mode in which a priori we should have expected the revelation of a future state to have been made to the Jews. As the motives of human actions, founded on eternal rewards and punishments, could not have been fairly urged without a clear and explicit proclamation of all the peculiar doctrines of the gospel which are necessarily connected with it, and it did not seem consistent with the purposes of God to give such a clear and simple and spiritual explanation of his will as was afterwards given; was it not more accordant with the obscurity which pervaded the other parts of the Jewish system, that "life and immortality" should be also covered with an almost impenetrable veil of mystery and darkness? If the infidel presses his objection from the difficulty of finding in the law any allusion to a future state, we would remind him that it is equally difficult to discover in the law any of those peculiar doctrines which are unfolded to us with such simplicity and clearness in the Christian Scriptures. It is not enough to affect surprise, that a truth discoverable by human reason should have so rarely, if it all, been mentioned by the Jewish legislator. We admit the doctrine, absolutely speaking, to form a part of the religion of nature, but we unhesitatingly deny, that in the form and connexion in which it is set forth in revelation, it either has been, or even could be discovered, by the most persevering efforts of human reason. It is this, then, which we allege to constitute it a peculiarity of the Christian system; and in the same view we are warranted in expecting a priori, that it should share in the obscurity which covers all the other peculiar doctrines of Christianity, in so far as they are mentioned in the law of Moses. The hour of full and unclouded revelation was not yet come. To imagine, therefore, that any other than the darkest reference would be made to eternal rewards and punishments, is to indulge the idea, that Moses, as a divinely inspired writer, would have imparted to the Jews a distorted view of the divine arrangements. He must either have simply stated the fact, that such rewards and punishments would hereafter exist, without developing the principles of the Divine government on which they would be bestowed, and in this case he would have conveyed a false impression to the minds of the people in reference to a subject of infinite moment; or, he must have stated the fact in connexion with the full details of the Christian scheme, which would have been entirely subversive of the end and design of the ancient dispensation. Either the one mode of acting or the other would, if adopted, have been alike unworthy of a divinely-commissioned legislator. Moses, however, on this as well as on other points, has been completely consistent. He has referred to a future state of retribution just as frequently, and with as much clearness, as to the other peculiarities of the later and more spiritual dispensation.

IMMOVEABLE FEASTS, those feasts kept in various Christian churches which fall always on the same day in the calendar in each year. Thus the saints' days are immoveable feasts. See FESTIVALS.

IMMUTABILITY, an essential attribute of the Divine nature. God is necessarily unchangeable, there being no power external to himself which can produce any change on him. Nor could any change in his own nature originate from himself, any change, whether to a higher or a lower, a better or a worse condition, being equally an impossibility. If God be necessarily what he is, then he cannot change, since it would imply what God is to be necessary and not necessary at the same time, which is impossible. See GOD.

IMPANATION (Lat. in pane, in the bread), the doctrine that Christ's presence is in or with the bread in the Lord's Supper. It is synonymous with CONSUBSTANTIATION (which see), a doctrine adopted by Luther and his followers.

IMPECCABLES (Lat. in, not, and peccabilis, capable of sinning), those heretics who believed that they were incapable of sinning. This notion was entertained by the Priscillianists and some of the Gnostic sects.

IMPLICIT FAITH, an undoubting assent yielded to all that is taught by the church, as being the oracle of religious truth. This is required by the Romish church from all within her communion. On this great duty of Romanists, Dr. Newman thus expresses himself in his Discourses to Mixed Congregations: "And so, again, when a man has become a Catholic, were he to set about following a doubt which has occurred to him, he has already disbelieved. I have not to warn him against losing his faith,—he is not merely in danger of losing it, he has lost it; from the nature of the case he has already lost it; he fell from grace at the moment when he deliberately determined to pursue his doubt. No one can determine to doubt what he is sure of; but, if he is not sure that the church is from God, he does not believe it. It is not I who forbid him to doubt; he has taken the matter into his own hands, when he determined on asking for leave; he has begun, not ended in unbelief; his wish, his purpose, is his sin. I do not make it so; it is such from the very state of the case. You sometimes hear, for example, of Catholics falling away, who will tell you it arose from reading the Scriptures, which opened their eyes to the 'unscripturalness,'—so they speak of the church of the living God. No. Scripture did not make them disbelieve; (impossible!) They disbelieved when they opened the Bible; they opened it in an unbelieving spirit, and for an unbelieving purpose. They would not have opened it had they not anticipated. I might say hoped, that they should find things there inconsistent with Catholic teaching. They begin in pride and disobedience, and they end in apostasy. This, then, is the direct and obvious reason why the church cannot allow her children the liberty of doubting the truth of her word. He who really believes in it now, cannot imagine the future discovery of reasons to shake his faith; if he imagines it, he has not faith; and that so many Protestants think it a sort of tyranny in the church to forbid any children of hers to doubt about her teaching, only shows they do not know what faith is; which is the case: it is a strange idea to them. Let a man cease to examine, or cease to call himself her child." Cardinal Tolstus, in his instructions for priests, says, that "if a rustic believes his bishop, proposing an heretical tenet for an article of faith, such belief is meritorious." Cardinal Cusanus affirms, that "irrational obedience is the most consummate and perfect obedience, when we obey without attending to reason, as a beast obeys his driver."

IMPLUVIUM. See ATRIUM.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS. See HANDS (IMPOSITION OF).

IMPRECATIONS, prayers invoking the wrath of God either upon the suppliant himself, or upon others. These were sometimes so terrible, that among the ancient Hebrews, a person, in taking an oath, omitted the imprecation, although it was sufficiently well understood from his performing the action by which it was usually accompanied. We find a form of imprecation mentioned in 1 Kings xx. 10, "And Ben-hadad sent unto him, and said, The gods do so unto me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me." Among the heathen nations of antiquity, imprecations were sometimes regarded as so powerful that they occasioned the destruction, not only of single persons, but even entire families and cities. Thus the calamities which came upon the family of the Atrida were supposed to arise from the imprecations pronounced by Myrtilus upon their ancestor Pelops, by whom he was thrown into the sea, or from the imprecations of Thyestes, the brother of Atræus. The most terrible imprecations were those uttered by parents, priests, kings, or other sacred persons. It was customary for men condemned for any notorious crime among the Greeks, to be cursed by the priests. This punishment was inflicted upon Alcibiades, in addition to banishment and the confiscation of his property.

IMPROPRIATION, a term used in Canon Law to denote the possession of an ecclesiastical benefice by a layman who draws the secular fruits or profits of it. The word is to be carefully distinguished from APPROPRIATION (which see).

IMPUTATION, a term used in theological language to signify the legally or judicially putting down to the account of another that which is not actually his. Thus the first sin of Adam is said to be imputed, or legally charged, to all his posterity: and the righteousness of Christ is imputed judicially to all believers. Had Adam, as the Pelagians affirm was the case, not been the representative of all his posterity, none would have been affected by his sin but himself. But Adam being the federal head of his natural descendants, his sin became, in a sense, theirs, and all its consequences also became theirs. In virtue of the covenant made with their first father, all men are viewed by God as in Adam, and involved in his guilt. And on the same principle, in virtue of the new covenant, or covenant of grace, all believers are viewed by God as in Christ, and partakers of his perfect righteousness, which was wrought out in their name. Hence the principle of imputation, in its twofold aspect, is thus set forth in Scripture, "As in Adam all died, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." "As by one man's disobedience the many were made," or accounted, "sinners; even so by the obedience of one shall the many be made," or accounted, "righteous."

The doctrine of imputation, however, though plainly laid down in the Bible, has given rise to occasional controversy in the course of the history of the church. In the fifth century, the Pelagians denied the whole doctrine of original sin, without, however, making any special objections to the doctrine of imputation. Placeus or La Place, a French divine of Saumur in the seventeenth century, the colleague and friend of Amyraut, (see AMYRALDISTS) was the first who made a formal denial of the imputation of Adam's first sin to his posterity, declaring that original sin is imputed to men not immediately but mediately; that is, not immediately by the sovereign decree of God, but mediately, or by inward depravity transmitted from Adam to all his natural descendants. La Place was accused of heresy in 1645, before the national synod of Charenton, by Antony Garissol, a divine of Montauban, and by his influence the opinions of La Place were condemned in his absence. For a time he bore patiently this injurious treatment, but at length, in 1655, he published a new disputation on the subject of imputation, in which he showed that his opinions had been entirely misunderstood by the synod. This explanation, however, did not satisfy his opponents, who continued to assail him; and at the instance of Francis Turretin in particular, the church of Geneva was persuaded in 1675 to adopt the doctrine of immediate imputation as a settled article of their faith. This was done in a work drawn up by John Henry Heidegger, a divine of Zurich, under the title of the FORMULA CONSENSUS (which see). This document gave rise to considerable discontent in the Helvetic churches, but, nevertheless, continued in force for many years, until it gradually fell into disuse.

Another controversy on the doctrine of imputation was originated in North America, by Dr. Samuel Hopkins, towards the end of the eighteenth century. (See HOPKINSIANS.) This learned divine denied imputation both in the case of Adam's sin and of Christ's righteousness, chiefly on the ground that sin and righteousness being strictly personal, cannot be transferred from one person to another. The question was freely discussed by several American divines, and the controversy passed to Great Britain, but has never attracted much attention. One of the ablest works on the subject is a 'Contrast between Calvinism and Hopkinsianism,' by Ezra Styles Ely, published at New York in 1811.

INABILITY, want of power sufficient for the performance of any work or the accomplishment of any design. It is generally regarded as of two kinds, natural and moral inability. These are very clearly explained by President Edwards, in his 'Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will.' Thus we are said to be naturally unable to do a thing when we cannot do it if we will, because of some impeding defect or obstacle that is extrinsic to the will; either in the faculty of understanding, constitution of body, or external objects. Moral inability consists either in the want of inclination, or the strength of a contrary inclination; or the want of sufficient motives to induce and excite the act of the will or the strength of apparent motives to the contrary. When Jesus Christ said to the Jews, "Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life," he refers not to a natural but to a moral inability. President Edwards also points out an important distinction between two kinds of moral inability;—that which is general and habitual, and that which is particular and occasional. "By a general, habitual, moral inability," says he, "I mean an inability in the heart to all exercises or acts of will of that nature or kind, through a fixed and habitual inclination, or an habitual and stated defect, or want of a certain kind of inclination. Thus a very ill-natured man may be unable to exert such acts of benevolence, as another, who is full of good nature, commonly exerts; and a man, whose heart is habitually void of gratitude, may be unable to exert such and such grateful acts, through that stated defect of a grateful inclination. By particular and occasional moral inability, I mean an inability of the will or heart to a particular act, through the strength or defect of present motives, or of inducements presented to the view of the understanding, on this occasion.—

If it be so, that the will is always determined by the strongest motive, then it must always have an inability, in this latter sense, to act otherwise than it does; it not being possible, in any case, that the will should at present, go against the motive which has now, all things considered, the greatest strength and advantage to excite and induce it."

INACHIA, a surname of Io, the daughter of Inachus. (See next article.)

INACHUS, the most ancient deity of Argos, a river-god, and son of Oceanus and Tethys.

INAUGURATION, the ceremony by which among the ancient Romans a person or a thing was consecrated to the gods. It was performed by the AUGURS (which see), who offered prayer to the gods, asking them to show by signs whether the intended consecration met with their sanction. If the signs appeared favourable, the inauguration was regarded as completed. Though this ceremony properly belonged to the augurs, the inauguration of the flamens devolved upon the college of pontiffs. The kings of Rome were inaugurated by the augurs as the high-priests of the people. Magistrates, tribes, and even the comitium came to be inaugurated, though no priestly dignity was conferred by means of it.

INCANTATIONS. See ENCHANTMENTS, WITCH-CRAFT.

INCARNATION (Lat. in carne, in flesh), a word used to describe that solemn mystery by which the Son of God became man to accomplish our redemption. It is thus described in Luke i. 35: "And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Now the Divine Word in becoming incarnate took to himself a true body and a reasonable soul. The reality of his body may be proved of course by the same arguments by which we are accustomed to prove the reality of our own bodies. He hungered and thirsted, he was weary and slept, he was born and grew, he died and was buried; thus showing that his body was no phantom as the Docete taught, but truly flesh and blood. That he possessed a reasonable soul admits of equally easy and satisfactory proof. He grew in wisdom as well as in stature, he was sorrowful and deeply grieved, and moreover he died, his soul thus being separated from his body. But was he truly the son of Mary, did he take his flesh of her substance? That this question must be answered in the affirmative is ably and conclusively proved by Mr. Dodds, in his work 'On the Incarnation of the Eternal Word.' "If he took not a body," says he, "of the substance of his mother, then was his whole life one continued scene of deception. Not only did Mary call him her son, but he called her his mother,—he was subject unto her, and on the cross he manifested his filial duty to her by providing for her a home in the house of the beloved disciple. Now if Mary was not as truly his mother, as any other woman is the mother of her child, his recognizing her as his mother, from the beginning to the end of his life, was in reality a deception. And, as Tertullian most justly remarks, if the Marcionites considered it as a degradation of the eternal Word, to suppose that he would submit to be born of woman, it is surely a much greater degradation of him to suppose that he would profess to be her son, while in reality he was not. He would much rather be the son of Mary in reality, than falsely pretend to be so. Again, if he took not flesh of Mary, then is he no brother, no kinsman of ours, and his right of redemption altogether fails. In this case, he not only is not David's son, but he is not the son of man at all, as he almost uniformly calls himself,—deceptively it must be admitted, unless Mary was truly his mother. Neither in this case could we with any truth be said to be 'members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones,' if in reality his body was a different substance, and derived from a different source from ours. Moreover he could not call us 'brethren,' any more than we can apply that appellation to the angels that surround the throne of God, or to the worm that creepeth in the dust. Fellow-creatures they are, but, without an entire community of nature, our 'brethren' they are not. And when we are required to 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' we are required to do what is not merely a moral, but a physical impossibility, if there lie between us and him, the utterly impassable barrier of a different nature. If he took not his fleshly substance of the flesh of his mother, then not being as truly man as we are, he could not fairly meet and conquer our oppressor, or at least his victory can give no assurance of victory to us. For, to express a very common sentiment in the language of Irenæus, 'Had he not been man who conquered our enemy, he would not have been fairly conquered; and on the other hand, had he not been God who gave us the victory, we could hold it upon no secure tenure.' And finally, if he took not flesh of the substance of Mary, then was he not truly the 'woman's seed,' and the great original promise, upon which all subsequent promises are built, remains as yet unfulfilled. But it is not more essential that the serpent's head should be bruised at all, than it is that it should be bruised by the 'woman's seed.' Hence if Christ was not truly and really the 'woman's seed,' then the whole foundation of our hopes fails. Upon these grounds we not only hold it most important to believe, but consider it to be most irrefragably proved, that Christ was as truly 'made of a woman' as we are,—that his body was truly a body composed of flesh and blood, as ours is."

From this view of our Lord's humanity it seems naturally to follow, as the late Mr. Edward Irving taught, that the nature which our Lord took upon him was a fallen, sinful nature, it being acknowledged by all Protestant churches at least, that the Virgin Mary was a fallen, sinful woman. The sinfulness of Christ's human nature, however, does not necessarily follow from his being born of a sinful woman; for neither is the body of man, viewed singly, a fallen body, nor the soul of man, viewed singly, a fallen soul, but the whole man consisting of both soul and body. The body of Christ, therefore, might partake of the substance of his mother without involving any necessity that he should be a fallen man. Again, the guilt of Adam's first sin and the depravity of his nature consequent upon the fall, could be propagated only, as far as we know, by ordinary generation. But as Jesus Christ descended from Adam in a singular and extraordinary way, it is plain that he was not at all involved in the guilt of Adam's sin, nor tainted by the contagion of the fall. Hence he is described as "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners;" "tempted in all things like as we are, yet without sin." It must be observed, besides, that the humanity of our Lord is termed "a thing," not a person,—"that holy thing which shall be born of thee;" and no wonder it is termed holy, when we find that it was generated by the Holy Ghost, as the angel declared to Mary, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee."

INCENSE, a compound of sweet spices, which was commanded in the Law of Moses to be offered upon the golden altar. (See ALTAR OF INCENSE.) The spices are mentioned in Exod. xxx. 34, to have been stacte, onycha, and galbanum, with pure frankincense, equal weights of each. This incense was offered twice every day, morning and evening, by the officiating priest, the people remaining without in solemn silence. On the great day of atonement, the high-priest himself took fire from the great altar in a golden censer; and having received incense from one of the priests, he offered it on the golden altar. (See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) Incense is the symbol of prayer in Scripture. In the daily service of the temple, the priest, whose lot it was to burn incense, offered the incense of the morning sacrifice, between the sprinkling of the blood and the laying of the pieces upon the altar; and that of the evening sacrifice, between the laying of the pieces upon the altar and the drink-offering.

Incense is said to have been offered among the ancient Egyptians. Plutarch alleges that they offered incense to the sun, resin in the morning, myrrh at noon, and about sunset an aromatic compound, which they called Kypi. Accordingly, on the Egyptian monuments are to be found representations of incense-altars. The use of incense in connection with the eucharist in the Christian church was unknown until the time of Gregory the Great, in the latter part of the sixth century. After this period it became prevalent in the churches. Cardinal Bona, and other Romish writers, attempt to trace the use of incense as far back as the days of the Apostles. No mention of it, however, occurs in the writings of the first three centuries, with the exception of the Apostolical Canons, which speak of incense in the time of the oblation. These canons cannot, however, be proved to have existed before the third century, and indeed, the first reference to them as an entire collection is by the council of Nice A. D. 325. We find no allusion to the use of incense in the Apostolical Constitutions, which contain express arrangements for conducting the worship of the church. The use of incense has been discontinued in the Church of England since the Reformation, but is still preserved in the Church of Rome.

INCHANTMENTS. See ENCHANTMENTS.

INCIPIENTES (Lat. beginners), a name sometimes applied to CATECHUMENS (which see) in the early Christian church.

INCOMPREHENSIBILITY, an attribute of the Divine Being, having a reference to the limited understanding of the creature, which must necessarily be utterly unable to comprehend God. To understand God, as has been well said, we must needs be Gods. "Who can by searching find out God? Who can find out the Almighty unto perfection?"

INCORRUP'TIBLE. See APHTHARTODOTITES.

INCUMBENT, the present possessor of a benefice.

INDELIBLE CHARACTER, a spiritual sign alleged by the Romish church to be impressed upon the soul by certain sacraments, which cannot therefore be repeated. The sacraments which convey this indelible character are baptism, confirmation, and orders. Romish divines differ considerably in opinion as to the precise nature of this indelible character; some placing it in an external denomination, others in a real relationship; some in an absolute entity, and others in the initerability of the sacrament itself. All of them agree, however, in classing it among their articles of faith. The passages of Scripture by which they allege it to be proved, are 2 Cor. i. 21, 22, "Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts," and Eph. i. 13, "In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise." The councils of Florence and of Trent lay down distinct definitions of sacramental character; the one terming it a certain spiritual indelible mark, the other a certain spiritual indelible sign; while both declare that the three sacraments which impress this character cannot be repeated. See SACRAMENTS.

INDEPENDENCE, an essential attribute of the Supreme Being. It implies his existence in and of himself, without depending on any other being whatever. This indeed necessarily follows from the perfection of his nature as underived and uncommunicated, and from his infinite superiority to all other beings, which could not be asserted of him if he were in the slightest degree dependent on them.

INDEPENDENTS. See CONGREGATIONALISTS.

INDEX EXPURGATORIUS, a class of catalogues of authors and works censured and corrected chiefly by expurgation or erasure of passages. They are issued from time to time by the Church of Rome, and published by authority of her ruling members or societies so empowered. During the pontificate of Sixtus IV., regulations were laid down for preventing the printing of any work except such as was previously licensed by an officer appointed for that purpose; and in the tenth session of the council of Lateran under Leo X., it was decreed that no one under the penalty of excommunication should dare to publish any new work without the approbation either of the ordinary jurisdiction of the place or of the Holy Inquisition. This class of Indexes contains a particular examination of the works occurring in it, and specifies the passages condemned to be expurged or altered.

INDEX PROHIBITORIUS, a class of catalogues of authors and works wholly condemned by the Church of Rome. It specifies and prohibits entire authors or works, whether of known or unknown authors. This book has been frequently published with successive enlargements, down to the present time, under the express sanction of the reigning Pontiff. The first regular Index was constructed after a decree of the council of Trent, delegating that undertaking to the Pope. Pius IV. lost no time in preparing a catalogue, with certain rules prefixed, all of which he sanctioned by the authority of a bull.

INDIANS (NORTH AMERICAN), RELIGION OF. See NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS (RELIGION OF).

INDIFFERENT THINGS. See ADIAPHORISTS.

INDIGETES, a name given among the ancient Romans to those gods who had once lived upon earth as ordinary mortals, but after their death had been exalted to the rank of deities. They were the hero-gods of the Romans, and worshipped as the protectors of their country. See HERO-WORSHIP.

INDRA, one of the most ancient gods of HINDUISM (which see). He was the god of light, and was one of the Triad of the Vaidic period. He is not unfrequently styled "lord of heaven." The name Indra is of doubtful origin, meaning either "blue," or "the illuminator," or "the giver of rain." He occupies a prominent place among the Vaidic gods, and in the Rig-Veda, he is represented as the offspring of Aditi, the mother of the universe. In the next period of Hindu mythology, the same Indra becomes a deity of the second order, and he occupies only the fourth heaven. In the Vedas he is "a personification of the phenomena of the firmament, particularly in the capacity of sending down rain." He is the god of clouds and storms, and engages in battle with the demon Vritra, who withholds the periodical rains on which the country depends for its fertility. He is represented as young and handsome, with a beautiful nose or chin, wearing two golden earrings, ever joyous and delighting in exhilarating draughts of the Soma juice. "One man," says the Rig-Veda, "propitiates him with sacrifice, another worships with mind averted: to the first he is like a lake to a thirsty traveller; to the other like an ever-lengthening road." He is sometimes recognized in the same Veda as the Creator.

INDUCTION, in the Church of England a term used to denote putting a minister in actual, or, as the canon law calls it, "corporal," possession of the church to which he is presented, along with all its temporalities. A presentee, though admitted and instituted by the bishop, is not complete incumbent until he has been inducted. The bishop or ordinary issues a mandate for induction addressed to the archdeacon, who either inducts in his own person, or issues a precept for others to do it. The method of induction is as follows:—The archdeacon or person inducting takes the clerk by the hand, and lays it upon the key, or upon the ring of the church-door, or if the key cannot be had, and there is no ring on the door, on any part of the wall of the church or churchyard, and pronounces these words: "By virtue of this mandate I do induct you into the real, actual, and corporal possession of the church of —— with all the rights, profits, and appurtenances thereunto belonging." After making this declaration, the inductor opens the door, and puts the person inducted into the church, who usually tolls a bell to make his induction notorious to the parish. The archdeacon or other inductor now certifies the induction, either in a separate document, or on the back of the bishop's mandate. The word Induction is often employed by Presbyterians to denote the ceremony by which an ordained minister is admitted into a ministerial charge by the Presbytery of the bounds within which the charge is situated.

INDULGENCE, the remission, according to the Romish church, of the temporal punishment due to sins, remitted as to their guilt by the power of the keys, without the sacrament, by the application of the satisfactions which are contained in the treasury of the church. This treasury is described by Dens as the collection of the spiritual goods remaining in the divine possession, the distribution of which is intrusted to the church; and the collection is made from the superabundant satisfactions of Christ, along with the superfluous satisfactions of the Virgin Mary and of the other saints. On the subject of indulgences, the creed of Pope Pius IV. declares, "I also affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ to the church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people." Indulgences are divided into local, real, and personal; into plenary, non-plenary, more plenary, and most plenary; and into perpetual and temporal. The Pope, according to the view of Romanists, is the sovereign dispenser of the church's treasury, and this power he dispenses to bishops in their respective dioceses. The power of granting plenary indulgences to all Christians is vested in the Pope; but the power of a bishop to grant indulgences is limited to his own diocese. It is by divine right that the Pope claims to exercise this power, while it is possessed by the bishops only by ecclesiastical right. This distinction is denied by the Gallican church, which holds that all bishops possess this power on an equal footing with the Pope himself. Indulgences are not only wont to be granted to the living, but to souls already in purgatory, of whom Bellarmine says, that "the Pope applies the satisfactions of Christ and the saints to the dead, by means of works enjoined on the living. They are applied not in the way of judicial absolution, but in the way of payment."

The passages of Scripture which are usually adduced by Romanists in support of indulgences, are such as these, Matt. xvi. 19, "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven;" John xxi. 15, "Feed my sheep;" Col. i. 24, "Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church;" 2 Cor. ii. 10, "To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the person of Christ;" and John xx. 23, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." Some Romish writers, for example Durandus, deny that indulgences have any foundation either in Scripture or in the ancient Christian Fathers. Thomas Aquinas tells us, that there were some in the church who affirmed that the intention of the church in indulgences was only, by a pious fraud, to draw men to charitable acts, which otherwise they would not have done. Indulgences being usually expressed in large and general terms, the question came to be discussed among the Schoolmen, whether the power of indulgences extended as far as the words implied. Some asserted that indulgences signified as much as the church declared, but with these conditions, that there be sufficient authority in the giver, and necessity in the receiver; that he believe the church to have power to forgive him; that he be in a state of grace, and give a sufficient compensation. Some asserted that common indulgences were efficacious only for sins of ignorance; others for venial sins; others for penances negligently performed; others for the pains of purgatory. Some maintained that indulgences extended no farther than the canonical power of the church; others that they included the judgment of God.

It is not easy to discover the precise period at which indulgences began to be issued by the Romish church. The earliest trace of them is probably to be dated from the ninth century, when the Penitential Books gave directions for substituting almsgiv-ing instead of canonical punishments; and these exchanges appear soon to have degenerated into a system of regular bargaining with penitents on the part of the church. The first formal indulgence on record seems to be that which was bestowed by Pontius, archbishop of Arles, A. D. 1016, on a new conventual church. In the eleventh century, the Popes too began occasionally to issue plenary indulgences. This was done, for instance, by Benedict IX., and Alexander II. After the time of Gregory VII. the popes began to promise full pardon in return for certain important services rendered to the church. As early as the year A. D. 1100, Urban II. granted a plenary indulgence and remission of sins to all such persons as should join in the Crusades to liberate the sepulchre of Christ from the hands of infidels. It became customary, also, to grant indulgences to such as, without adventuring in their own persons, should provide a soldier for these expeditions. According to Morinus, the French bishops professed, during the twelfth century, to remit a third or fourth part of penance to persons who should contribute a certain sum of money towards the building or restoring of a place of worship. In this way Mauritius, bishop of Paris, built the splendid cathedral of Notre Dame, and four abbeys. Innocent III., in A. D. 1215, imposed restrictions on episcopal indulgences on account of some abuses which had arisen, for not only were indulgences bestowed by the popes on those who took part in the successive Crusades, but several orders of monks, with papal sanction, offered peculiar indulgences with trifling demands. In A. D. 1300, Boniface VIII. proclaimed the year of jubilee, in which the most complete forgiveness of sin was to be guaranteed in return for small contributions in money.

The doctrine of indulgences came now to be a recognized dogma of the Church of Rome, and at length Clement VI. first proclaimed it in his Jubilee-Bull issued in A. D. 1343, when he reduced the period of Jubilee from one hundred to fifty years. Urban VI. altered the Jubilee in 1389 to every thirty-third year, and, accordingly, Boniface IX. repeated it in 1390, and not contented with the increased revenue which the indulgences of that year afforded him, he offered the Jubilee-Indulgence for sale out of Rome in the years following, and, besides, drove a sordid traffic in indulgences under various names.

Thus the system of indulgences prevailed more and more extensively as time advanced, and although, in consequence of its glaring abuses, the Council of Constance sought to keep it within bounds, yet so rapidly did indulgences multiply, that they formed a characteristic feature of the fifteenth century. The Jubilee and Postjubilee years now returned at shorter intervals, and at length in 1470, a standing ordinance was determined on by Paul II. according to which every twenty-fifth year was to be a jubilee year. "General indulgences," says Gieseler, "were frequently granted for taking part in warlike expeditions against unbelievers, and enemies of the papal see, or put up to sale for the maintenance of such wars. Other indulgences were conceded for other services rendered to the church. Besides, various ecclesiastical associations, especially the monastic orders, were provided with rich indulgences, not only for their own members; but the later orders, particularly the Mendicants, were supplied for a lucrative trade with laymen as well as with other orders. Moreover, the numerous resorts of pilgrimages were endowed with large indulgences; and at length indulgences were granted for certain festivals, for certain prayers, even in honour of crowned heads. That the papal indulgence extended over purgatory too, had been long ago maintained by some divines, though impugned by others. Now, the doctrine, that it availed there per modum suffragii, was the one most generally held, and was even officially ratified by Sixtus IV. in 1477. Henceforth the Popes, in their bulls of indulgence, continually issue decrees in favour of souls in purgatory, and demean themselves, in spite of that mitigating formula, as holding full authority over it, and as gate-keepers of heaven, and dispensers of everlasting blessedness. Persons who denied this universal power of the Popes were persecuted, and the Sorbonne alone curbed its extravagant exaltation. Besides there were several other graces connected with the Pope's indulgences, some of which, as for instance the concessions with regard to property unrighteously gotten, were open perversions of morality. Others, such as the permission to take milk diet in fasting times, contributed at any rate still further to perplex all ideas of conscience. As it was evident that this constitution of indulgences could produce no other than the most injurious effects upon morality: so these effects were still further heightened by the universal frauds, which were constantly intermingled with the traffic in indulgences. Moreover at times forged indulgences, which even outstript the real in stupidity, were often believed by the common people: at times the Pope's indulgence preachers overstept their commission, and were ashamed of no method of turning their indulgences, like common wares, to the best possible account. Thus the papal sale of indulgences was universally regarded as a mere money-speculation; and it happened more and more frequently that the very act, which was announced as the dispensation of the loftiest spiritual graces, was not allowed by the secular nobles, or was regarded with suspicion, or gave rise to the strongest remonstrances. Now also men began to come forward in increasing numbers, whose zeal in the cause of religion and morality was especially directed against the system of indulgences; although persecution was usually the reward of their labours."

The evils connected with the traffic in indulgences had now become so manifest, that not a few earnest men publicly protested against the whole system as unscriptural in its character and immoral in its effects. In Germany, and in the Netherlands, indulgences were loudly denounced by many otherwise warm friends of the church. In the face, however, of the opposition to the system which was beginning to be manifested in various parts of Europe, Leo X., with an exhausted treasury, and earnestly intent upon the completion of the immense fabric of St. Peter's at Rome, which had been commenced on so magnificent a scale by Julius II., issued a bull granting plenary indulgences to all who should contribute towards the accomplishment of his favourite object. The right of promulgating these indulgences in Germany, along with a share in the profits arising from them, was granted to Albert, Elector of Metz, and archbishop of Magdeburg, who, as his chief agent for retailing them in Saxony, employed Tetzel, a Dominican friar of great zeal and eloquence. "The indulgence dealers," says D'Aubigné, "passed through the country in a gay carriage, escorted by three horsemen in great state, and spending freely. One might have thought it some dignitary on a royal progress with his attendants and officers, and not a common dealer or a begging monk." For a time Tetzel drove a lucrative trade, but at length the princes and nobles were irritated at seeing their vassals drained of so much wealth in order to replenish the Papal treasury. Men of piety lamented the credulousness of the people, and all began to wish that an end were put to this shameful traffic, which was injurious alike to the welfare of the community and the interests of true religion. It was at this favourable juncture that Martin Luther first began to call in question the efficacy of indulgences. An earnest controversy now commenced, which ended in the establishment of the Reformation in Germany, whence it rapidly spread to other European countries.

In consequence of the withering exposure which Luther and the other Reformers had made of the abuses practised in the sale of indulgences, the council of Trent found it necessary to decree that while the use of indulgences should be retained in the church, "all wicked gains accruing from them shall be wholly abolished." In the same spirit Pius, in 1567, revoked all the indulgences which had been granted for lucrative purposes. Paul V., in 1606, repealed all those which were granted by his predecessors to the Regulars of every Order, and gave others in their place. Innocent XI. in 1678, also withdrew many indulgences as false, forged, and apocryphal. Indulgences have continued, nevertheless, down to the present day to be issued by the Roman see, more particularly on the occasion of a jubilee.

INDULGENTIA (Lat. indulgence), a name sometimes applied to baptism in the early Christian church, as being attended, when blessed by the Spirit, with absolution or the remission of sins. This ordinance was always esteemed the most universal absolution and grand indulgence in the ministry of the church.

INDULTS, a term used in the Church of Rome to denote the power of presenting to benefices granted to certain persons by the Pope. Sometimes indults have been given to kings and sovereign princes. In 1424, Pope Martin V. presented an indult to the parliament of Paris, which, however, they refused to accept. The cardinals likewise have an indult granted them by agreement between Pope Paul IV. and the sacred college in 1555, which is always confirmed by the Popes at the time of their election. Thus the cardinals have the free disposal of all the benefices depending on them, without being interrupted by any prior collation from the Pope. By this indult they may also bestow a benefice in commendam.

INDWELLING SCHEME, a hypothesis of very high antiquity, which alleged the pre-existence of Christ's human soul in union with the Deity, thus constituting, as some have supposed, the Logos, the wisdom and power of God, by whom the worlds were made, and the whole dispensation of Providence has been since administered. The Jews have ever been wont to assert that the soul of the Messiah was made before all creatures. This opinion was strongly maintained by Dr. Thomas Goodwin and Bishop Fowler, but more especially by Dr. Isaac Watts, in his 'Glory of Christ as God-Man.' The Indwelling Scheme appears to be founded, both in name and in reality, on Col. ii. 9, "In whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." It supposes the human soul of Christ not to have been created at his conception in the womb of the Virgin Mary, but to have existed previous to his incarnation in union with the Godhead. See PRE-EXISTENTS.

INFALLIBILITY, a privilege claimed by the Church of Rome, in virtue of which she declares that she cannot at any time cease to be pure in her doctrine, nor fall into any destructive error. This prerogative she alleges she has received from Christ as the true Catholic church, and, therefore, she requires and expects that the whole Christian world should bow to her decisions. In proof of the infallibility of the church, Romanists are wont to adduce various passages of Scripture, such as these: Matt. xvi. 18, "And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it;" John xx. 23, "Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them;" Matt. xxviii. 20, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world;" John xvi. 13, "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come;" 1 Tim. iii. 15, "The church of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth."

In addition to the support which Romanists suppose the doctrine of infallibility to derive from Scripture, they are accustomed to argue, that the Catholic church cannot err in her doctrines, because they have regularly descended to her, link by link, in an unbroken chain from the apostles themselves, whose inspired infallibility was universally acknowledged. But considerable difference of opinion exists in the Romish church as to the precise seat of this infallibility. Some suppose it to be seated in the universal church scattered over the whole world; others allege it to reside in the Pope; others in a general council independent of the Pope; and others still, in a general council with a Pope at its head.

The opinion which places infallibility in the Pope is held by the Jesuits, and almost without exception by the Italian clergy, who, above all others, are under papal influence. It has been embraced, also, by the councils of Florence, Lateran, and Trent. According to Bellarmine and Dens, however, the Pope is liable to error in a personal and private capacity, and as some allege, may even be guilty of heresy and infidelity. The Jesuits and Canonists in general, extend infallibility both to questions of right and of fact. This was claimed by Leo himself in the Lateran council.

The Italian school, while they vest infallibility in the Roman pontiff, vary with respect to the form which this prerogative assumes. They limit his infallibility to his official decisions, but they differ as to the time when he is to be understood as speaking with official authority. Some allege that he does so only when he decides in council; others when he decides according to Scripture and tradition; and others still when he decides after mature and diligent examination. The most general opinion, however, on this subject is, that the Pope is infallible when, in his public and official capacity, as head of the church, he gives forth his instructions on points of faith and morality. But even on this view of the matter great variety of opinion exists in the Romish church. Some say that the Pope speaks in his official capacity when he enacts laws, and others when he issues rescripts. A large party in the present day hold, that the question as to the infallibility of the Pope is a point not of faith but simply of opinion.

In opposition to the Italian, or, as it is sometimes called, the Ultramontane party, the Gallican church, or Cisalpine party, has always held that infallibility is seated in a general council lawfully assembled; and that the Pope, as distinct from the council, is liable to error, and in case of disobedience, is subject to deposition by the council. The Pontiff's liability to error, even in matters of faith, has been maintained accordingly by the ablest French divines, and conceded by many of the popes themselves. The Gallican view of infallibility was held by the general councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basil.

A third party differ on this question from both the French and Italian schools. This party may be considered as represented by Dr. Milner, who, in his 'Eld of Controversy,' thus defines infallibility: "A general council," he says, "with the Pope at its head, or the Pope himself issuing a doctrinal decision which is received by the great body of Catholic bishops, is secure from error." According to this theory, a Pope or a council may singly fall into error; but when united they are infallible. This opinion of course goes to overthrow the decisions of the first and second councils of Nice, the council of Ephesus, and that of Constantinople, in all of which the Pope presided neither in person nor by proxy. And, again, several general councils were not sanctioned, but, on the contrary, resisted by pontifical power.

Another, though a very small section of the Romish community, considers infallibility as lodged in the church universal, comprehending the assembly of all the faithful. But even this party, small though it be, is divided into two sections; the one holding that the church universal implies only the clergy scattered throughout all Christendom; the other alleging that it includes both the clergy and the laity, who form collectively the church Catholic. Such are the varied opinions existing in the Romish church as to the precise seat in which the infallibility of the church resides. The church has not given her authoritative decision on this much vexed question, and, therefore, the utmost diversity of sentiment is allowed to prevail upon the subject. It is also doubtful how far this infallibility extends. Some limit it to articles of faith and precepts of morality; others make a distinction between matters of right and facts, and also between facts simply, and facts connected with faith. The united opinion of all Protestant churches is, that infallibility resides not in the church, but in the Bible; and, therefore, to its decisions all must implicitly bow. This is the standard, the only true, infallible standard to which all the opinions both of individuals and of churches must ultimately be referred. And if any person or community of persons wish to be guided into all the truth, they must look for the aid of the infallible heavenly Teacher, even the Spirit of the Living God, who, while he makes use of the word as his instrument, gives light along with the truth, and thus teaches savingly and to profit.

INFANTICIDE, the practice of destroying infants. This barbarous and inhuman custom has prevailed among almost all heathen nations, showing very strikingly the truth of the scriptural statement, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of horrid cruelty;" and the correctness of the apostolic description of the heathen, as being "without natural affection." The Canaanites, in ancient times, sacrificed their sons and their daughters to devils or demons. (See HUMAN SACRIFICES.) The Jews also were guilty of this crime, having learned it from the heathen nations around them. Even among the ancient Greeks infanticide was not unknown. The Spartans, for instance, permitted only promising children to be reared, all the others being without remorse put to death. But in modern heathendom this horrid custom has been extensively prevalent. In the Sandwich islands, it was estimated, by the foreigners who first visited them, that two-thirds of the infants born were destroyed by their own parents. Mothers would cast their children into a hole dug in the earth, and covering them up, would trample upon them with their feet, and thus stifle their cries. In the Georgian and Society Islands, it is almost incredible to what an extent this practice was carried. On this subject we may adduce the testimony of the Rev. John Williams, as given in his 'Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands:' "Generally, I may state that, in the Society Islands, I never conversed with a female that had borne children prior to the introduction of Christianity, who had not destroyed some of them, and frequently as many as from five to ten. During the visit of the deputation, our respected friend, G. Bennett, Esq., was our guest for three or four months; and, on one occasion, while conversing on the subject, he expressed a wish to obtain accurate knowledge of the extent to which this cruel system had prevailed. Three women were sitting in the room at the time, making European garments, under Mrs. W.'s direction; and, after replying to Mr. Bennett's inquiries, I said, 'I have no doubt but that each of these women have destroyed some of their children.' Looking at them with an expression of surprise and incredulity, Mr. B. exclaimed, 'Impossible! such motherly respectable women could never have been guilty of so great an atrocity.' 'Well,' I added, 'we'll ask them.' Addressing the first, I said to her, 'Friend, how many children have you destroyed?' She was startled at my question, and at first charged me with unkindness, in harrowing up her feelings by bringing the destruction of her babes to her remembrance; but, upon hearing the object of my inquiry, she replied, with a faltering voice, 'I have destroyed nine.' The second, with eyes suffused with tears, said, 'I have destroyed seven;' and the third informed us that she had destroyed five. Thus three individuals, casually selected, had killed one-and-twenty children!—but I am happy to add, that these mothers were, at the time of this conversation, and continued to be so long as I knew them, consistent members of my church.

"On another occasion, I was called to visit the wife of a chief in dying circumstances. She had professed Christianity for many years, had learnt to read when nearly sixty, and was a very active teacher in our adult school. In the prospect of death, she sent a pressing request that I would visit her immediately; and, on entering her apartment, she exclaimed, 'O, servant of God! come and tell me what I must do.' Perceiving that she was suffering great mental distress, I inquired the cause of it, when she replied, 'I am about to die, I am about to die.' 'Well,' I rejoined, 'if it be so, what creates this agony of mind?' 'Oh! my sins, my sins,' she cried

Infanticide in India

I am about to die.' I then inquired what the particular sins were which so greatly distressed her, when she exclaimed, 'Oh my children, my murdered children! I am about to die, and I shall meet them all at the judgment-seat of Christ.' Upon this I inquired how many children she had destroyed, and, to my astonishment, she replied, 'I have destroyed sixteen! and now I am about to die.' As soon as my feelings would allow me, I began to reason with her, and urged the consideration that she had done this when a heathen, and during 'the times of ignorance, which God winked at;' but this afforded her no consolation, and again she gave vent to her agonized feelings by exclaiming, 'Oh my children, my children!' I then directed her to the 'faithful saying, which is worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' This imparted a little comfort; and after visiting her frequently, and directing her thoughts to that blood which cleanseth from all sin, I succeeded, by the blessing of God, in tranquillizing her troubled spirit; and she died, about eight days after my first interview, animated with the hope 'that her sins, though many, would all be forgiven her.'

"The modes by which they perpetrated this deed of darkness were truly affecting. Sometimes they put a wet cloth upon the infant's mouth; at others, they pinched their little throats until they expired. A third method was to bury them alive. And a fourth was, if possible, still more brutal. The moment the child was born, they broke the first joints of its fingers and toes, and then the second. If the infant survived this agonizing process, they dislocated its ankles and the wrists; and if the powers of endurance still continued, the knee and elbow joints were then broken. This would generally terminate the tortures of the little sufferer; but if not, they would resort to the second method of strangulation. We had a servant in our employ for fifteen years, who previously performed infanticide as her trade; and we have many times listened with feelings of the deepest agony, while she has described the manner in which she perpetrated the horrid deed."

Infanticide prevails also in China. Mr. Barrow computes from authentic data that not less than nine thousand children are exposed in the streets of Peking every year, and as many more in the provinces. He states that it is part of the duty of the police to carry away in carts every morning those that have been exposed during the night, some of them still alive; but they are all carried to a pit without the walls, and buried promiscuously. In some parts of Hindustan, particularly in Orissa, and the eastern parts of Bengal, the people frequently offer their children in sacrifice to Ganga, by drowning them in the river. At one time the revolting crime of infanticide was extensively practised in Benares, and the adjoining districts. "The great supporters of this iniquitous practice," as we are informed by one who was long resident in India, "were formerly the Rajpoots, the Rajhkomars, and the Rajhvansis, among whom a single female infant was never permitted to exist, nor did they consider their destruction as an act of sin or cruelty, though I am unable to believe, as many have affirmed, that they regarded the sacrifice as an acceptable offering to the gods. It appears rather to have originated in convenience, on account of the ruinous expense attending their marriage, and to have been practised without fear of offence to the deities, for their belief is, that the souls of those daughters who were thus destroyed were eventually returned to them in the persons of sons; and when this did not appear to be borne out by the birth of a male child, it only followed that Siva was displeased, and conciliation was resorted to, until a son should really be born to them. In these cases it was usual to seek propitiation by placing the next female infant in the hands of the Brahmins, to be solemnly sacrificed in the temple of Ganesa, whereby that god might be moved to compassion for the babe, and be induced to intercede with Siva for the future birth of male children to the parents. It is easy to perceive whence this delusion had its commencement, since a handsome douceur to the immolating priests was an indispensable part of the ceremony, which in all respects differed from the method of destruction privately used. In the latter place the operation was performed with very little form or expense, by what the Hindoos call drinking milk. No sooner had the sex of the infant been ascertained, than a cauldron of warm milk was brought into the apartment where the mother lay, and after prayers for the child's return in the form of a son, the little innocent was immersed in the milk, and held down until life became extinct, and then it was carried to the Ganges and thrown into the stream. When, however, the deed was committed to the Brahmins to be executed by way of sacrifice to Ganesa, the poor babe was carried to the temple, and, being laid upon its back, was, after certain diabolical ceremonies, destroyed by the club of the inhuman fakir."

In some districts of India, the inhuman parents have been known to bury their living children up to the throat in the earth, leaving the head exposed to the attacks of the wild beasts and birds of prey; others have bound the poor innocents by the feet to the branch of a tree, there abandoning them to the most horrible of deaths; others have hurled them from a height into the waters of a sacred river. In Madagascar, the fate of the infant depends on the calculation of lucky and unlucky days. Should the destiny of the child be declared by the astrologer to be evil, the poor helpless babe is doomed to destruction. The practice of infanticide has been long prevalent in Madagascar; and although, during the reign of Radama, it was abolished, the inhuman custom has been again revived with all its attendant circumstances of barbarity. From Mr. Moffat we learn that the Bushmen in South Africa will kill their children without remorse on various occasions, as when they are ill-shaped, when they are in want of food, when the father of a child has forsaken its mother, or when obliged to flee from the farmers or others; in which case they will strangle them, smother them, cast them away in the desert, or bury them alive. There are instances of parents throwing their tender offspring to the hungry lion, who stands roaring before their cavern, refusing to depart till some peace-offering be made to him. Many other instances of the prevalence of infanticide among heathen nations might be mentioned, but those which we have adduced are sufficient to show that wherever men are unenlightened and uninfluenced by gospel truth, cruelty and inhumanity characterize the human heart.

INFERI, the gods of the lower world among the ancient Greeks and Romans, as distinguished from the gods who dwelt in the high or heavenly regions. The Greeks, however, more generally applied the term inferi to the inhabitants of the infernal regions, including both gods and the souls of the departed. See HELL.

INFERIÆ, sacrifices which the ancient Romans offered at the tombs of their deceased relatives at certain periods. They seem to have regarded the manes of their ancestors as gods, and hence they presented to them oblations consisting of victims, wine, milk, garlands of flowers, and other things. See FUNERAL RITES.

INFIDELS, unbelievers, a general term used to describe all who subscribe to any of the different forms which unbelief has assumed. It comprises those who deny the Divine existence, or, as they are usually termed, Atheists; those who deny the Divine Personality, and are called Pantheists; those who deny the Divine Providential government, and receive the name of Naturalists; those who admit the existence and government of God, but deny the authority and inspiration of the Bible, and who are denominated Deists; those who consider human reason as the measure and test of Divine Revelation, and who bear the designation of Rationalists; and those who, like the Secularists of our own day, deny the possibility of establishing, by valid argument, anything whatever which is beyond the reach of our bodily senses; or the adherents of the religion of Humanity, who ignore all written revelation, and find religion only in the outward universe and the inward man; or the Humanists of the last century in Germany, who sought to sink Christianity in the elements of human nature. Infidelity assumes the most diversified shapes and aspects, according to the age and country in which it makes its appearance. And yet in all its varied forms, by one distinctive feature it is uniformly characterized—its being strictly negative. It denies rather than affirms; it disbelieves rather than believes. Its creed is comprised in one single article, brief but comprehensive: "I believe in all unbelief." At one time it assails the being, the attributes, the Personality, the Providence of God; at another it seeks to demolish the arguments for the genuineness, the authenticity, the inspiration, the exclusive authority of the Word of God; at another it controverts the soul's immortality, and a judgment to come. At one time it is metaphysical; at another, physical; at another moral, in its character and bearings. The rapid advance which the natural sciences have made during the last quarter of a century, particularly in the department of geology, has tended, in no slight degree, to alter the whole aspect of the infidelity of our day. It affects to wear the appearance of a regular scientific argument, which, by the introduction and plausible explanations of the development hypothesis, would seek to destroy our confidence in the statements of the Bible. Such is the decided tendency of the 'Vestiges of Creation,' and works of a similar kind. But if we have a physical school of infidels, we have also a metaphysical school, who endeavour, by the most profound subtleties, to undermine the authority of the Bible. To this latter school belong the Emersons and Theodore Parkers of our own day, who attempt to discredit the outward and objective revelation of the Scriptures, by substituting in its place an inward and subjective revelation in the consciousness of the human being. "Recent theories," says Dr. Bannerman, "on the subject of inspiration I have left us in doubt as to what, in the volume of Scripture, is the wisdom of God, and what the foolishness of man. It is not now merely the ancient form of the error that meets us in regard to the different degrees and kinds of inspiration attributed to the different parts of the Scriptures of God. But the very distinction itself between what is of God and what is of man has been done away with; the objective revelation is confounded, or, to a great extent, identified with the subjective belief; and the spiritual intuition or convictions of man are made to occupy the place, and mimic the authority, of an inspiration by God. In the same manner, recent tendencies of religious speculation and feeling have served to revive, in all its former interest and importance, the question of the sole and supreme authority of the written and inspired Word of God. On the one side, we have the claims put forth on behalf of the intellectual powers or inward intuitions of man to be the judge of truth apart from the Word and authority of God, and to receive the communications of that Word only in so far as they commend themselves to his reason or spiritual apprehensions; and, on the other side, we have dangers to the truth no less imminent. To find an infallible interpreter for the infallible Word of God; to find rest from the conflict of doubt and unbelief, without the responsibility or the pain of the exercise of private judgment and personal inquiry; to enter the haven of undisturbed faith, without passing through the storm of conflicting opinion—this is a desire at all times most natural to the human heart, and especially so in an age like the present of reviving earnestness in religion;—and hence an approximation to the views and tenets of the Popish church, on the subject of ecclesiastical authority and tradition, is a state of feeling extensively prevalent in the midst of us."

It is wonderful to what an extent a change of name may sometimes be successful in removing old prejudices, which may have been connected with a system. Infidels in this country have, of late years, attempted by this paltry subterfuge to insinuate themselves into the confidence of the public. They are no longer Atheists and Infidels, as in former days, but simply Secularists, who allege that "precedence should be given to the duties of this life over those which pertain to another;" and that "there exist, independently of Scriptural authority, guarantees of morals in human nature, intelligence, and utility." The design of such statements is obviously to set aside the Bible as the rule of human faith and duty, and to substitute, as impelling motives of action, the things which are seen and temporal for those things which are unseen and eternal. See INTUITIONISTS, SECULARISTS.

INFINITY, an essential attribute of the Divine Being. He must necessarily be boundless; we can assign to him no limits either in duration or space. The material universe cannot be otherwise than finite or limited, form being essential to matter, and form being necessarily finite or confined within bounds. But we cannot conceive limits to Him who created the universe. His necessary existence must, as far as we can perceive, be necessary in every point of space, as well as in every moment of duration. The self-existent First Cause of all things must necessarily be infinite, both in space and duration, otherwise there might be a point in both the one and the other, where his presence and power were alike wanting. See God.

INFRALAPSARIANS (Lat. infra, below, lapsus, the fall), a name applied to those Calvinists who believe unconditional election, on the part of God, to be subsequent to the foreseen apostasy of man. Hagenbach alleges that the synod of Dort approved of the Infralapsarian scheme. The utmost, however, that can be said upon the subject is, that its decrees make no express mention of Supralapsarianism.

INGATHERING (FEAST OF), an ancient Jewish festival observed on the day which immediately followed the seven days of the Feast of Tabernacles. Hence it is often called the eighth day of that feast, although it was undoubtedly a separate festival, in token of thanksgiving for the safe ingathering of the fruits of the ground. After dwelling in booths for seven days the people returned to their houses, and on the day thereafter they observed the Feast of Ingathering. No servile work was allowed to be done on it, and praises were sung to God at the temple with trumpets and instruments of music. On this day they read the last section of the law, and began the first lest they should appear to be more joyful in ending the law than willing to begin it. There was no sacrifice of six bullocks as on the Feast of Tabernacles, but of only one bullock. A peculiar benediction was used on this festival, called the Royal Blessing, in allusion to 1 Kings viii. 66, "On the eighth day he sent the people away; and they blessed the king, and went unto their tents joyful and glad of heart." They observed the same solemnities, however, about the pouring out of water, as they had done on the seven preceding days. This eighth day festival came to be held in great veneration among the Jews, and the Rabbis thus speak of it: "The eighth day shall be holy. Thou seest, O God, that Israel in the Feast of Tabernacles offers before thee seventy bullocks for the seventy nations for which they ought to love us; but for our love they are our adversaries. The holy blessed God, therefore, saith to Israel, offer for yourselves on the eighth day."

INGEN, a hero-god of Japan, and a native of China, who lived about the year 1650. He was a zealous Buddhist or Budhist, and looked upon as an illustrious saint. But he was more especially venerated because in answer to a Kitoo, or special prayer which he offered, a plentiful rain had fallen in a time of drought.

INGHAMITES, the followers of Benjamin Ingham, Esq. of Aberford Hall, Yorkshire. About the year 1732, he left the Church of England and joined the Society of the first Methodists at Oxford. He accompanied John and Charles Wesley on their first voyage to Georgia in North America; and on his return home, after a year's absence, he parted from the Methodists, and attached himself to the United Brethren. In a short time he set out on an itinerating tour in the North of England, and established a number of churches on the footing of the INDEPENDENTS or CONGREGATIONALISTS (which see.) Mr. Ingham was married to Lady Mary Hastings, daughter of the Countess of Huntingdon; and in imitation of that excellent lady, he devoted much of his wealth to the advancement of the cause of Christ throughout England. In 1760, Mr. Ingham, having met with the writings of Mr. Glas and Mr. Sandeman, adopted some of their opinions, both in reference to doctrine and discipline; and in consequence many of his followers abandoned him, but a great number still continued to adhere to him. The churches which belonged to his communion admitted their members by lot, like the Moravian Brethren, and required them to declare their experience, that the whole Society might judge of the gracious change which had been wrought in their hearts. The congregations soon began to fall into confusion and disorder, and Mr. Ingham found it necessary to remodel them, laying aside some of those peculiarities which had given rise to contentions among the members. He contended very strongly for the imputed righteousness of Christ; but he objected to the language usually adopted in speaking of distinct persons in the Godhead. He practised infant baptism, but did not consider a plurality of elders to be necessary for the dispensation of church ordinances. He particularly inculcated upon his followers the impropriety of eating things strangled or partaking of blood. Remains of the Inghamites are still found in England, but they are a very small body, only nine congregations having been reported at the last census in 1851.

INITIATI, a name applied to the faithful in the early Christian church, as being initiated, that is admitted to the use of sacred offices, and to the knowledge of the sacred mysteries of the Christian religion. Hence Chrysostom and other ancient writers, when speaking of any doctrines which were not explained to the catechumens, were wont often to say, "The initiated know what is said." St. Ambrose addresses a work expressly to the Initiati.

INLAGA, a class of spirits, the worship of which forms the most prominent feature in the superstitious practices of Southern Guinea. They are the spirits of dead men; but whether good or evil spirits, even the natives themselves do not know. The spirits of the ancestors of the people are called Abambo; but the Inlagá are the spirits of strangers, and have come from a distance. Sick, and especially nervous persons, are supposed to be possessed with one or other of these classes of spirits, and various ceremonies are performed to deliver them from their power. In the first instance the patient is taken to a priest or priestess, who applies certain tests in order to discover to which class of spirits the disease belongs, and this being ascertained, the patient is put under the care of the proper priest. The ceremonies in both cases are very similar. They are thus described by Mr. Wilson, who was for many years resident in the country: "In either case a temporary shanty is erected in the middle of the street for the occupancy of the patient, the priest, and such persons as are to take part in the ceremony of exorcism. The time employed in performing the ceremonies is seldom less than ten or fifteen days. During this period dancing, drumming, feasting, and drinking are kept up without intermission day and night, and all at the expense of the nearest relatives of the invalid. The patient, if a female, is decked out in the most fantastic costume; her face, bosom, arms, and legs are streaked with red and white chalk, her head adorned with red feathers, and much of the time she promenades the open space in front of the shanty with a sword in her hand, which she brandishes in a very menacing way against the by-standers. At the same time she assumes as much of the maniac in her looks, actions, gestures, and walk, as possible. In many cases this is all mere affectation, and no one is deceived by it. But there are other cases where these motions seem involuntary and entirely beyond the control of the person; and when you watch the wild and unnatural stare, the convulsive movements of the limbs and body, the unnatural posture into which the whole frame is occasionally thrown, the gnashing of the teeth, and foaming at the mouth, and the supernatural strength that is put forth when any attempt is made at constraint, you are strongly reminded of cases of real possession recorded in the New Testament."

The priests have certain tests by which it is known when the patient is healed, and he is required in token of gratitude for deliverance to build a small house or temple near his own, in which the spirit may reside, to take occasional offerings to him, and pay him all due respect, failing which, he is liable to renewed assaults at any time. Certain restrictions also are laid upon the dispossessed demoniac. He must refrain from certain kinds of food, avoid certain places of common resort, and perform certain duties; otherwise the spirits will assuredly recover their power over him. See DEMONS.

INNER MISSION, a scheme of operations devised of late years in Germany, for elevating the masses within the pale of the church from their destitution and corruption by united efforts, especially in the form of societies, without being under the management of organized Christian churches. Its objects and aims are thus sketched by Dr. Kahnis, who, being himself a Lutheran of the High Church party, is opposed to all efforts for the Christianization of the masses made by bodies not having an organic connection with the church. "The Inner Mission," says he, "opens to children, to whom the parents cannot devote the necessary care and attention, its infant-schools and nurseries; to destitute and demoralized children, its asylums and reformatory schools; and takes care of the spiritual and temporal improvement of the adults, in Sunday Schools and Young Men's Associations. It takes care of the poor in relief associations, which not only support, but also watch over the bodily and spiritual welfare of their charge. It nurses the sick; gets up healthy and cheap lodgings; increases, in savings' banks, the mite of the poor; seeks, by the power of communion, to educate the intemperate to renunciation; penetrates into the gaols of the criminals, and takes care of those who have been dismissed; circulates Bibles and Christian books, for awakening Christian faith and love, and seeks to make the Sunday again a Sabbath, a day of rest and of elevation to the Lord. It takes care of prostitute girls; descends, reproving and helping, into the abodes of filth; offers to the travelling journeymen places of spiritual recreation; brings the Word of God to the crowds of labourers who do not find time to take care of their souls; endeavours to strengthen destitute and smitten congregations, by itinerant preachers; educates nurses, who not only attend to the bodies, but also to the souls of the sick."

From this statement, though given by one who looks upon the Inner Mission with a jealous eye, it is quite plain that it has reference chiefly to domestic heathenism, which has crept into German Protestantism to such a fearful extent, and it proposes by all legitimate means to reclaim the heathen masses to living Christianity. The originator and the main-spring of this noble work, which bids fair to infuse new life into German Protestantism, is Dr. Wichern, one of the greatest and best men of the age. This eminent Christian philanthropist was born at Hamburg in 1808. He studied at Berlin under Schleiermacher and Neander, and even while yet a student, he conceived a strong desire to devote himself to the Christianization and moral elevation of the humbler classes. In 1833, he opened a sort of ragged school under the name of the 'Rauhe Haus,' or Rough House, in the neighbourhood of the village of Horn, about three miles from Hamburg. "This noble establishment," says Dr. Schaff, "is a large garden full of trees, walks, flowers, vegetables, and adjoining corn-fields, with several small, but comfortable, wood-houses, and a neat, quiet chapel. It embraces various workshops for shoemaking, tailoring, spinning, baking, &c., a commercial agency (Agentur) for the sale of the articles made by the boys; a printing and publishing department; a lithograph and wood engraving shop, and a book-bindery—all in very energetic and successful operation. Many excellent tracts and books are annually issued from the Institution, also a monthly periodical, under the title 'Fliegende Blätter,' Fly Leaves, which is, at the same time, the organ of the central committee of the German Church Diet for Inner Mission. The children are divided into families, each about twelve in number, and controlled by an overseer, with two assistants. These overseers are generally theological students who prepare themselves here for pastoral usefulness. Many of them have already gone out to superintend similar institutions in Germany, Switzerland, and Russia, established on the plan of the Rough House. The general management is, of course, in the hands of Wichern, who is universally respected and beloved, as a spiritual father."

After labouring for several years in this private work of faith and labour of love, Dr. Wichern conceived the design of enlisting Christians of the different Evangelical denominations of German Protestants in the great and truly Christian scheme of the Inner Mission. A noble opportunity presented itself in 1848 of calling the attention of his fellow Christians in Germany to the grand idea which for fifteen years had been occupying much of his time and thoughts. The first KIRCHENTAG (which see), or Church Diet, met that year at Wittenberg, for the purpose of consulting on the true interests of the Evangelical Church of Germany. Five hundred Christian men, both clerical and lay, were assembled from all parts of Germany. Dr. Wichern was present at that deeply solemn and interesting meeting, and having made a powerful and heart-stirring appeal on the all-important and urgent work of the Inner Mission, a resolution was passed, that one of the leading objects which should be kept in view in the proposed confederation of the Evangelical German Churches must be the furtherance of ecclesiastical and social reforms, especially Inner Mission. From the meeting of that great assembly over the grave of Luther at Wittenberg, this benevolent Christian enterprise has every year formed one of the chief topics of discussion at the Kirchentag, which continues its sittings for four days, two of which are devoted to the congress of Inner Mission. The cause has received a remarkable impulse from the sanction of the Kirchentag, and although strongly opposed by the High Church Lutherans, it has spread since 1848 with unusual rapidity all over Germany and Switzerland, and at this day the Inner Mission is looked upon by evangelical Christians as one of the most important movements which has ever been made by means of associations of private Christians in any country.

INNOCENTS (FESTIVAL OF THE), a festival instituted in memory of the murder of the children at Bethlehem, on the occasion of the birth of Christ. This cruel massacre of the innocents is thus recorded in Mat. ii. 16, "Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently enquired of the wise men." At an early period in the history of the Christian church, these murdered children began to be spoken of as Christian martyrs. Irenæus says, "Christ, when he was an infant, made infants martyrs for himself, and sent them before him into his kingdom." Cyprian speaks in similar language. Hilary declares that Bethlehem flowed with the blood of the martyrs, and that they were advanced to heaven by the glory of martyrdom. Augustin also says, "These infants died for Christ, not knowing it: their parents bewailed them, dying martyrs: they could not yet speak, and yet for all that they confessed Christ: Christ granted them the honour to die for his name: Christ vouchsafed them the benefit of being washed from original sin in their own blood." The same Christian Father tells us, that the church received them to the honour of her martyrs. Origen not only calls them the first-fruits of the martyrs, but says that their memorial was always celebrated in the churches after the manner and order of the saints, as being the first martyrs that were slain for Christ. It is not unlikely that the festival of EPIPHANY (which see), may at an early period have included as one of its objects the commemoration of the massacre of the innocents. When this event came to have a separate festival of its own does not appear. It is observed now, however, on the 28th of December. The Greek church in their calendar, and the Abyssinian church in their offices, mention fourteen thousand children as having perished at Bethlehem by the inhuman decree of Herod.

INQUISITION, a sacred tribunal or court of justice, erected with Papal sanction in Roman Catholic countries for the examination and punishment of heretics. Historians are by no means agreed as to the precise period at which the Inquisition was founded. From the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, penal laws were both enacted and executed against heretics, as being in the view of the Christian Emperors enemies to the peace and prosperity of the commonwealth. Theodosius, however, is generally allowed to have been the first of the Roman Emperors who pronounced heresy to be a capital crime see HERETICS, and the first sanguinary law which doomed heretics to death was passed A. D. 382. About this time, we find officers, called Inquisitors, employed to assist in the execution of the bloody enactments, which visited with the severest punishment the slightest deviation from what was considered to be the orthodox doctrine of the church. These officers, however, were not like the Inquisitors of the Romish church in after ages belonging to the clerical order, but laymen appointed by the Roman prefects.

Heresy was from early times viewed by the church as a very heinous crime, incurring excommunication in its severest form; but so far were the clergy from desiring the death of heretics, that Martin, bishop of Treves, strongly remonstrated with the Emperor Maximus against putting the heretic Priscillian to death—a deed which he declared “all the bishops of France and Italy regarded with the utmost abhorrence.” And we find Augustin protesting to the proconsul of Africa, “that rather than see the punishment of death inflicted upon the heretical Donatists, both he and all his clergy would willingly perish by their hands.”

As centuries rolled onward, the proceedings against heretics were marked by increasing severity, until in the eleventh century capital punishment even in its most dreadful form, that of burning alive, was extended to all who obstinately adhered to opinions differing from the received faith. It was not, however, until the thirteenth century, that the court of the Inquisition was first established, its immediate motive being the suppression of the alleged heresy of the ALBIGENSES (which see). At the Lateran council in 1215, in the midst of the thirty years' bloody crusade against these determined opponents of the Church of Rome, the plan of an inquisition or sacred tribunal for the punishment and extermination of heretics was conceived by Innocent III., who then occupied the Papal see. At a council held at Toulouse in 1229, it was ordered that a permanent Inquisition should be established against the heretics. It was not, however, until Pope Gregory IX. in 1233 had deprived the bishops of the power of punishing the heretics of their respective dioceses, and intrusted that duty to the friars of St. Dominic, that the Inquisition was erected into a distinct tribunal. These Inquisitors of the Faith, as they were called, held their first court in the city of Toulouse. This dreaded tribunal was gradually introduced into all the Italian States except Naples, into some parts of France, and into the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal.

The proceedings of the Inquisition, at its first establishment, were comparatively simple, and their examinations were conducted much in the same way as in ordinary courts of justice. Nor did the church, in these trials for heresy, pretend at the outset to assume any other than a merely spiritual authority. Convicted heretics being excommunicated by the spiritual tribunal of the Inquisition were handed over to the secular power, which consigned them to the flames. Gradually the authority of the Inquisitors was extended, and they were called upon to pronounce judgment, not only upon the words and actions, but even upon the thoughts and intentions of the accused. It was not sufficient that a man could prove himself innocent of any expression or overt act which could be considered as detrimental to the Church of Rome; if they could only, by the application of cruel torture, extract from him a confession of having wronged the church in thought, they forthwith pronounced him guilty of heresy. No sooner did a man incur the suspicion of heresy than spies, called Familiars of the Inquisition, were employed narrowly to watch him with the view of discovering the slightest possible excuse for handing him over to the sacred tribunal of the Holy Office. The tortures to which the accused were subjected, in order to obtain such a confession as the Inquisitors desired, were of three kinds, which are thus described by Mr. Shoberl, in his ‘Persecutions of Popery’: “The first, called squassation, consisted in tying back the arms by a cord, fastening weights to his feet, and drawing him up to the full height of the place by means of a pulley. Having been kept suspended for some time, he was suddenly let down with a jerk to within a little distance of the floor, and with repeated shocks all his joints were dislocated; for this species of torture was continued for an hour and sometimes longer, according to the pleasure of the inquisitors present, and to what the strength of the sufferer seemed capable of enduring. If this torture was not sufficient to overcome him, that of water was resorted to. He was obliged to swallow a great quantity, and then laid in a wooden trough, provided with a lid that might be pressed down as tight as the operators pleased. Across the trough was a bar, on which the sufferer's back rested, and by which the spine was broken. The torture by fire was equally painful. A very brisk fire was made; and, the prisoner being extended on the ground, the soles of his feet were rubbed with lard or some other combustible matter, and placed close to the fire, till the agony extorted from him such a confession as his tormentors required. Not satisfied with their success, the judges doomed their miserable victims to the torture a second time, to make them own the motive and intention for the actions which they acknowledged to have committed; and a third time, to force them to reveal their accomplices or abettors.

"If these infernal cruelties failed to wring a confession, artifices and snares were resorted to. Suborned wretches were sent to their dungeons: pretending to comfort and assist them, or even to be prisoners like themselves, they lunched out against the Inquisition as an insupportable tyranny and the greatest of all the scourges with which God had ever afflicted mankind. Their dupes fell the more readily into the snare, as it is hard to withstand the services of friendship and compassion performed for us when in the extremity of misery. The inquisitors seconded these artifices to the utmost of their power. They assured the sufferers that they sympathized with them; that all they aimed at was their conversion: that the slightest confession, which they might make to them in private, and which they promised to keep inviolably secret, would be sufficient to put an end to their afflictions and to procure their liberation.

"The upshot was that, if the accused was held to be convicted in the judgment of the inquisitors, or by witnesses, or by his own confession, he was sentenced, according to the heinousness of the offence, to death, to perpetual imprisonment, to the galleys, flogging, or some other punishment. After condemnation, the execution was deferred for one or perhaps several years, that the sacrifice of a great number of delinquents at once might produce a more striking and terrible effect."

The cruel death by which the Inquisition closed the career of its victims was styled in Spain and Portugal an AUTO-DA-FÉ (which see), or Act of Faith, being regarded as a religious ceremony of peculiar solemnity. These wholesale executions in Spain were for a long time of very frequent occurrence. The Roman Catholic writer Llorente, who was for some years secretary to the Spanish Inquisition, computes that from 1481 to 1517, no fewer than 13,000 human beings were burnt alive, 8,700 burnt in effigy, and 17,000 condemned to different penances. Thus, in the short space of thirty-six years, 191,423 persons were sentenced by the several Inquisitorial Tribunals of Spain alone. The Jews and the Moors formed the great majority of the victims of the Holy Office. It was not until the eighteenth century, that though the Inquisition retained its original constitution almost unaltered, yet the horrors of that dark tribunal began gradually to abate. The awful spectacle of an auto-da-fé was now more rarely exhibited. But even during that century cases, from time to time, occurred, in which, by the authority of the Inquisition, individuals were committed to the flames. The Holy Office of the Inquisition in Spain, however, was abolished by Napoleon Buonaparte in 1808, and its funds applied to the reduction of the public debt. It was restored by Ferdinand VII., in 1814, but totally abolished by the constitution of the Cortes in 1820, and, on the recommendation of the chief European powers in 1823, its re-establishment was refused. According to the calculation of Llorente, in his 'History of the Spanish Inquisition,' compiled from its own records, it appears, that from the year 1481 to 1808, this tribunal condemned in Spain alone, 341,021 persons.

The abolition of the Holy Office in Spain was generally supposed to have been followed by the extinction of similar tribunals in other parts of Europe, where they had existed and been in operation. This, however, was not the case in regard to Rome at least. From the statements of M. Tourman, who was prefect of the department of Rome from 1810 to 1814, it would appear that when the French took possession of the eternal city in 1809, they found the prisons of the Inquisition nearly empty, and learned that they had been so for many years before. But whatever may have been the state of matters at the period referred to, it was at all events found to be necessary in 1825 to rebuild the prisons. From that time till the revolution in 1848, when the Pope fled from Rome, nothing further was heard of the Holy Office: but when the government passed into the hands of the Constituent Assembly, that body suppressed the Inquisition, and when the prisons were thrown open, only a single ecclesiastic and a solitary nun were found lodged there, the former being a bishop, who had been imprisoned for upwards of twenty years. Skeletons of human bodies were found in the vaults of the building, which, from the manner in which they were placed, must have been deposited there at a comparatively recent period. Since the occupation of Rome by the French, the prisons of the Inquisition appear to have been used for the confinement of criminals not amenable to the laws. There is no evidence, however, that the atrocious cruelties formerly perpetrated by the Holy Office, either have been, or are likely soon to be revived. That the spirit of Rome is persecuting and intolerant, her past history too plainly shows, but it is earnestly to be hoped that in future, such is the intelligence of the age and the refinement of advancing civilization, as well as the progress of more enlightened views on the subject of toleration, that the Inquisition will never again be permitted to light its fires, or to torture its victims under the hallowed name of religion.

INSACRATI (Lat. unconsecrated), a name given in the ancient canons to the inferior orders of the clergy in the Christian church. Thus in the council of Agde, the unconsecrated ministers are forbidden to touch the sacred vessels, or to enter into the diaconicon or sanctuary.

INSTALLATION, the act in the Church of England of giving possession of his office to a canon or prebendary of a cathedral, by placing him in his stall.

INSTITUTION, the act in the Church of England by which the bishop commits to a clergyman the cure of a church. No person can be instituted to any benefice unless he be in priest's orders. If he has been already ordained by a bishop, he must present his letters of orders, and show a testimonial of previous good behaviour, if the bishop shall require it; and further, he must manifest himself, on due examination, to be worthy of his ministry. At his institution, the presentee subscribes, in the presence of the ordinary, the Thirty-Nine Articles, and also the following three articles:

"1. That the king's majesty, under God, is the only supreme governor of this realm, and of all other his highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes, as temporal; and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within his majesty's said realms, dominions, and countries.

"2. That the Book of Common Prayer, and of ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, containeth in it nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that it may lawfully so be used; and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed in public prayer, and administration of the sacraments, and none other.

"3. That he alloweth the Book of Articles of religion agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the convocation holden at London in the year of our Lord God one thousand five hundred sixty and two; and that he acknowledgeth all and every the articles therein contained, being in number nine-and-thirty, besides the ratification, to be agreeable to the Word of God."

"An oath is taken against simony—I, A. B., do swear, that I have made no simoniacal payment, contract, or promise, directly or indirectly, by myself, or by any other, to my knowledge, or with my consent, to any person or persons whatsoever, for or concerning the procuring and obtaining of this ecclesiastical dignity, place, preferment, office, or living—[respectively and particularly naming the same, whereunto he is to be admitted, instituted, collated, installed, or confirmed] nor will at any time hereafter perform or satisfy any such kind of payment, contract, or promise, made by any other without my knowledge or consent. So help me God, through Jesus Christ." Also the Oath of Allegiance—I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to her Majesty, Queen Victoria. So help me God.' And the Oath of Sovereignty—I, A. B., do swear, that I do from my heart, abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, that princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whomsoever. And I do declare that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm. So help me God.' There is, likewise, the Oath of Canonical Obedience to the bishop; and every clergyman, on being either licensed to a curacy, or instituted to a benefice, signs the following declaration:—"I, A. B., do declare that I will conform to the Liturgy of the United Church of England and Ireland, as it is now by law established;" which is subscribed in the presence of the bishop, or of some other person appointed by the bishop as his 'commissary.' These various oaths having been taken, a particular and distinct entry of the institution, mentioning the date, the name of the patron of the living, and other circumstances, is to be made in the public register of the Ordinary.

INSPIRATION. It was the general belief of the ancient Christian church, that the prophets and apostles wrote as well as taught under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, that is, they were unerringly guided into all the truth, and their writings must therefore be regarded as infallible. That such was the belief of the Jews in regard to the Old Testament Scriptures in the time of Christ, is clear from the statement of Josephus, who says, that his countrymen universally believed them to have been written by men, "as they learned them of God himself by inspiration," and were justly regarded as divine. "How firmly we have given credit," he says, "to these books of our own nation, is evident from what we do: for during so many ages as have already passed, no one hath been so bold as either to add anything to them, to take anything from them, or to make any change in them; but it is become natural to all Jews, immediately, and from their very birth, to esteem those books to contain divine doctrines, and to persist in them, and if occasion be, willingly to die for them." In the New Testament also we have decisive testimony as to the inspiration of the Old. Thus Paul declares in 2 Tim. iii. 16, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." In Acts vii. 38, the Jewish Scriptures are termed "the lively oracles," and in Rom. iii. 2, and Heb. v. 12, they are described as the "oracles of God." In John v. 39, our blessed Lord appealed to the ancient Jewish Scriptures in these words, "Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me." And in regard to the New Testament, the Apostles received the distinct assurance from the mouth of Christ, that the Father should send the Spirit, who should teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said unto them. "Howbeit," he adds, "when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come." And Paul declares in the name of his fellow-apostles, 1 Cor. ii. 13, "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth: comparing spiritual things with spiritual." John also speaks in the name of all his brethren thus, 1 John iv. 6, "We are of God: he hat knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error."

Not only the apostles, but the primitive churches also recognized the Sacred Writings as inspired. Thus Justin Martyr, who was contemporary with the apostle John, says, that "the Gospels were written by men full of the Holy Ghost." Irenæus, a few years later, declares, that "the Scriptures were dictated by the Spirit of God, and that, therefore, it is wickedness to contradict them, and sacrilege to alter them." The Fathers, however, differed in their views of inspiration; some took it in a more restricted, others in a more comprehensive sense. But they were usually more inclined to admit verbal inspiration in the case of the Old than of the New Testament; and it was not till the canon of the New Testament had been completed, that they adopted concerning it the views which they had long entertained concerning the verbal inspiration of the Old Testament. Many of the early writers held very strong views on the subject of inspiration. Eusebius of Cæsarea considers it highly improper for any man to assert that the sacred writers could have substituted one name for another, for example, Abimelech for Achish. Chrysostom calls the mouth of the prophets, the mouth of God, and Augustin compares the apostles with the hands which noted down that which Christ the head dictated. Many of the Jews held that in penning the Old Testament, the inspired writers were entirely passive.

The first of the ancient Christian writers who took up the notion of different degrees of inspiration, was Theodore of Mopsuestia, who on this account incurred the reprehension of the fifth œcumenical synod. The Jews were accustomed to speak of three different degrees of inspiration. Moses, they alleged, possessed the highest degree, with whom God spake mouth to mouth; the second, according to their view, was the gift of prophecy; and the lowest, the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, from which proceeded the holy writings or Hagiographa. The three degrees of inspiration often spoken of by Christian writers, are superintendence, elevation, and suggestion. This distinction is framed on the supposition that in some circumstances men would require a smaller portion of the Spirit's influences than in others—a supposition which is altogether gratuitous and unnecessary. Suffice it to say, that "holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." All that they wrote was dictated by the express inspiration of the Spirit of God. To admit, even in the slightest degree, the unaided and uninspired exertions of erring man, is dangerous in the extreme. It throws an air of doubt and uncertainty over the whole of the sacred record. Nor are we relieved by the admission, that the sentiments are entirely of divine inspiration. Such is the power of language in modifying the thought intended to be conveyed, that even although the additional concession is made, that "occasionally a more proper word or expression is suggested," our confidence in the Bible must be somewhat shaken. The sentiments are of divine origin, but the mode of conveying them to us is, with a few slight exceptions, of man's devising. Such an opinion is highly dangerous. It is one of those unhallowed interferences with the express declarations of God which are too frequently to be charged upon speculative theologians. The Spirit of Christ hath led the sacred penman "into all truth," and if any man shall dare to assert that they have clothed "the truth" in any case in such language as to convey an erroneous impression to the mind of the reader, we unhesitatingly accuse the cavalier of denying altogether the inspiration of the Bible; since to have been guided in thought, and to have been permitted to err in the expression, of it, is to charge absurdity upon the Spirit of God. It is unnecessary to remark, that we speak not of any other than the original communications made from heaven. Errors in the transcription of manuscripts, and in the translation of versions from one language to another have been permitted, but our present remarks are limited to that which forms the ground-work of the whole. Our object is to maintain the entireness of the work of the Spirit in dictating to men the sacred record. The objection, against this view of inspiration, founded on the diversity of style which may be observed in the books of Scripture, is scarcely worth a moment's notice; just as it the Spirit, in operating upon the minds of men, must necessarily destroy the whole of their mental framework. There can be little doubt that, so far from feeling the slightest constraint, the writers of the sacred volume would carry forward their work to its completion without being conscious of writing under the influence of any supernatural impulse whatever. Such is the usual mode of the Spirit's operation, at least in the work of conversion. It is silent and unseen save in its effects, which are obvious and palpable to all. The sinner has been "made willing" in the day of the Redeemer's power, and in his whole deportment throughout the future part of his life, however different his actings may be from those of his unregenerate state, they are characterized, in reality, by as much freedom in thought and action as before. Similar then, we are entitled analogically to reason, would be the operations of the Spirit in inspiration. In exerting his power over the mind, he acts, not by destroying the ordinary laws of thought and emotion, but by employing these very laws to accomplish his all-gracious purpose.

Various theories of inspiration have been proposed with the view of reconciling the two different and apparently conflicting elements of the Divine and the human. Both are obviously in operation, but how much is to be attributed to the one, and how much to the other, it is difficult precisely to state. Some, as Eusebius and Chrysostom, merge the human element wholly in the Divine, man being entirely passive, and the Holy Spirit being the sole agent in the matter. But the more common view of the subject is, that the Divine is found in the contents of the communication and the human in the channel through which the communication has flowed. Now the very use and design of inspiration, or the infallible guidance of the Spirit of God, is to preserve the Divine contents from being injured by the human, and, therefore, imperfect channel through which they are made to pass. The modern German school, however, represented by Neander, Olshausen, and Tholuck, lose sight of the great end and advantage of inspiration, and make a distinction between the actual revelation from heaven, and the outward and written record in which that revelation is contained. They admit the infallibility of the former, but they just as plainly and distinctly declare the fallibility of the latter. Opinions of a similar kind were stated by Soame Jenyns, in his 'View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion.' "I readily acknowledge," says this professed champion of Christianity against the infidel, "that the Scriptures are not revelations from God, but the history of them: the revelation is derived from God; but the history of it is the production of men, and therefore the truth of it is not in the least affected by their fallibility, but depends on the internal evidence of its own supernatural excellence." Such sentiments go far to discredit, and even to destroy the alleged inspiration of the Sacred Writings. It is impossible for us to draw a practical line of distinction between that which is actual Divine revelation, and that which is the mere human record of this revelation. "There is an internal repugnancy," Mr. Gillespie well remarks, "in the parts of this idea, That the Most Wise Being should bestow a universal revelation of himself upon man, and yet not provide suitably for the communication of the revelation. That such Being should reveal, for all time, a set of doctrines about man's condition and destination, as in relation to his Creator; and yet not make provision, at the same time, for an unobjectionable and perpetually valid vehicle for the revelation of the doctrines: this seems plainly to amount to a position the constituents of which are so repugnant to each other that they must mutually destroy each other. The internal inconsistency is so great that nothing less than the destruction of the whole by itself can be the result. Self-destruction were the only end to which a whole composed of such parts could logically attain."

Three different classes of men in modern times deny the doctrine of the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures. Some, as Priestley, Belsham, and other Socinians of our own country, as well as Schleiermacher, De Wette, and other German divines, reject all miraculous inspiration. "I think," says Dr. Priestley, "that the Scriptures were written without any particular inspiration, by men who wrote according to the best of their knowledge, and who from their circumstances could not be mistaken with respect to the greater facts of which they were proper witnesses, but, like other men subject to prejudice, might be liable to adopt a hasty and ill grounded opinion concerning things which did not fall within the compass of their own knowledge, and which had no connection with any thing that was so."

Another class of writers, such as Michaelis, deny the universality of the inspiration, confining it to a part only of the sacred books, which they allow to be from God, while the others they believe to be from man. A third class of divines again, among whom are to be ranked Dr. Pye Smith and Dr. Dick, believe the whole Bible to be inspired, but not all parts of it equally inspired, some passages being written under one degree of inspiration, and others under another. According to this theory, the Scriptures may be considered as classed into the inspired, the half inspired, and the uninspired. "One part of the Bible," says Gausson in his admirable 'Theopneustia,' "is from man, people venture to say, and the other part is from God. And yet, mark what its own language on the subject is. It protests that 'ALL Scripture is given by inspiration of God.' It points to no exception. What right, then, can we have to make any, when itself admits none? Just because people tell us, if there be in the Scriptures a certain number of passages which could not have been written except under plenary inspiration, there are others for which it would have been enough for the author to have received some eminent gifts, and others still which might have been composed even by a very ordinary person! Be it so; but how does this bear upon the question? When you have been told who the author of a book is, you know that all that is in that book is from him—the easy and the difficult, the important and the unimportant. If, then, the whole Bible 'is given by inspiration of God,' of what consequence is it to the question that there are passages, in your eyes, more important or more difficult than others? The least among the companions of Jesus might no doubt have given us that 5th verse of the 11th chapter of St. John. 'Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus;' as the most petty schoolmaster also might have composed that first line of Athalie, 'Into his temple, lo! I come, Jehovah to adore.' But were we told that the great Racine employed some village schoolmaster to write out his drama, at his dictation, should we not continue, nevertheless, still to attribute to him all its parts—its first line, the notation of the scenes, the names of the dramatis personæ, the indications of their exits and their entrances, as well as the most sublime strophes of his choruses? If, then, God himself declares to us his having dictated the whole Scriptures, who shall dare to say that that 5th verse of the 11th chapter of St. John is less from God than the sublime words with which the Gospel begins, and which describe to us the eternal Word? Inspiration, no doubt, may be perceptible in certain passages more clearly than in others; but it is not, on that account, less real in the one case than in the other."

The most recent school of Absolute Religionists, or those who adhere to what they term the Religion of Humanity (see HUMANITY, RELIGION OF), allege, that the pure instincts of our spiritual nature enable us to determine what portions of the Holy Scriptures are divine, and really entitled to be called the Word of God. The subjective revelation is declared to be the test of the objective, and man is made the judge of the inspired Word of God. In this view the true inspiration is that of human instinct, and the true revelation is the Word of God written in the nature of man, and the true design of the Spirit's mission is to waken up a slumbering consciousness of Christianity already planted in the soul. Such doctrines lead to the rejection of every kind of outward revelation. Man is constituted his own Deity, and the instincts of his heart his only Bible.

INSUFFLATION, a part of the ceremony of EXORCISM (which see), both in the Greek and Romish churches.

INTENTION (DOCTRINE OF), a peculiar doctrine of the Church of Rome, which is thus stated by the council of Trent: "Whosoever shall affirm that when ministers perform and confer a sacrament, it is not necessary that they should have at least the intention to do what the church does: let him be accursed." Intention on the part of a minister in administering a sacrament, is defined by Deus to be "the act of his will, whereby he wills the external act of the sacrament under the profession of doing what the church does." The intention is distinguished into four kinds: actual, virtual, habitual, and interpretative. The two first are not considered as sufficient to the perfecting of a sacrament: but the two last are sufficient to render a sacrament complete and valid. The intention of doing what the church does is alleged by Deus to be fourfold: "(1.) The intention of doing merely an act of external ceremony, as it were formally undertaken, without any personal will of solemnizing a sacrament, or of doing what the church does. This intention is usually called merely external. (2.) The intention can be not only of externally performing the outward rite, but inwardly, and in the mind, of doing generally what the church doeth, whatever, in the meantime, the minister may think concerning the church itself. This intention is called internal. (3.) The intention of administering a sacrament of the true name as the Roman church does. (4.) The intention of conferring sacramental effects." As, according to the doctrines of the Church of Rome, the effect does not refer to the essence of a sacrament, the fourth of the different species of intention just enumerated is not absolutely necessary. It is enough if the minister intends to do what the church does, even though he may will not to confer the effect. Accordingly, a Protestant baptism is held by the Romish church to be valid, although the Protestant churches do not believe that grace is conferred by the sacraments. The mere external intention, however, is not sufficient; it must be accompanied also by the internal. But according to Deus, "a general, implied, and confused intention is enough, when it sufficiently determines to do those things externally, which belong to the sacramental action." It is in reference to this doctrine of intention as taught by the Church of Rome, that the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism declares, that the sacraments derive their efficacy "not from any virtue in them, or in him that doth administer them." The doctrine of intention makes the partaker of a sacrament dependent for the benefits of it on the administrator; and must render him utterly uncertain whether in any case it has or has not been effectual.

INTERCESSORS, an appellation anciently given to some bishops in the African councils. In the African churches, on a bishopric becoming vacant, it was usual for the primate to appoint one of the provincial bishops to be a sort of procurator of the diocese, partly to exercise a temporary supervision over the vacant see, and partly to promote the speedy election of a new bishop. Hence he had the name of Intercessor or Interventor. Such an office, from its very nature and the circumstances attending it, was very liable to abuse. In the fifth council of Carthage, accordingly, the African fathers passed a decree that no intercessor should continue in office longer than a year, and the more effectually to prevent corruption, an intercessor was prohibited from succeeding to the bishopric which he had temporarily filled, even although he should happen to be the choice of the people.

INTERCIDONA. See DEVEREA.

INTERCISI DIES, days among the ancient Romans, which were devoted partly to the worship of the gods, and partly to ordinary business.

INTERDICT, a public censure sometimes pronounced by the Church of Rome, whereby Divine service is prohibited to be performed in some particular city, district or kingdom. During an interdict the churches are closed, and no rite of religion is allowed to be performed except baptism and extreme unction. This strong ecclesiastical measure was occasionally resorted to by bishops in ancient times, in order to compel the delivering up of a criminal, but it was always disapproved. Thus Augustin blamed a bishop, called Auxilius, on account of a proceeding of this kind. The interdict which Hincmar, bishop of Laon, inflicted on his diocese in 869 was much disapproved, and removed by Hincmar of Rheims. It was first in the eleventh century that the more regular employment of this species of ecclesiastical censure commenced. Thus in A. D. 1031, in the province of Limousin, a synod interdicted certain predatory barons, who refused to take part in what was called the truce of God. "A public excommunication," to quote the description of Neander, "was pronounced on the entire province.

No person, except a clergyman, a beggar, or a child not above twelve years old, should receive burial according to the rites of the church, nor be conveyed for burial to another diocese. In all the churches divine service should be performed only in private; baptism should be imparted only when asked; the communion should be given only to the dying. No person should be able to hold a wedding while the interdict lasted. Mass should be celebrated only with closed doors. A universal mourning should prevail; the dress and mode of living should wear the appearance of a general penance, of a continuous season of fasting."

Interdicts have been frequently inflicted in France, Italy, Germany, and England. In 1170, Pope Alexander III. put all England under an interdict, forbidding the clergy to perform any part of Divine service, except baptizing infants, taking confessions, and giving absolution to dying penitents. In the following century, in the reign of King John, England was again laid under an interdict. The consequences of this Papal censure are thus described by Hume the historian: "The execution," says he, "was calculated to strike the senses in the highest degree, and to operate with irresistible force on the superstitious minds of the people. The nation was, of a sudden, deprived of all exterior exercise of its religion: the altars were despoiled of their ornaments; the crosses, the relics, the images, the statues of the saints, were laid on the ground; and as if the air itself were profaned, and might pollute them by its contact, the priests carefully covered them up, even from their own approach and veneration. The use of bells entirely ceased in all the churches; the bells themselves were removed from the steeples, and laid on the ground with the other sacred utensils. Mass was celebrated with closed doors, and none but the priests were admitted to that holy institution. The laity partook of no religious rite, except the communion to the dying; the dead were not interred in consecrated ground; they were thrown into ditches, or buried in common fields, and their obsequies were not attended with prayers, or any hallowed ceremony. Marriage was celebrated in the churchyard, and that every action in life might bear the marks of this dreadful situation, the people were prohibited the use of meat, as in Lent, or times of the highest penance; were debarred from all pleasures and entertainments, and were forbidden even to salute each other, or so much as to shave their beards, and give any decent attention to their apparel. Every circumstance carried symptoms of the deepest distress, and of the most immediate apprehension of divine vengeance and indignation."

INTERIM. See ADIAPHORISTS.

INTERMEDIATE STATES, subterranean regions believed by the scholastic theologians of the middle ages to occupy a middle place between heaven and hell. These intermediate localities are subdivided into I. PURGATORY (which see), which is nearest to hell. 2. The LIMBUS INFANTUM (which see), where all those children remain who die unbaptized. 3. The LIMBUS PATRUM (which see), the abode of the Old Testament saints where Christ went to preach to the spirits in prison. These intermediate states have been adopted from the schoolmen by the Church of Rome, but they are unanimously rejected by the Protestant churches, and also by the Greek theologians, who, however, some of them, admit the existence of an intermediate state of the departed; but the Greek church herself determines nothing dogmatically about the state of the dead. The Jews believe that after death the soul is refused admittance either into a place of happiness or misery until the body is committed to the grave. Many of the Rabbis maintain, that all departed souls travel between heaven and earth for the space of twelve months; that they often hover about the graves where their bodies are interred; and that during this time they are subjected to the powers of the air which break their bones in the grave, and reduce them to dust.

Some modern writers hold the doctrine of an intermediate state, of a nature, however, altogether different from the purgatory of the Romish church. Thus Jung Stilling, in his 'Geisterkunde,' says, "If the departed spirit who has left this world in a state of imperfect holiness, carries with him some elements which he is not permitted to introduce into the heavenly regions, he must remain in Hades until he has put away all that is impure; but he does not suffer pain, excepting that of which he himself is the cause. The true sufferings in Hades are the desires still adhering to the soul for the pleasures of this world." Swedenborg maintains that between heaven and hell there is an intermediate place called the world of spirits, into which every man goes immediately after death; and that the intercourse which there takes place between the departed spirits is similar to that which men carry on upon earth.

INTERMENT. See FUNERAL RITES.

INTERNUNTIVUS, a messenger or representative of the Pope sent to small foreign courts. A papal ambassador sent to kings or emperors is called Nuntius or Nuncio.

INTERPRETERS. See HERMENEUTÆ.

INTERSTITIA, a term used in ancient ecclesiastical law, to denote the degrees by which an ecclesiastic might ascend to the higher spiritual offices.

INTONSUS (Lat. unshorn), an epithet applied to Apollo and Bacchus, referring to their immortal youth, as the Greeks never cut their hair till they had reached the years of manhood.

INTROITO (Lat. I will go in), part of the fifth verse of the forty-second Psalm in the Vulgate version, and the forty-third of the authorized version. It is with this word that the Romish priest at the foot or the altar, after having made the sign of the cross, begins the mass, on which the servitor responds, by repeating the rest of the verse. The whole Psalm is then repeated alternately by the priest and the servitor. In masses for the dead, and during passion-week, this Psalm is not used.

INTROIT. In the ancient church, and in the Church of England, in the time of Edward VI., it was customary to sing or chant a psalm immediately before the collect, epistle, and gospel. As this took place while the priest was entering within the rails of the altar, it received the name of Introit or entrance. This name is also applied by Aquinas to the first part or preparation of the Mass, beginning at the Introibo, and ending with the Epistle exclusively.

INTUITIONISTS. a name given to that modern class of thinkers, both in Germany and in England, who are accustomed to put implicit faith in the primary intuitions, or intellectual and moral instincts of the human soul, and to substitute the inward revelation of the heart for the outward revelation of the Written Word. This peculiar species of infidelity very early appeared in the Christian church, under the guise of a high spiritualism. Though existing for some time previously, it was first developed plainly in the apocryphal book called the Clementines, or the eighteen Homilies, where all Divine revelation is said to have commenced with the primal spirit of Humanity, which was the Spirit of God in Adam; and every future revelation has been simply a repetition, or rather a restoration of the primitive truth. The early Gnostics also boasted of the name of spiritualists, and regarded themselves as exalted by intuition far above the sphere of faith. It is not a little remarkable, that this very ground—the raising of intuition above outward revelation—was taken by Celsus and other early opponents of Christianity, who strenuously maintained that nowhere without us could more enlarged or accurate views of God and truth be obtained than by searching the inward recesses of the human mind and heart. Some of the Neo-Platonists were somewhat inclined to adopt this sentiment.

It was after the Reformation, however, that a class of intuitionists began to denounce boldly all dependence on an objective revelation. Servetus and others belonged to this school. But it was in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that an intelligent and influential body of Intuitionists appeared in England desirous to put an end to Christianity, by leading men back to the religion of nature and the fundamental teachings of the inward man. Lord Herbert of Cherbury, in the reign of Charles the First, led the way, and professed to found a universal religion, which the whole world would recognize as true. He was followed by others, who made no secret of their design to destroy the credibility of the Bible, and to set up a religion of intuitions. Thus Tindal, in his 'Christianity as Old as the Creation,' attempts to show, that there neither is, nor can be, any external revelation at all distinct from the internal revelation of the law of nature in the hearts of all mankind. To those who were in favour of an outward revelation, he gave the contemptuous name of Demonists. Various writers in England, France, and Germany followed in the same track until the Intuitionists became an influential body. But the champions of Christianity triumphed, and infidelity, even though defended by men of high intelligence, such as Hume, Bolingbroke, and Gibbon, was completely silenced.

A reverence for intuitions, however, and the instincts of the human spirit, as forming the only true revelation, has once more made its appearance both in this country and in America. The most able representative of this modern school of Intuitionists, is Ralph Waldo Emerson, a man of undoubted talent, but with a genius of a dreamy, vague, unpractical cast. He professes to be the champion of the soul of man against Christians and the Bible. "The relations of the soul," says he, "to the Divine Spirit are so pure that it is profane to seek to interpose helps. It must be that when God speaketh, he should communicate not one thing, but all things; should fill the world with his voice; should scatter forth light, nature, time, souls from the centre of the present thought; and new-date and new-create the whole. Whenever a mind is simple, and receives a divine wisdom, then old things pass away—means, teachers, texts, temples fall; it lives now and absorbs past and future into the present hour. All things are made sacred by relation to it,—one thing as much as another. All things are dissolved to their centre by this cause, and in the universal miracle petty and particular miracles disappear. This is and must be. If, therefore, a man claims to know and speak of God, and carries you backward to the phraseology of some old mouldered nation in another country, in another world, believe him not. Is the acorn better than the oak which is its fullness and completion? Is the parent better than the child into whom he has cast his being? Whence then this worship of the past? The centuries are conspirators against the sanity and majesty of the soul. Time and space are but physiological colours which the eye maketh, but the soul is light; where it is, is day; where it was, is night; and history is an impertinence and an injury, if it be anything more than a cheerful apologue or parable of my being and becoming."

With this apostle of intuitionism, man is at once a God, a Saviour, and a Bible to himself. Nought else is necessary but man and his own inward promptings. "In the soul," declares Emerson, addressing a class of students in theology, "let the redemption be sought. Wherever a man comes there comes revolution. The old is for slaves. When a man comes all books are legible, all things transparent, all religions are forms. He is religious. Man is the wonder-worker. He is seen amid miracles. All men bless and curse. He saith yea and nay, only. The stationariness of religion; the assumption tion that the age of inspiration is past, that the Bible is closed; the fear of degrading the character of Jesus by representing him as a man; indicate with sufficient clearness the falsehood of our theology. It is the office of a true teacher to show us that God is, not was; that he speaketh, not spake. The true Christianity—a faith like Christ's in the infinitude of man—is lost. None believeth in the soul of man, but only in some man or person old and departed. Ah me! no man goeth alone. All men go in flocks to this saint or that poet, avoiding the God who seeth in secret. They cannot see in secret; they love to be blind in public. They think society wiser than their soul, and know not that one soul, and their soul, is wiser than the whole world. See how nations and races flit bye on the sea of time, and leave no ripple to tell where they floated or sunk, and one good soul shall make the name of Moses, or of Zeno, or of Zoroaster, reverend for ever. None assayeth the stern ambition to be the Self of the nation, and of Nature, but each would be an easy secondary to some Christian scheme, or sectarian connection, or some eminent man. Once leave your own knowledge of God, your own sentiment, and take secondary knowledge, as St. Paul's, or George Fox's, or Swedenborg's, and you get wide from God with every year this secondary form lasts, and if, as now, for centuries—the chasm yawns to that breadth that men can scarcely be convinced there is in them anything divine."

The intuitionists, led on by Emerson, are nearly allied to, if not identical with, the adherents of the Religion of Humanity, headed by Theodore Parker. The latter, perhaps, admit more of the objective than the former. Emerson holds to man, and man alone, but Parker combines the outward universe with man. "Not in nature, but in man," cries Emerson, "is all the beauty and worth that he sees. The world is very empty, and is indebted to this gilding, exalting soul for all its pride. Earth fills her lap with splendours not her own." "The Absolute Religion," says Parker, "is derived from the real revelation, God, which is contained in the universe, this outward universe of matter, this inward universe of man." Both systems are alike opposed to a written revelation, as being in their view unnecessary. But it unfortunately happens, that all which is made known to us either by our inward intuitions or the outward universe, falls far short of what the Bible, and the Bible alone reveals to us.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS (FESTIVAL OF THE), a festival of the Romish church, celebrated annually on the 3d of May, in honour of the alleged discovery of the true cross by Helena the mother of the Emperor Constantine. This festival was instituted in the fifth, or more probably in the sixth century. See Cross.

INVESTITURE, the rite in the Romish church of inaugurating bishops and abbots, by investing them with the ring and crosier, or staff, as the symbols of office; the ring being a token of their espousal to the church, and the staff of their pastoral duties as the shepherds of the flock. The custom seems to have been introduced in the seventh century, of presenting the clergy on ordination with the badges or insignia of their office, which varied of course according to the ministerial functions which they were bound to discharge. But the mode of inaugurating bishops or abbots was first practised probably towards the end of the tenth or beginning of the eleventh century, when the emperors and kings assumed to themselves the power of conferring, and even of selling, sacred offices. In such cases they gave to the bishop or abbot whom they appointed, written instruments, green twigs, and other things. Then followed the practice of giving a ring and a staff. The clergy who claimed by law the right of electing their bishops and abbots, were of course unwilling to surrender their privilege into other hands, and therefore, they resorted to an expedient which they found to be most effectual in defeating the designs of the emperors and kings. As soon as their bishop or abbot was dead, they hastily elected another and consecrated him, and thus the emperor or king was reduced to the necessity of confirming the ecclesiastic who had already been formally consecrated. Numerous cases of this kind are to be found in the records of the tenth century. To prevent the clergy from thus trenching on what the sovereigns regarded as their right of investiture, they required the insignia of the episcopal office, namely, the ring and the staff, to be transmitted to them immediately after the death of a bishop. By this means consecration was rendered impossible, as, according to ecclesiastical law, official power is conveyed by delivering the staff and ring; and every election till it had been ratified by consecration, could be set aside without violation of ecclesiastical law; nor could a bishop, though elected, perform any episcopal function till he was consecrated.

The whole power of a sovereign over his bishops and clergy depended on his possessing the right of investiture, which indeed was the universally recognized sign of feudal sovereignty on the one side, and of allegiance on the other. In the eleventh century, accordingly, when Gregory VII., generally known by the name of Hildebrand, wished to increase the power of the clergy, and to diminish the power of temporal princes, he could think of no better expedient for accomplishing both purposes than the publication of his celebrated decree, by which all clergymen were forbidden under penalty of deprivation to receive investiture of a bishopric, abbey, or any ecclesiastical office at the hands of a layman; while all laymen without exception were forbidden to grant investiture to a spiritual person, under pain of excommunication. This decree Gregory sent into all kingdoms, especially into France, Germany, England, and Spain, urging as his ostensible reason for prohibiting lay investitures his desire to put an end to the practice of simony. The real object of the ambitious Pontiff was to render the Church entirely independent of the State, and to deprive the civil rulers of all influence, direct or indirect, in the affairs of the church.

From this decree of Gregory must be dated the commencement of a conflict on the subject of investiture between the Popes and Emperors, which lasted for half-a-century. The right which the Pope thus invaded had belonged to temporal princes for a long period, and had often been distinctly recognized by Popes themselves. It was not to be expected that they would surrender so important a privilege without a struggle. At first they treated the decree with the utmost contempt, taking no notice of it, and proceeding with investitures as before. The wily pontiff foresaw the opposition which his measures would encounter both from temporal princes and many of the clergy. But Gregory was not a man to be easily frightened. Henry IV., the emperor of Germany, having persisted in defiance of the papal decree in appointing bishops and abbots, the Pope summoned him to appear at Rome and answer to the charges made against him. Instead of obeying the papal summons, however, the Emperor called a convention of German bishops to meet at Worms, and there proceeded to depose Gregory from his office as Pope. No sooner did intelligence of this bold act reach Rome, than a bull was issued from the Vatican, excommunicating Henry, deposing him from the throne, and absolving his subjects from their oath of allegiance. It was unfortunate for Henry that a considerable portion of his people, including the Swabians and Saxons, in obedience to the papal decree threw off their allegiance to Henry, who, alarmed at the storm of disaffection which had thus been raised in his kingdom, repaired to Rome to implore the forgiveness of the pontiff. Gregory was then residing at the castle of Canossa, and on the arrival of the emperor, instead of affording him an immediate audience, he kept him standing for three days together, in the depth of winter, barefooted, and bareheaded, and meanly clad, within the walls of the castle, professing himself a penitent. The humiliation of the emperor was flattering to the pride of the Pope, and, therefore, with the utmost haughtiness he refused to deliver Henry from the ban of the church, reproaching him with the utmost severity for resisting the will of the earthly head of the church. At length, on the fourth day, he admitted the king into his presence, and gave him absolution on condition that, in the meantime, he should renounce the government, and if he should ever obtain it again, that he should support the Pope in everything requisite for the maintenance of the ecclesiastical laws. Henry broke his pledge, resumed the regal power, and, during the rest of Gregory's life, an incessant war was maintained between the emperor and the Pope.

After the death of Gregory, who is venerated as a saint by the Church of Rome, though he was never formally canonized, the papal chair was occupied by Victor III., who, after a brief pontificate, was succeeded by Urban II. This pontiff, animated by the spirit of Gregory, not only renewed that Pope's decree concerning lay investitures, but he proceeded to take active steps to inflict punishment on those sovereigns who dared to violate it. Henry I., who then sat upon the throne of England, was one of the first to incur the papal resentment, having banished Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, from the kingdom, because he insisted upon fetching his pall from Rome, and receiving it at the hands of the Pope. Urban was indignant, and was only prevented from publicly excommunicating the English sovereign by the earnest entreaties of Anselm himself. Nay, not contented with renewing the decree of Gregory, prohibiting lay investitures, he advanced a step further, and at the council of Clermont, he caused it to be laid down broadly and universally as a new law, that no ecclesiastic should take the oath of fealty to a layman. This act completed what Gregory, doubtless, had in view from the very commencement of the controversy on investitures—the dissolution of all feudal connection between the church and the state.

Urban II. died in 1099, and was succeeded by Rainerius, a cardinal of the Gregorian party, who took the title of Paschal II. The emperor of Germany was still granting investitures as formerly in utter defiance of the papal decrees, and was living in total disregard of the sentence of excommunication which had been passed against him. To put an end to this rebellion against the authority of the church, the new Pope endeavoured to instigate Henry's subjects to renounce allegiance to their sovereign, and so well did he succeed in his object, that Henry's second son raised the standard of rebellion against his father in 1105. From the manifesto which the young prince issued in vindication of his conduct, the only charge brought against the emperor was, that he had caused a schism in the church, and had refused obedience to the Pope. The rebellion was successful, the emperor having resigned, and his son having been elected and crowned king.

Henry V. commenced his reign, by vowing submission to the Holy See; and the Pope, to display a clement and conciliatory spirit, while he confirmed the election of the new king, coupled his renewed sanction of the decree against lay investitures, with the declaration of an universal amnesty for all past offences. No sooner, however, had Henry ascended his father's throne than he threw off the mask which for his own selfish purposes, he had assumed, and despatched an embassy to the Pope, declaring that he intended to proceed in future with the investiture of bishops, notwithstanding his former promises. A war now commenced between Henry and the Pope. The emperor marched into Italy in 1110 at the head of an army of 30,000 men, demanding the consent of the Pope to crown him emperor, and formally to recognize his right of granting investitures. Paschal did not find himself in a situation to resist Henry and his forces; he therefore proposed to adjust matters by a compromise, agreeing to allow the emperor to resume all those possessions and regalia with which he had formerly invested the bishops and abbots of his dominions. The proposal was accepted by the king, and the compact was solemnly confirmed by oath, Henry agreeing to renounce the right of investiture on the day of his coronation, and the Pope agreeing to command all bishops and abbots to restore whatever property had been granted to them since the days of Charlemagne. Henry now repaired to Rome, accompanied by a train of German and Lombard bishops, who, instead of giving their assent to the compact, attacked the Pope, charging him with having helped himself in his necessity at their expense. The Pope, beset both by the clergy and the imperial princes, was obliged to consent to the coronation; but having hesitated about recognizing the emperor's right of investiture, his holiness was seized as a prisoner, and carried away; whereupon he entirely yielded, and a new compact was entered into granting to the emperor in future full right of investiture. Paschal was accordingly set at liberty, and Henry returned in triumph to Germany, having gained the point which had been so long contested between the emperors and the Popes.

After the departure of the emperor from Rome, the Pope, in a Lateran council A. D. 1112, revoked all the concessions which had been extorted from him, and annulled the compact which had been made between Henry and himself. Yet even this step did not satisfy the adherents of the Gregorian party, and to allay their clamours, the Pope found himself, after a time, compelled to pronounce sentence of excommunication against the emperor. The same sentence was afterwards passed by Calixtus II., who gave a fresh sanction to the decrees against investiture. The estates of Germany now became urgent for a reconciliation between the emperor and the Pope, and chiefly through their exertions the celebrated concordat of Worms was agreed to on the 23d of September 1122, and ratified in the following year by a general council in the Lateran palace at Rome. This was the first œcumenical or general council held in the West: it is reckoned by the Church of Rome the ninth general council. The nature of the treaty made at Worms between the emperor and the Pope, is thus briefly described by Mr. Riddle, in his 'History of the Papacy': "By this concordat, the emperor bound himself to maintain perpetual peace with the popes, and to restore to the Church of Rome and all the churches in his dominions whatever property had been taken from them,—promising also that there should be in future no interference with the free elections of bishops and abbots,—and undertaking not to grant investiture with the crosier and ring. In return for this, the Pope conceded the following particulars: 1. That all elections of bishops and abbots in the German empire should take place only in the presence of the emperor, or his deputies or commissioners, but without simony; in case of a disputed election, the emperor to decide in favour of the candidate who should be declared duly elected by the metropolitans and bishops of the province. 2. The elect to be invested with his temporalities at the imperial court by the sceptre only, without the crosier and ring, and to pledge himself to fulfil all his obligations to the emperor and the state. 3. With reference to bishops within the empire, but beyond the limits of Germany, the same regulations should take place, but with this limitation, that such investitures should be performed within six months from the date of consecration." Thus terminated the fifty years' struggle between the popes and the emperors of Germany on the right of investiture.

The contest, however, had not been confined to Germany; it was carried on also in other countries, particularly in England and France. The first who raised the standard of independence as a churchman against the sovereign in England was Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, who was sent into exile, but after a time, at the earnest solicitation of the king's sister, was permitted to return to England, and to resume possession of his see. The controversy between Henry and the Pope was not of long continuance, as the king consented to forego his right of investiture with crosier and ring, but insisted upon his right to demand the oath of allegiance to be taken by all ecclesiastics. This practice, accordingly, was from that period established as the law of England, the king being recognized as having a right of sovereignty over all persons ecclesiastical as well as civil.

In the same manner, but after a shorter struggle, the controversy was settled in France. The first who refused the oath of fealty to the French king was Rodolph, archbishop of Rheims, who, having been elected to his office in 1106, proceeded to contest the matter with the king, Philip I. The Pope, Paschal II., happening to be in France while the controversy was raging, himself consecrated Rodolph at a council which he held at Troyes. In the following year Philip died, and was succeeded by Louis VI., who agreed to recognize the election of Rodolph, provided he would take the oath of allegiance, a condition which was readily assented to, and the dispute terminated. In a council at Rheims in 1119, the Pope, Calixtus II., insisted upon a renewal of the decrees against lay investitures, but Louis with equal firmness insisted upon a reservation of all the rights which the king of France had hitherto exercised in the case of bishops and their sees. Investitures with crosier and ring had for some time fallen into disuse in France, and the king made no opposition to its final prohibition. Louis VI., and the succeeding kings of France, distinctly recognized the freedom of episcopal elections, renouncing the right of nominating to bishoprics which had been formerly exercised by the French sovereign. But to the end of the twelfth century, the custom remained unchanged of asking the royal permission before proceeding to the election of a bishop for any vacant see.

INVIDIA, the personification of Envy, a goddess among the ancient Romans. She was considered to be the daughter of Pallas and Styx.

INVISIBILITY, an attribute ascribed to God in the Sacred Scriptures. Thus he is styled by the apostle Paul, "the King eternal, immortal, invisible;" "whom no man hath seen, nor can see." "No man," said Jesus, "hath seen the Father at any time." He is therefore the invisible God. Were he the object of sight, he must be limited, confined to a certain, determinate portion of space; in short, he would cease to be the Infinite God.

INVISIBLES, a name given to those at the period of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, who, like Osiander, Schwenkfeld, and others, denied the perpetual visibility of the church.

INVITATORY PSALM, a psalm, usually the thirty-fourth, which was sung in the ancient Christian church before commencing the dispensation of the Lord's Supper. It was an invitation to participate of the communion, and was a distinct psalm from those which were sung afterwards while the people were communicating.

IO, a priestess of Hera at Argos, whose worship is said to have been founded by her father Inachus. Zeus is reported to have fixed his affections upon Io, and on account of Hera's jealousy, to have changed her into a white cow. Hera sought the cow from Zeus, and having obtained her, committed her to the care of Argus, who, however, was slain by Hermes, and Io delivered. Hera then despatched a gad-fly to torment Io, who, after being driven through the whole earth, found a resting-place in Egypt. She is said to have founded the worship of the Egyptian goddess Isis, and by some believed to be identical with her, while her son Epaphus, by Jupiter, was, according to Herodotus, an Egyptian deity, to whom bulls were sacred. The ancients believed Io to be the moon, which indeed among the Argives received the name of Io.

IONIC SCHOOL, the earliest of the schools of philosophy in ancient Greece. It was founded by Thales of Miletum, who lived about B. C. 600. His researches were more of a physical than a metaphysical character, and were chiefly directed to the primitive formation of the universe. From observation Thales was led to believe in the existence of two fundamental principles—a pre-existing, uncreated matter, and an intelligent principle or soul. The primary matter he supposed to be in a state of fluidity, and hence he is usually represented as teaching that water is the original or elementary principle of things. From the operation of the intelligent principle upon matter, or the primary fluid, resulted the formation of the universe. Both Ritter and Cousin charge Thales, who is well entitled to be called the Father of Greek philosophy, with atheism, but instead of considering this weighty charge as borne out by his opinions, we would be inclined rather to view the intelligent principle or nous, which he considered as necessary to the creation of the universe, to be, if not a full recognition of God, at all events, "a feeling after him, if haply he might find him."

The successors of Thales in the Ionic school were Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Anaxagoras. Anaximander seems to have deviated entirely from the opinions of Thales, laying aside as unnecessary the notion of an intelligent principle, and seeking only to find a material explanation of the creation of all things. With this view, instead of water or fluid matter, he substituted what he called the infinite, which by its eternal motion produced individual things. Creation was with him the decomposition of the Infinite; the emanation of separate phenomena from the all-comprehending Infinite. Anaximenes made air, not water, the original of all things, and in this notion he was followed by Diogenes of Apollonia, who, however, gave it life and intelligence. Anaxagoras, again, the philosopher of Clazomene, restored the views of Thales, maintaining matter to be the subject of form, and intelligence the active principle of forms. The union of these constituted in his opinion the first principle of the universe. Thus Anaxagoras more clearly developed and strictly demonstrated what Thales had only obscurely hinted at—the idea of God. He also developed the primitive matter which he believed to consist of primitive elements, called by him homœomerie or similar parts. Not that he believed the elements to be similar to each other, but similar to the qualities which, by our senses, we discover in different sorts of bodies. The system of Anaxagoras was to a certain extent an anticipation of the Atomic theory of modern times, all phenomena being regarded as the result of the combination in different degrees and in various proportions of these original elements.

IODAMEIA, a priestess of Athena, who on one occasion, as she was entering the temple of the goddess by night, was changed into a block of stone on seeing the head of Medusa, which was worked in the garment of the goddess. In commemoration of this event, a fire was kindled every day upon the altar of Iodameia, and the exclamation, "Iodameia lives, and demands fire."

IONIDES, four nymphs possessed of healing powers, who had a temple reared in honour of them on the river Cytherus in Elis.

IPHIGENEIA, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Her father having offended Artemis from some cause or other, probably from failing to fulfil a vow which he had made, was warned that the goddess would only be propitiated by the sacrifice of Iphigeneia. Agamemnon was most unwilling to discharge so painful a duty, but at length he was prevailed upon to yield, but before the sacrifice was performed, Artemis carried off Iphigeneia to Tauris, conferring upon her the honour of officiating as a priestess at her shrine. While thus engaged, her brother had formed the plan of sacrilegiously stealing and carrying to Attica the statue of Artemis in Tauris, which was believed to have fallen from heaven. For this crime, Orestes was about to be sacrificed on the altar of the goddess, but Iphigeneia recognizing him as her brother, saved him from death, and fled with him and the statue of the goddess, to the Attic town of Brauron near Marathon, where she continued till her death to act as priestess of Artemis. She was held in veneration after death, the garments worn by women who died in childbirth being offered up to her. Iphigeneia, under the name of Artemis Orthia, was worshipped as a goddess in Attica and Laedæmon. Both Pausanias and Herodotus say that the Taurians offered sacrifices to Iphigeneia the daughter of Agamemnon.

IPHITHIME, one of the Nereides, and the mother of the Satyrs, in ancient Greek mythology.

IRELAND (CHRISTIANITY IN). Christianity is supposed to have been introduced into Ireland in the course of the fifth century by Patricius or St. Patrick, who appears to have been the first instrument of planting the Christian church in that country. Considerable obscurity, and even doubt, however, has been thrown over the labours, and even the very existence, of this reputed apostle of the Irish. From ancient legends, it appears, that even prior to the mission of Patrick to Ireland, Pope Cælestinus had sent Palladius to that country, having ordained him as a bishop to the Scots, by whom may have been meant the Irish. The Romish missionary being unacquainted with the language of the people, did little or no good, and his labours besides were brought to a close by his premature decease. Romish writers are wont to allege that Patrick obtained his powers and authority as a Christian missionary from the Papal see, but this notion is rendered very improbable by the well-known fact, that for a considerable period of its early history, the Irish church, like the ancient British church, preserved an entire independence of Rome.

Patrick, according to Ussher, was a native of the West of Scotland, having been born in a village between Dumbarton and Glasgow, which has received from him the name of Kilpatrick. Other and more recent authorities make him a native of Boulogne in ancient Britanny in Gaul. While yet a youth, he was carried off by pirates to the North of Ireland, where he was sold as a bondman to a chieftain of the district, who employed him in tending his flocks. During the six years which he spent in this service, he became familiar with the Irish language, and deeply interested in the Irish people. Having effecting his escape from bondage, he returned to Scotland, or, as some allege, to Gaul. At a later period, he was seized with an irrepressible desire to revisit Ireland, and to consecrate his life to the service of God among the Irish people. It would appear from his published confession, that in his forty-fifth year he was consecrated to the episcopal office in Britain, and commenced his mission to Ireland in A. D. 432. The country had for ages been the seat of Pagan idolatry, and the DRUIDS (which see) exercised, in virtue of their priesthood, an unlimited authority and influence over the people. The old annalists, it is true, tell us of Cormac O'Conn, one of their princes in the fourth century, who first taught his subjects to despise the pagan rites. But however much the Druidical order may have declined in importance before the arrival of Patrick, his first attempts to diffuse Christian knowledge among the people met with the most powerful resistance from these pagan priests. Yet amid all opposition, the zealous devoted missionary relaxed not in his efforts. Possessing an intimate acquaintance with the customs and the language of the country, he prosecuted his great work with unwearied diligence, among all classes of society. Nor were his labours without manifest success. Several of the Irish chieftains became converts to Christianity, and in gratitude to their spiritual instructor, they conveyed over to him portions of their lands which he used as sites for the erection of monasteries. These he designed to be schools in which priests might be trained for the evangelization of the Irish people. As a fundamental means of imparting knowledge, he is said to have invented an alphabetical character for the Irish language. He preached to the people in their native tongue, and according to Archbishop Ussher, the doctrines which he taught were free from the errors of the Church of Rome. In 472, he established at Armagh the see of an archbishop.

The benefit of Patrick's labours in Ireland long survived him. He left behind him at his death in A. D. 492, a band of well-educated, devoted men, who sought to follow in the footsteps of their master. Drawing their own knowledge of the truth from the Holy Scriptures, they referred the people to the same source of infallible teaching; and planting throughout the country monasteries and missionary schools, the fame of Ireland as the seat of pure Scriptural teaching soon rose so high, that it received the honourable appellation of "the Isle of Saints." And on the testimony of Bede, we learn, that about the middle of the seventh century, many of the Anglo-Saxon nobles and clergy repaired to Ireland, either for instruction or for an opportunity of living in monasteries of a stricter discipline; and the Scots, as he terms the Irish, maintained them, taught them, and furnished them with books without fee or reward.

The labours of the Irish clergy, however, were not confined to their own country, but missionaries were dispatched both to Britain and the Continent, to spread the knowledge of the gospel of Christ. The Culdees of Iona owed their origin as a Christian community to the preaching of the Irish apostle Columba. Burgundy, Germany, the Low Countries, and other parts of the Continent of Europe, were mainly indebted to Irish missionaries for their first acquaintance with Divine truth. The Irish divines in the eighth century held a high character for learning, and Charlemagne, emperor of Germany, himself a man of letters, invited to his court various eminent scholars from different countries, but especially from Ireland. For a long period, from its first foundation, indeed, until the middle of the twelfth century, the Church of Ireland continued to assert its independence of Rome, and to maintain its position as an active, living branch of the Church of Christ, owning no earthly head, but faithfully discharging its heavenly Master's work, and obeying his will. Various attempts were, no doubt, made by Roman pontiffs to subject the Irish church to papal domination; but without success. At length, in 1155, Pope Adrian IV., assuming to himself authority over Ireland, published a bull, making a grant of it to Henry II., king of England. The ground on which the Pope rested his right to make this grant, was thus expressed in the body of it: "For it is undeniable, and your majesty acknowledges it, that all islands on which Christ the Sun of Righteousness hath shined, and which have received the Christian faith, belong of right to St. Peter and the most holy Roman church."

From this period the Irish church came to be essentially Romish in its doctrines, constitution, and discipline. At one time it was said to have been so flourishing, that it had no fewer than three hundred bishops; but in a national synod, held in 1152, only three years before the submission of the church to the see of Rome, the number amounted to thirty-four, and before the Reformation, in the sixteenth century, a number of these had disappeared.

The interference of the popes with the Irish church was limited, for half a century, almost exclusively to the bestowing of pallis on the archbishops as the sees happened to become vacant. But at length, in 1172, Henry completed his conquest of Ireland, when the clergy in synod convened, directed that the divine service in the Church of Ireland should, for the future, be in all things conformable to that of the Church of England. In 1177, an assembly of the Irish clergy was convened at Waterford, in which Henry's title to the sovereign dominion of Ireland was formally asserted and declared, with the most dreadful denunciations of the severest censures of the church against all who should dispute his rightful authority. To maintain his sovereignty over the Irish clergy, Henry filled up the vacant sees mostly with Englishmen favourable to his interests, and the consequence was, that a spirit of jealousy, and even of bitter hostility, began to be manifested between the English and the Irish ecclesiastics. At length, when John succeeded to the throne of England, this animosity, which had long been smouldering, burst forth into a flame. The archbishopric of Armagh being vacant, the king asserted his privilege, and nominated an Englishman, Humphry de Tieknull, to the see. But the suffragan bishops, and some clergy of the diocese, proceeded, without regard to the royal mandate, to elect Eugene MacGillivider, one of their own countrymen. John, enraged at this infringement of his prerogative, addressed an appeal to the Irish legate against the irregular election: while Eugene, meanwhile, repaired to Rome, and was confirmed by the Pope. Still more incensed at this open defiance of his authority, the king prohibited the reception of Eugene by the clergy of Armagh. The contest was protracted for a considerable time, the clergy adhering to the Pope and Eugene; the king insisting on his privilege, and withholding the temporalities of the see. Through the influence of a bribe, however, John was prevailed upon to yield, and Eugene was formally invested with all the rights of the see, and the Pope's authority fully conceded.

The Pope now occupied a firm vantage ground, in so far as Ireland was concerned, and although the king and the clergy were often at variance on the subject of nominations to vacant sees, the Pope did not fail to take advantage of his improved position to settle all such disputes, by thrusting in some creature of his own in utter disregard of the alleged claims of both the contending parties. The papal encroachments were tamely submitted to, and both the civil and spiritual rights of the Irish prelates were at the entire disposal of the Roman pontiff. Henry III., with the concurrence of the Pope, made the most oppressive demands upon the Irish clergy, exacting, in 1226, a fifteenth of all cathedral churches and religious houses, and a sixteenth of all other ecclesiastical revenues. Attempts were also made to overspread the kingdom with Italian ecclesiastics, who, though luxuriously fattening upon the revenues of the Irish church, refused to discharge their clerical functions, or even to reside in the country which they pillaged by their extortions. Besides, the Irish clergy, who possessed the most exalted views of the superior excellence of their own church, were not a little offended by some of the most worthless of their English brethren seeking refuge in the Church of Ireland. Indignant at the intrusion of these aliens into a church which could look back upon a long catalogue of holy and devoted men, they passed a strong ordinance that no Englishman should be admitted or received into a benefice in any one of the Irish churches. At the request of Henry, the Pope interfered, commanding this ordinance to be formally rescinded within the space of one month, and in case of a refusal threatening himself to rescind it, and to declare it null and void. The constant tendency of the clergy in Ireland, indeed, during the thirteenth century, was to encroach on the jurisdiction of the civil power, and to extend the authority of the spiritual courts over matters which rightfully belonged to the courts of civil and criminal law. And even on points which were included within the jurisdiction of the spiritual courts, it sometimes happened that the canon law was at variance with the law of the land. This was particularly the case with the law of bastardy. According to the common law, a person born before lawful wedlock was incapable of inheriting property, whereas, according to canon law, he possessed all the privileges of a regular heir. This was in great danger of leading to a collision between the civil and spiritual courts. But to prevent such an unhappy result, it was resolved to limit the spiritual courts to the investigation of the simple point of fact, whether the person was or was not born before lawful wedlock, the legal rights of the party being left exclusively in the hands of the civil courts.

For two centuries before the Reformation incessant contests were carried on between the Irish clergy and the English sovereigns, both parties struggling for supremacy in ecclesiastical matters. Not that they sought the spiritual independence of the church, for, indeed, they sought nothing more than to transfer their allegiance as churchmen from the sovereign of England to the Pope of Rome. They were content to bow implicitly in submission to the papal authority. The power of the church and the privileges of the clergy were carried to an extravagant extent. Clerical debtors claimed to be exempted from arrest, and their properties from being taxed, without their own consent. The clergy exercised the right of pardoning felons within their own dioceses, or commuted their punishment for money. They engaged in the most unseemly disputes with one another, and sometimes even settled their quarrels by single combat. The church revenues were, in many cases, utterly inadequate for the support of the clergy, and in proportion to their poverty they were rapacious and oppressive. Exorbitant demands were made for the performance of religious offices. Ecclesiastical censures were commuted for money. Indulgences were sold, and every opportunity was seized of extorting money from the people. Instead of being examples to their flocks of every good work, the priesthood almost universally was notorious for the most shameless profligacy. With a clergy both ignorant and dissolute, true piety was, of course, well nigh a stranger in the land, while its place was occupied by the grossest superstition. Nearly six hundred monastic establishments, belonging to eighteen different orders, were scattered over the entire face of the country. Ghostly friars, black, white, and grey, swarmed in countless multitudes, practising upon the credulity of an ignorant and deluded people. Crowds of Irish pilgrims resorted to Italy, Spain, and other popish countries, many of whom perished by the way. At home, also, immense numbers were persuaded annually to visit St. Patrick's purgatory at Lough Derg, in the county of Donegal, in the expectation that penances performed at that privileged station would purge away even the deadliest sins. Such were the impositions practised by the priests at this celebrated place, that the Pope ordered its demolition in the fifteenth century. In the face, however, of a distinct prohibition from the Roman pontiff himself, the station at Lough Derg continues to this day to be a place of favourite resort to the deluded victims of Romish superstition.

To such a state of degradation was the Irish church reduced before the light of the glorious Reformation dawned upon the once far-famed "Island of the Saints." Darkness, indeed, covered the land, and gross darkness the people. Both the clergy and the laity had thrown off not the restraints of religion alone, but even of morality and common decency. No wonder, therefore, that the spirit of religious inquiry, which so rapidly spread throughout all the other countries of Europe in the sixteenth century, should have found a greater difficulty than anywhere else in effecting a lodgment for itself in the minds of the people of Ireland.

IRIS, mentioned by Homer as the minister of the gods, who conveyed messages both to gods and men. The rainbow received the name of Iris, and the goddess in all probability was a personification of that brilliant phenomenon in the heavens. In the later classics she generally appears as the attendant of Hera. Little is known concerning the worship of Iris, except that she was worshipped by the Delians with offerings of wheaten cakes, honey, and dried figs.

IRISH EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The Irish clergy and people sunk, as we have seen in a preceding article, to the lowest state of intellectual and moral degradation, were not in a condition to appreciate the benefits likely to arise from the Lutheran Reformation. Since the twelfth century Romanism had held undisputed sway over the minds of the ignorant and uninquiring natives. A spirit of religious investigation had, indeed, for some time previous to the Reformation, forced its way into Ireland by means of English settlers; and, in the tenth year of Henry VII., it had been found necessary to enact statutes with the view of preventing the growth of Lollardism and heresy. But such seeds of the Reformation, introduced into Ireland by English emigrants, seem to have fallen upon an ungenial soil, and, therefore, speedily withered away. For while, in the reign of Henry VIII., reformed principles met with a ready reception in England, a considerable period elapsed before they could find a footing in Ireland. "Prelates of the more eminent dioceses," says Dr. Leland in his 'History of Ireland,' "slept in monastic tranquillity, while all Europe resounded with the tumult of theological disputes. It is ridiculous to find an Irish bishop renowned for the composition of a hymn in barbarous Latin rhymes in praise of a Saint Macartin, while his brethren in other countries were engaged in discussion of the most important points of religion; or others depending for salvation on being wrapt at their dying hour in the cowl of St. Francis, when Rome herself had confessed with shame the follies and enormities which had disgraced her communion."

No sooner had Henry VIII. secured the cordial and prompt compliance of his English subjects with the principles of the Reformation than he resolved to procure, if possible, a reception for the new doctrines in Ireland also. With this view he dispatched commissioners to confer with the clergy and nobility of that country, and to obtain a general acknowledgment of the king's supremacy as the earthly head of the church. Instead, however, of the royal commissioners succeeding in the accomplishment of their object, they were treated, to Henry's mortification and disappointment, with the greatest indifference and neglect. The advocates of the Pope's supremacy, in opposition to the supremacy of the king, were zealous and determined. They were headed by Cromer, Archbishop of Armagh, a prelate of ability and learning, and who, being primate of all Ireland, possessed sufficient influence to defeat the purposes of Henry, and to retard the progress of the Reformation in Ireland. The chief agent in forwarding the royal designs was George Brown, who had been a provincial of the friars of St. Augustin, but who was the first Protestant prelate that held a see in Ireland, having been appointed by Henry, Archbishop of Dublin. He had attracted peculiar notice by the zeal with which he preached doctrines utterly opposed to the dogmas of the Romish church, and being thus, for a long period, favourable to reformed opinions, he was thought to be well adapted for leading the way in planting a reformed church among the bigoted Irish Romanists. His labours in the cause of Protestantism met with the most violent opposition, and his life was frequently in imminent danger from the zealots of the popish party. He reported to the king the melancholy position of ecclesiastical affairs in Ireland, and strongly recommended that an Irish parliament should be summoned without delay in order to enforce a general acknowledgment of the king's supremacy. The suggestion of Archbishop Brown was adopted, and a parliament was convened at Dublin on the first of May 1536, by which all opposition was silenced, and the national religion was formally changed, the Reformed faith being established as the recognized religion of the country. Various statutes were enacted with the view of carrying out this great object. The king was declared supreme earthly head of the church of Ireland; the king was invested with the first-fruits of bishoprics, and other secular promotions in the Irish church, as well as the first-fruits of abbeys, priories, colleges, and hospitals; all appeals to Rome in spiritual causes were forbidden; the authority of the Pope was solemnly renounced, and all who should dare to acknowledge it in Ireland were made subject to præmunire; all officers of every kind and degree were required to take the oath of supremacy, and the refusal to take it was pronounced, as in England, to be high treason. Thus was Protestantism declared to be the religion of Ireland by law established. The religious houses were suppressed, and their lands vested for ever in the crown.

The partizans of Rome in Ireland were indignant at the spiritual authority assumed by the king; and numbers of the old Irish chieftains avowed their readiness to take up arms in defence of the ancient religion. Archbishop Brown found the utmost difficulty, even at the seat of government, in counteracting the secret movements of Cromer and the popish party, who had sent a special emissary to Rome to express their devotion to the holy father, and to implore his interposition in behalf of his spiritual authority in Ireland. Several incumbents of the diocese of Dublin chose to resign their benefices rather than acknowledge the king's supremacy. Commissioners were despatched secretly from Rome to encourage Cromer and his associates in their opposition to the recent enactments, and to rouse the Irish chieftains of the North to rise in defence of the papal supremacy. A confederacy was soon formed for the suppression of heresy; an army was raised to do battle in defence of the Pope's authority; but the victory of Bellahoe, on the borders of Meath, broke the power of the Northern Irish, and sent them to their homes. After a while, recovering from the consternation into which they had been thrown, the Irish chieftains prepared once more to draw the sword against the heretics. But the prompt measures of the government frustrated this new attempt at insurrection, and the chieftains with their tumultuary bands were dispersed in all directions. These repeated defeats weakened the influence of the Ulster nobles, and rendered the cause of the Pope more and more hopeless every day. Numbers of monasteries were now resigned into the hands of the king, and many of the warmest adherents of Rome submitted themselves to the royal authority. From Connaught, from Meath, from Munster, the most turbulent of the Irish lords vied with each other in professions of reconciliation to the king's government, and agreed to their indentures being couched in the strongest terms of submission. Henry gladly received the most powerful of these chieftains at his court; loaded them with presents, constituted them peers of parliament and members of the Irish council, and confirmed to them by patent their hereditary possessions to be held of the king by military service.

Thus peace was restored to Ireland, in so far as the Irish chieftains were concerned. The clergy, however, were not so easily won over to the cause of the Reformation. During the lifetime of Henry VIII. they felt themselves under considerable restraint, but the accession of Edward VI. to the throne, and the proclamation of the new English liturgy, roused them to a bold and determined opposition to the innovations introduced into the religion of their country. Archbishop Brown had removed the relics and images from the churches, and this change, though submitted to with reluctance, had given rise to no open manifestation of resistance to the royal will. But no sooner was the proclamation made, enjoining the acceptance of the new liturgy, than the slumbering spirit of discontent among the clergy broke forth into deeds of open opposition. The new liturgy was treated with the utmost scorn, more especially as no law had yet established it in Ireland. The court was insulted without a power of vindicating its authority; and the people, strong in their attachment to the old religion, sympathized cordially with the clergy in their hostility to the reformed mode of worship. In the midst of these distractions, the English government embraced every opportunity of advancing the Protestant cause in Ireland, by the appointment of reformed ministers to the vacant charges. These, however, found no small difficulty in discharging their sacred duties, in consequence of the prejudices, and even enmity of their parishioners. A striking instance of this occurred in the case of John Bale, who was appointed to the see of Ossory, and whose zeal for the cause of the Reformation was so strong, that the people rose against him, and five of his domestics were slain before his face, while his own life was only saved by the vigorous interposition of the civil magistrate.

The death of Edward the Sixth and the succession of Mary to the throne, proved a grievous discouragement to the friends of Protestantism in Ireland. The Reformation, imperfectly though it had yet been carried out in the Irish church, was for a time completely arrested. A license was now published, as in England, for the celebration of mass without penalty or compulsion. The reformed clergy dreaded the approach of a time of persecution, and some of them sought safety in flight, while others were ejected to give place to ecclesiastics devoted to the Romish communion. An Irish parliament was convened at Dublin in 1556, for the purpose of re-establishing the ancient faith and worship. A papal bull to that effect was read, the whole assembly of Lords and Commons listening to it on their bended knees, in token of reverence and contrition; after which, they adjourned to the cathedral, where Te Deum was solemnly chanted in thanksgiving to God for the restoration of Ireland to the unity of the holy church of Rome.

The Roman Catholic faith and worship were now once more established in Ireland as well as England; all acts made against the holy see were repealed; the jurisdiction of the Pope was revived; the property and emoluments vested in the crown were restored to the church, with the exception of such lands as had been granted to the laity, and which it might have been dangerous to wrest from them. Matters now returned to nearly the same state as before the Reformation; and the Protestants who had not quitted the country, were permitted to enjoy their opinions and worship in privacy without molestation or hindrance; the persecuting spirit which, during this unhappy reign, raged in England, not having extended across the Irish channel.

On the accession of Elizabeth at her sister's death, the new queen's well-known adherence to the cause of the Reformation revived the hearts of the Protestants in all parts of her dominions. Agreeably to the royal instructions, an Irish parliament was convened in January 1560, with the view of establishing anew the reformed worship. Not a few, both of the Lords and Commons, assembled on that occasion, were keen partisans of Rome, but after a session of only a few weeks, and amid considerable opposition, statutes were passed reversing the whole ecclesiastical system of Queen Mary, and establishing Protestantism as henceforth the established religion of Ireland. The ecclesiastical supremacy was now restored to the crown; all laws against heresy were repealed; the use of the Book of Common Prayer was enforced, and all the queen's subjects were obliged to attend the public service of the church. The Romish party inveighed against the heretical queen and her impious ministers. The clergy who could not conscientiously conform, resigned their livings, and as no reformed ministers could be found to supply their places, the churches fell to ruin, and whole districts of the country were left without religious ordinances. The Irish people generally had never lost their ancient attachment to the Romish religion, and finding the doctrines and practices of their forefathers, since the time of the Second Henry, now set at nought by the government, their clergy removed, and no others substituted in their room, they naturally conceived a bitter hatred against their English rulers, and prepared themselves for the first opportunity which should occur of vindicating their religion even by force of arms against the heretics. Such hostile feelings met with no small encouragement, both from the Pope whose authority had been treated with contempt, and from the king of Spain who happened at this time to be on no very friendly footing with Elizabeth.

Ireland continued to be exposed to constant internal commotions, caused by the ambition and jealousy of the petty chieftains, who complained loudly of the uncompromising firmness with which Elizabeth maintained her royal prerogative in the matter of pecuniary assessments. One of these discontented nobles, by name Fitz-Maurice, after urging in vain upon the king of France an invasion of Ireland, made the same proposal to the Pope, and so cordially did His Holiness enter into the project, that he forthwith issued a bull addressed to the prelates, princes, nobles, and people of Ireland, exhorting them to assist Fitz-Maurice in contending for the recovery of their liberty and the defence of the holy church. Philip II., king of Spain, aided in this enterprize, which, however, proved entirely unsuccessful, and yet not before the flame of rebellion had been kindled throughout the greater part of Ireland, raised chiefly by the Earl of Desmond, whose death, by the hand of violence, put an end to the insurrection in the meantime. One rebellion after another kept the country in a state of commotion, fomented by the Popes of Rome, who were anxious to recover the authority which they had so long claimed over the church and people of Ireland. With the view of accomplishing this object, they succeeded in organizing a strong popish party, which the vigour of Elizabeth's government kept in some restraint; but on the accession of James I., they assumed a bolder attitude than ever. Several cities of Leinster, and almost all the cities of Munster, entered into a conspiracy to restore the Romish worship in open contempt of the penal statutes of the realm. In furtherance of this design they proceeded to eject the reformed ministers from their churches, they seized such religious houses as had been converted to civil uses, they erected their crosses, celebrated their masses in public, and their ecclesiastics might be seen marching in public procession clothed in the habits of their respective monastic orders. The seditious spirit now pervaded the whole of the southern counties of Ireland, and the government found it necessary to take active measures for its suppression; and so prompt, as well as energetic, were these measures, that the insurrection of the Southerns, alarming though it appeared for a time, was brought to a speedy termination.

There is no doubt that the undecided and vacillating conduct of James led the Irish Romanists to believe that he was not unfriendly to their communion. Presuming on the tenderness of the king towards their church, the Romish ecclesiastics denounced from the altar all who ventured to attend on the established worship. Abbeys and monasteries were repaired, and the rites of the ancient faith were celebrated openly in different parts of the country. But though James might seem to be somewhat indulgent to the erroneous tenets of the Church of Rome, no monarch could hold in greater abhorrence all attempts to trench upon the royal prerogative, by maintaining the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Pope of Rome. With such feelings, he had published a proclamation in England, commanding all Jesuits and other priests who had received orders from any foreign power to depart from the kingdom; and to maintain his consistency, he issued a similar proclamation in Ireland, ordering all the Romish clergy to quit the country within a limited time, unless they consented to conform to the laws of the land. This latter proclamation, instead of frightening, only enraged the popish party, who represented it as an act on the part of government of the most wanton injustice and oppression. A remonstrance and petition was immediately got up, demanding the free exercise of their religion, but this document having been laid before the council, on the very day when intelligence reached Dublin of the Gunpowder Plot, the chief petitioners were seized and imprisoned in the castle, while Sir Patrick Barnwell, their principal agent, was sent in custody into England, by the command of the king. The dissatisfaction and discontent which prevailed among the Romanists in every part of Ireland, kept the government in a state of perpetual suspicion and uneasiness, and gave weight to every report of insurrection and conspiracy. Nor were the fears of the king and his ministers altogether without foundation. The Northern chieftains, followed by numbers of the native Irish, were imprudent enough to form the plan of a new rebellion, which was speedily brought to an end, however, by the vigilance of the government. The consequence was, that a vast tract of land amounting to 500,000 acres in six northern counties was forfeited to the crown. This led to the plantation of Ulster, the benefits of which are felt at this day. A large population of loyal and industrious inhabitants, chiefly Protestants, settled in the northern counties, the lands were cultivated and improved, a number of flourishing towns were established, and the province of Ulster became the most prosperous and thriving district of Ireland.

To enforce the royal authority, and put an end to the religious dissensions and animosities which still prevailed in various parts of the country, James resolved to summon an Irish parliament. The recusants, who formed a large and powerful party, were alarmed lest some additional enactments were contemplated against those who refused to abandon the Romish communion. To prevent any further penal statutes being passed, every exertion was made to strengthen the popish faction. The priests harangued the people on the dangers of the present crisis; excommunication was threatened against every man who should vote in opposition to the interests of holy mother church. But notwithstanding the extraordinary efforts made to increase their numbers, the recusants were mortified to find, on the assembling of parliament, that a considerable majority of the members were Protestants, and therefore friendly to the government. The recusants, however, were sufficiently numerous to render the debates violent and disorderly, more especially as they claimed to form a majority of members legally elected. At the very outset an animated and even angry discussion arose on the election of a speaker, and Sir John Davis, who had been recommended by the king, having been chosen to the office, the recusants refused to sit or to take any share in the proceedings of an assembly so illegal, so violent, and arbitrary. In this state of matters it was deemed prudent to prorogue the parliament. The recusants laid their complaints against the validity of many of the elections before the king, who succeeded in quieting their scruples, and prevailing upon them to take part in the deliberations of the parliament.

directed, as these were, chiefly to the civil affairs of the country.

While the parliament was sitting, a convocation of the clergy was directed to be held in Dublin, for the purpose, chiefly, of framing a public confession of faith for the established church of Ireland. This confession appears to have been drawn up in 1615 by Archbishop Ussher, one of the most able and learned men of his day. The document, when completed, consisted of no fewer than one hundred and four articles, including the nine Calvinistic ARTICLES OF LAMBETH (which see), prepared in 1595; and having been submitted to the convocation, it was approved by that body, and ratified by the lord deputy of Ireland.

At the death of James I., and the accession of his son Charles I., England being involved in foreign wars, and embarrassed by domestic dissensions, the Irish recusants gladly availed themselves of the opportunity to fan the flame of discontent among their own countrymen. In this they were aided as usual by Rome, a bull having been issued by Urban VIII., calling upon them rather to lose their lives than to take that wicked and pestilent oath of supremacy, whereby the sceptre of the Catholic church was wrested from the hand of the vicar of God Almighty. Such an appeal coming from the Pope himself, could not fail to exert a powerful influence upon an ignorant and superstitious people. Charles, however, by the advice of the Irish council, provided against the apparently impending danger by making a large addition to his army in Ireland. Hopes were held out to the popish party of obtaining some favourable concessions from the king, and reports were industriously spread that they were to be gratified with a full toleration of their religion. The Protestant clergy forthwith took the alarm, and at the instigation of the archbishop of Armagh, hastened to lay before the government a firm but respectful protest against all toleration of Popish worship and ceremonies. "The religion of the papists," said they, "is superstitious and idolatrous; their faith and doctrine, erroneous and heretical; their church, in respect of both, apostatical. To give them therefore a toleration, or to consent that they may freely exercise their religion, and profess their faith and doctrine, is a grievous sin, and that in two respects; for, first, it is to make ourselves accessary not only to their superstitious, idolatries, and heresies, and, in a word, to all the abominations of popery, but also, (which is a consequence of the former) to the perdition of the seduced people, which perish in the deluge of the Catholic apostacy. Secondly, to grant them a toleration, in respect of any money to be given, or contribution to be made by them, is to set religion to sale, and with it the souls of the people, whom Christ hath redeemed with his blood. And as it is a great sin, so it is also a matter of most dangerous consequence: the consideration whereof we commit to the wise and judicious, beseeching the God of truth to make them who are in authority, zealous of God's glory, and of the advancement of true religion; zealous, resolute, and courageous, against all popery, superstition, and idolatry."

The pulpits of the Irish church now resounded with strong condemnation of the errors of Popery, while the Romanists themselves, encouraged by the expectation of full toleration, publicly professed their religion, and practised its rites in all parts of the country, to the great offence of the Protestant people and clergy. Nor were the hopes which they were led to entertain of receiving some marks of royal indulgence doomed to be disappointed. Various concessions of a very favourable kind were granted by government to the recusants, and among others, instead of the oath of supremacy, an oath was substituted by which they professed to acknowledge and promised to defend Charles as the lawful and rightful king of the realm. Encouraged by the indulgence which had been shown by government to the professors of the Romish religion, their priests urged them to the most imprudent excesses. "Their religious worship," says Leland, "was once more celebrated with public solemnity, and with the full parade of their ostentatious ritual. Churches were seized for their service; their ecclesiastical jurisdiction was avowedly and severely executed; new friaries and nunneries were erected; and even in the city of Dublin, under the immediate notice of the state, an academical body was formed, and governed by an ecclesiastic of some note, for the education of popish youth. The clergy, by whose influence these violent proceedings were directed, were by their numbers, and by their principles, justly alarming to government. They swarmed into the kingdom from foreign seminaries; where they had imbibed the most inveterate prejudices against England, and the most abject and pestilent opinions of the papal authority. Seculars and regulars alike had bound themselves by solemn oath, to defend the papacy against the whole world; to labour for the augmentation of its power and privileges; to execute its mandates, and to persecute heretics. Their whole body acted in dangerous concert under the direction of the Pope, and subject to the orders of the congregation de propaganda fide, lately erected at Rome; and many of them, by their education in the seminaries of Spain, were peculiarly devoted to the interests of that monarchy; habituated to regard the insurrections of the old Irish in the reign of Elizabeth as the most generous exertions of patriotism, and taught to detest that power which had quelled this spirit, and established a dominion on the ruins of the ancient dignity and pre-eminence of their countrymen."

Lord Faulkland was at this time lord deputy of Ireland, and though himself disposed to moderation in religious matters of controversy, he felt that it was impossible for him to shut his eyes to the turbulent conduct of the recusants, which threatened seriously to disturb the peace of the country. Supported by his council, therefore, he issued a proclamation to the effect that "the late intermission of legal proceedings against popish pretended titular archbishops, bishops, abbots, deans, vicars-general, jesuits, friars, and others, deriving their pretended authority from the see of Rome, in contempt of his majesty's royal power and authority, had bred such an extravagant insolence and presumption in them, that he was necessitated to charge and command them in his majesty's name to forbear the exercise of their popish rites and ceremonies."

This proclamation was treated with the utmost contempt, and popish worship was maintained as openly as formerly. But neither the inclinations nor instructions of the lord-deputy allowed him to adopt more stringent measures. Perceiving his weakness and timidity, the popish party began in a discontented spirit to utter loud complaints of the oppressive weight of the public burdens. The government now resolved to adopt a more active course of proceedings. Accordingly, having recalled Lord Faulkland, and committed the administration of the affairs of Ireland in the meantime to two lords justices, Lord Ely, and the Earl of Cork, who without waiting for instructions from the king, proceeded to act with the utmost firmness, threatening all absentees from the established worship with the penalties of the statute enacted in the second year of Queen Elizabeth's reign. This severity, however, was soon checked by an announcement from the government, that such stringent measures were not acceptable to the king. The recusants, delighted with the royal interference in their favour, were more insolent than before. A band of Carmelite friars, dressed in the habit of their order, made their appearance in one of the most public thoroughfares of Dublin, and openly celebrated their religious rites. The archbishop of the diocese, and the chief magistrate of the city, called upon the military to disperse the assembly; but the friars and their congregation opposing force to force, put the soldiers to flight. Tidings of this incident reached the English government, who, to maintain their own authority, and overawe the recusants, ordered fifteen religious houses to be seized and appropriated to the king's use: and the popish college which had been erected in Dublin, to be given over to the university, which forthwith converted it into a Protestant seminary.

It is lamentable to observe how far the Irish church and clergy had degenerated in the divided and distracted state of the country. Many of their places of worship were in a ruinous and dilapidated state; the church revenues were to a great extent alienated; many of the rural clergy were in a state of extreme poverty, and some of them characterized by the most deplorable ignorance and immorality. The Romish hierarchy, on the other hand, with a large and powerful body of adherents, was not slow to take advantage of the depressed state of the Established Church, and in some places had actually taken possession of the church lands. A convocation of the Irish clergy accordingly was held, and the melancholy state of ecclesiastical affairs having been represented to the king, Lord Wentworth, who was at this time lord-deputy, received instructions to take immediate steps for rendering the Established Church more efficient and better provided. He began, therefore, with erecting churches, and supplying them with suitable ministers. Laws also were passed for the restitution of the rights of the clergy, and provision made to prevent all future alienations. Measures were adopted for the better education and training of candidates for the ministry in connection with the Irish church. The university of Dublin was placed upon a better footing, its statutes revised, and an efficient governor placed over it.

One point which the king, as well as Archbishop Laud and the lord-deputy, had much at heart, was the complete union of the churches of England and Ireland, by establishing the English articles and canons in the latter kingdom as the rule of doctrine and discipline. Ussher, and a considerable portion of the Irish clergy, were by no means favourable to this proposal, being desirous of maintaining the thorough independence of the Irish church, and the authority of its own articles which had been adopted in convocation during the late reign. To reconcile Ussher, who had been the compiler of the Irish articles, to the projected reformation, it was agreed that no censure should be passed on any of these articles, but that they should be virtually, not formally, abrogated by the establishment of the articles of the Church of England: and further that the English canons should not be adopted in a body, but a careful selection made from them to form a code of discipline for the Irish church. Chiefly through the influence of the lord-deputy, and in deference to the wishes of Charles and his ministers, the English articles were accordingly received and the canons established. This important alteration in the ecclesiastical system of the Church of Ireland was followed by the establishment of a High-Commission court in Dublin on the same model and with the same tremendous powers as the court of the same name in England. This court, however, seems not to have taken the strong steps which might have been expected from so powerful an engine of tyranny and oppression.

The whole conduct of Charles I. in his government of Ireland was so vacillating and insincere, that the people were every day more and more alienated from the English government. The people generally were devoted to the Church of Rome, and the feelings of bitter hatred which they entertained towards their English rulers, were fostered and strengthened by their clergy, who, having been educated in foreign seminaries, particularly those of France and Spain, returned to Ireland thoroughly ultramontane in their sentiments and unpatriotic in their attachments. Bound by solemn allegiance to the Pope, they felt no obligation of submission to the king. These men, thus estranged from the English government, held consultation with its enemies at home, maintained secret correspondence with its enemies abroad, and formed schemes of insurrection for the purpose, as they alleged, of promoting the interests of mother church. In these circumstances a rebellion commenced, led on by Roger Moore, the head of a once powerful family in Leinster. Appealing to the prejudices, and rousing the passions of the native Irish, this man speedily gathered around him a large and enthusiastic band of conspirators. A considerable number of the old Irish chieftains flocked to his standard. Money, arms, and ammunition were supplied from foreign parts. The Romish clergy entered into the plot with the greatest cordiality, hoping to be able to expel the heretics from Ireland, and establish once more the ancient faith as the religion of the country. When the rebellion was at its height, accordingly, a general synod was convened at Kilkenny, in which the war was declared to be lawful and pious; an oath of association was proposed as a bond of union, and a sentence of excommunication was denounced against all who should refuse to take it. The clergy, also, at this synod, proposed to dispatch embassies to foreign potentates, and to solicit the emperor of Germany, the king of France, and the Pope, to grant assistance to their cause.

The melancholy and protracted civil war which now raged in Ireland rendered it a scene of desolation and bloodshed. The extermination of the heretics and the annihilation of the Irish church were the main objects of the movement; and during the life of Charles I. the rebels met with powerful though secret encouragement from Henrietta his queen. Oliver Cromwell, by his stern and inflexible resolution, succeeded in extinguishing the rebellion, and restoring Ireland, for a time at least, to some measure of tranquillity. Charles II. was a covered and concealed friend of the Romish party in Ireland; but his brother, James II., who succeeded him, was an open and avowed Romanist. The accession of a popish prince to the English throne naturally excited the most extravagant expectations in the minds of the Irish people. They anticipated now the full and final triumph of their religion over all its enemies. The hearts of the Protestants, on the other hand, were filled with the most melancholy apprehensions. For a time James sought to allay the fears of the Protestant clergy; but as soon as he had fully matured his plans, he made no secret of his ultimate design. Orders were now issued by royal authority that the Romish clergy should not be disturbed in the exercise of their duties; and this permission was followed by an announcement that it was the pleasure of the king that the Roman Catholic prelates should appear publicly in the habit of their order. The Protestant clergy were at the same time forbidden to introduce points of religious controversy into the pulpit; and the slightest allusion to the errors of popery was regarded as an act of sedition. Such marks of favour shown to the friends of the old faith strengthened their hands and cheered their hearts. Almost the whole army was at this time composed of Irish Romanists, and a number of Protestant officers were deprived of their commissions, and driven from the kingdom. It was the evident wish of James to invest the popish party with the whole authority and influence of the kingdom, and especially the power of controlling all future parliaments.

Protestants were now heavily discouraged. Their clergy were reduced to extreme destitution; their churches were, many of them, seized by the popish priests both in rural districts and in the towns, while such acts of spoliation and injustice were connived at by the magistrates. The anxiety of the king was to make Ireland a Catholic kingdom. An order was issued that no more than five Protestants should meet together even in churches on pain of death. But these acts of tyranny and oppression were only to last for a short period. James was driven from his throne by his indignant English subjects, and the Revolution of 1688 rendered it imperative that henceforth the sovereign of Great Britain should be a Protestant, and bound to uphold Protestantism as the established religion of the realm. William, prince of Orange, who was called to the throne on the flight of James II. after the battle of the Boyne, commenced his reign by assuring the Irish Protestants that he had come to Ireland to free them from Popish tyranny, and that he doubted not, by the Divine assistance, to complete his design. After a somewhat protracted contest, the war was brought to a close, and peace restored.

The Protestant church having been fully reinstated in all its privileges as the Established Church of Ireland, now addressed itself to its great work, the evangelization of that benighted country. Throughout the whole of the eighteenth century, though some men of great ability, fervent piety, and unwearied activity, were found among the Episcopalian clergy of Ireland, yet the cause of Protestantism made little progress. At the close of the century Ireland numbered a population of nearly 5,000,000, while the members of the Established Church did not exceed 600,000. According to the Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction issued in 1834, the adherents of the Established Church had, in the interval, increased to 853,064.

The Act of Union, which passed in 1801, united the Church of Ireland with that of England in all matters of doctrine, worship, and discipline, thus forming "the United Church of England and Ireland." But though the Irish church has been incorporated with the Church of England she is not subject to the English canons. Neither is the Irish church represented in the Convocation of the English clergy. In England subscription of the Thirty-Nine Articles is required from every candidate for holy orders or presentee to a benefice; but in Ireland such subscription is dispensed with, although the Act of Uniformity passed in the reign of Charles II., in so far as it applies to the Irish church, imposes upon all its clergy subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England.

From the date of the Union, the Irish branch of the Church of England has made rapid progress in all that goes to constitute the usefulness and efficiency of a Christian church. Her position is one of peculiar difficulty, her clergy being called to labour in a land where ignorance and Romish superstition prevail to a lamentable extent. But in the midst of much discouragement they have sought faithfully to discharge their duty, not only to their own people, but to all around them. Engaged in a constant struggle with Romish error, they are almost to a man strangers to High Church or Puseyite principles. One of the principal agencies which the Irish church employs for the evangelization of the Irish-speaking population, is the Irish Society, which was established in 1826, and employs 59 readers and 719 teachers, whose labours are of great importance, there being, according to a calculation made before the famine in 1846, no fewer than 3,000,000 of Irish-speaking Roman Catholics in the country. Another valuable missionary institution connected with the Established Church is the Irish Island Society, which employs about 25 readers and teachers on the islands and coasts, and has brought the gospel within reach of about 13,000 souls. For the instruction of the young, the Irish church supports the Church Education Society for Ireland, which in 1851 had 1,882 schools, and 108,450 scholars on the roll, with an average attendance of 64,647.

Two of the most interesting colonies in Ireland are Dingle in the county Kerry, and the island of Achill in the county Mayo; both connected with the Established Church. "In the year 1831," says Dr. Dill, in his 'Mystery Solved,' "the Rev. George Gubbins was appointed curate of Dingle. At this time there was in the district neither church nor school-house; and this excellent man lived in a cabin at one shilling per week, and had stated services in the private dwellings around. In about a year after the district was visited and fearfully ravaged by the cholera. There being no physician to apply to, Mr. Gubbins became physician-general to the poor; and his kindness during a crisis so awful won the people's affections, and prepared the way for the harvest which soon followed. In 1833, the Rev. Charles Gayer arrived in the district; the following year several of the inhabitants, including two Popish priests, renounced the Romish faith; upwards of 150 families have since followed their example. Some time ago, the colony consisted of 800 converts; and notwithstanding the brutal persecution to which its present excellent missionary, Mr. Lewis, has been subjected, and the extensive emigration of the people of that district, it now consists of 1,200. Amongst the many cheering instances of the Divine blessing on the labours of these missionaries, we may mention that of Mr. Moriarty, the present curate of Ventry, who was once a bigoted Romanist, and went on one occasion into a congregation on purpose to disturb them in their devotions; and who, while waiting for the moment when he should commence his interruptions, received such impressions from the truth he heard, as ultimately led to his conversion.

"Achill is the largest island on the coast of Ireland. It stands on the extreme west of Mayo, is washed by the billows of the Atlantic, and consists of mountain and bog, interspersed with small patches of cultivated land. Being visited with famine in 1831, the Rev. Edward Nangle took charge of a cargo of potatoes sent to its relief. Having found the people willing to listen to the truth, he conceived the design of founding amongst them a colony on the Moravian plan; and, with the full countenance of the principal proprietor of the island, and the cordial aid of numerous Christian friends, he soon after founded 'the Colony of Achill.' A wild tract of moor has now been reclaimed, and a number of cottages have been erected upon it for the colonists; a neat church and school-house stand in the interesting little village; several families and individuals have renounced the errors of Popery; the young generation are growing up a different class of beings from what their progenitors were; the sides of the once barren mountain are now adorned with cultivated fields and gardens; most of the island has lately been purchased by the friends of the colony, at a cost of £17,000; and thus the gospel will in future have free course and be glorified in the spot which for ages has slumbered in the midnight of Popery!"

The activity and zeal of the Irish church, as well as the success which attended their efforts, led the Romanists, headed by O'Connell, to make strenuous efforts for the overthrow of the national church. Through their efforts, accordingly, the payment of tithes and church cess was for a time withheld, and many of the Protestant clergy were in great pecuniary difficulties. At length the government found it necessary to introduce various modifications of the ecclesiastical system, with a view to remove alleged abuses. An act was passed accordingly in 1833, which was considered by many as a heavy blow and sore discouragement to Protestantism in Ireland. By this measure payment of first-fruits to the crown was abolished, and in its place was substituted a yearly tax on a graduated scale of from 2½ to 15 per cent. on benefices; and from 5 to 15 per cent. on episcopal revenues. Another act was passed reducing by 25 per cent. the tithes payable throughout Ireland. The incomes of the sees of Armagh and Derry were reduced; ten bishoprics and two archbishoprics were suppressed; and the deanery of St. Patrick's was united to that of Christ Church, Dublin. The funds realized by these alterations were appointed to be expended by an ecclesiastical commission in "the building and repairing of churches, the augmentation of small livings, and such other purposes as may conduce to the advancement of religion."

In consequence of the combined operations of famine, disease, and emigration, the population of Ireland, as the census of 1851 demonstrates, has undergone a very remarkable diminution, amounting to nearly one-third of the whole inhabitants of the country. Great numbers have for some years past left the Romish church, so that the Protestants of all denominations are computed to amount to 2,000,000, while the Romanists are supposed to amount to somewhere about 4,500,000. For some years past, the Irish Episcopal Church has been blessed to do a good work in Ireland. Among her clergy are to be found many laborious servants of Christ, who, amid much discouragement and neglect, have been honoured to advance the cause of truth and righteousness in that benighted land.

IRISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. In tracing the origin of this important section of the Christian Church in Ireland, it is necessary to revert to an event already noticed in the preceding article—the plantation of Ulster by James I. During the latter years of the reign of Elizabeth, as well as the early part of the reign of her successor, the northern provinces had been the scene of incessant conspiracies and insurrections fomented chiefly by the old hereditary chieftains who held estates in that part of the country. The active part which these nobles took in successive plots against the government led to the forfeiture of their estates; and thus, in the course of a few years after James I. had ascended the throne of England, about half a million of acres, and nearly six whole counties in the province of Ulster, reverted to the crown. The acquisition of so large an extent of land afforded James an admirable opportunity of making an experiment with the view of discovering the best means of promoting both the religious and civil reformation of Ireland. He resolved, accordingly, to plant the greater part of the territory which had fallen into his hands with English and Scottish colonics. By this step the king hoped that an improved system of agriculture would be introduced, a spirit of industry and commercial activity would be developed among the people, and a central point would be secured, from which the Protestant faith might be speedily disseminated throughout the country generally.

At the period when this wise and sagacious project was devised by James, the province of Ulster had sunk to the lowest stage both of physical and moral degradation. The country was almost depopulated, and its resources wasted by a long protracted series of exterminating wars. Its towns and villages were in ruins, the lands uncultivated, and the thinly scattered inhabitants in a state of utter wretchedness. Its religious condition also was scarcely less deplorable.

The nobles and their retainers were devotedly attached to the old religion, and the reformed faith had scarcely found a footing among the people. In this melancholy state of matters, the scheme for the colonization of Ulster commenced in 1605, the chief management of the enterprize being intrusted to Sir Arthur Chichester, the lord-deputy of the kingdom. In distributing the forfeited lands among the settlers, the king took care to make suitable provision for the support of the church. The ecclesiastical revenues which had been alienated by the nobles were restored to the clergy; parish churches were repaired; and for the encouragement of learning, a free school was endowed in the chief town of every diocese.

The majority of the original settlers were from Scotland, owing to the vicinity of that country to Ulster, and these being of hardy constitutions and an enterprising spirit, were well fitted to encounter the difficulties attendant on the first plantation of a colony. A few English immigrants also came over, who occupied the southern and western parts of the province. In 1610, the lands were generally occupied, and amid all the hindrances to which such an enterprize was necessarily exposed, it flourished beyond expectation, more especially in the counties of Down and Antrim. To impart additional confidence to the new settlers, a parliament was summoned, which gave the sanction of law to the various arrangements of the colony. The emigrants from Scotland had brought over with them some of their own ministers, but the writers of the time give no very flattering account of the piety of either the ministers or people. The Irish Episcopalian church, however, was in as favourable a position as it had ever been during any period of its history. The sees were all filled with Protestant prelates, and such was the stability of the church, that a convocation was summoned in 1615, which framed a confession of faith of its own, independently altogether of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, which some of the prelates wished to adopt. And so great was the peace and security which the Irish church at this time enjoyed, that a number of the English Puritan ministers who were unable conscientiously to conform fled to Ireland, and rose to places of influence both in the university and the church. These, along with the Scottish clergy, who had also obtained ecclesiastical promotion, seem to have exercised considerable influence in the first convocation; and thus we may satisfactorily account for the readiness with which the Irish Articles were adopted, notwithstanding the strong Calvinistic spirit by which they were pervaded.

Encouraged by the result of the convocation, and the tranquillity which prevailed throughout the country, but more especially in Ulster, several faithful and pious ministers repaired thither from both England and Scotland, and were instrumental in founding the Presbyterian church. One of the most able and efficient of these ministers was the celebrated Robert Blair, who, having been invited over by Lord Claneboy, settled at Bangor, county Down. It was a curious circumstance, that as he demurred to ordination by the bishop singly, as in his view contrary to Scripture, Dr. Knox, then prelate of the diocese in which Bangor was situated, consented to act as a presbyter along with some of the neighbouring ministers in the act of ordination. This put an end to Mr. Blair's objections, and he was solemnly ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

About this period an awakening took place in various parts of Ireland, particularly in Antrim, Down, and other northern counties. To this season of revival in the Presbyterian churches, Mr. Blair signally contributed by his individual exertions, and by rousing other ministers to increased zeal and activity in the service of the Lord. The good work which had commenced, chiefly by the instrumentality of Mr. Blair's exertions, in various parts of Ireland, was promoted to a considerable extent by the arrival of several devoted ministers from Scotland. Among these was Mr. Josiah Welsh, son of the famous Mr. John Welsh, who married one of the daughters of John Knox. In the progress of Christ's cause, under the ministry of the Presbyterians, Archbishop Ussher, then primate of Ireland, took a deep interest. It was a matter of great rejoicing to his truly Christian heart that these godly men were labouring thus zealously in the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom. The utmost anxiety was manifested by the people to hear the Word of life, and accordingly, not merely on Sabbaths, but at the monthly meetings and the sacramental occasions, crowds attended, and eagerly hung on the lips of these men of God as they declared the heavenly message with which they had been intrusted. Their success, however, as might have been expected, soon called forth the jealousy and malignant hatred of their enemies. Knowing their abhorrence of every ceremony which savoured in the least of Popery, snares were laid for them by many of the conformist clergy. But in vain. The cause of God advanced, the numbers of their adherents increased daily, and the Presbyterian Church flourished amid the prayers and the exertions of its faithful pastors.

The hour of trial and sore persecution at length came. Mr. Blair having gone to visit his friends in Scotland, assisted at a communion along with Mr. John Livingston at the Kirk of Shotts. Mr. Maxwell, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, an ambitious, time-serving individual, brought an accusation against both, as if they had taught the necessity of bodily affections in the process of the new birth. This groundless and foolish charge reached the ears of Ecklin, the Bishop of Down, who had been for some time waiting for an opportunity of silencing two such effective and popular ministers. Without delay, therefore, he suspended both Mr. Livingston and Mr. Blair from the duties of the ministry. A punishment so summary, and that, too, founded on a mere allegation which had never been proved, they felt to be oppressive and unjust, and accordingly they lost no time in complaining to Archbishop Ussher, who immediately ordered the decree of suspension to be withdrawn until the charge in question was fully proved.

Nor did Bishop Ecklin's malignity stop here. He cited several of the obnoxious ministers before him, among whom was Blair, and having in vain urged them to conform, he solemnly deposed them from the office of the holy ministry. This cruel and tyrannical act, which took place in May 1632, was reported to the worthy archbishop, who had formerly interfered in their behalf; but though himself anxious for their restoration, he declined interfering, as an order had come from the King to the Lords Chief Justices concerning them. The brethren, finding that they had no other resource, came to the resolution of making an application directly at court. Mr. Blair was, accordingly, dispatched on this important errand, and having obtained commendatory letters from several nobles and gentlemen, both in Scotland and Ireland, he set out for London. The deepest anxiety pervaded the breasts of multitudes as to the result of his application, and many a prayer was offered up for his success. The brethren were not a little afraid that the mind of the king might be wrought upon by the pernicious influence of Archbishop Laud. In the providence of God, however, it so happened that, when Mr. Blair's petition was put into the king's hands, he not only granted a gracious answer to its request, but with his own hand inserted a clause to the effect, "That if the information made to him proved false, the informers should be punished." The royal condescension and kindness was most gratifying to Mr. Blair, and he hastened home to Ireland, carrying the glad tidings to his brethren that the Lord had answered their prayers.

It was a considerable disappointment to the deposed brethren to find that, although the king had granted their petition, the noblemen to whom the royal decree was intrusted did not arrive in Ireland for nearly a year after Mr. Blair's return. At length, in May 1634, six months' liberty was permitted to those persecuted men of God, and they gladly embraced the opportunity to declare the Gospel with the utmost zeal and diligence. At the expiry of the six months, they received a continuance of their liberty for six months longer. This, however, at the instigation of Bishop Bramble of Derry, was withdrawn, in so far as Mr. Dunbar and Mr. Blair were concerned, and, accordingly, having closed their brief respite with the celebration of the Lord's Supper, they committed their people to the care of the great Bishop of souls, and submitted to the harsh treatment to which they were exposed. In November 1634 Mr. Blair was summoned a third time before the bishop of his diocese, and formally deposed from the sacred office.

The state of matters in Ireland being unsettled, and the deposed ministers thinking it improbable that they would soon be restored to the exercise of their office, resolved to cross the Atlantic and settle in New England. Having received a kind invitation from the governor of that colony, they built a ship for their accommodation, to which they gave the name of Eagle-Wings. This vessel, with about one hundred and forty passengers, among whom were Messrs. Blair, Livingston, and several others of the persecuted ministers, set sail from Lochfergus on the 9th September 1636. The emigrants had not proceeded far on their voyage when a violent storm arose, and they were every moment in danger of being shipwrecked. Thus discouraged at the outset, and conceiving that to proceed farther, in the face of what appeared to them evidently the will of the Almighty, would be sinful, they returned without delay to the harbour from which they had sailed. The deposed ministers had not remained above a few months, however, in Ireland, when a warrant was issued for their apprehension. It was evident that new trials were preparing for them, and with the utmost dispatch they fled to Scotland, where they were kindly received and hospitably treated by some of the most eminent ministers of the time, particularly by Mr. Dickson of Irvine, and Mr. Cunningham of Holywood.

A few years elapsed when an alarming rebellion burst forth among the Papists in Ireland, and the Protestants in the northern counties were inhumanly massacred in immense numbers. The survivors of this awful persecution, being chiefly Scotchmen who had emigrated, made application to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1642, for a supply of ministers. Among those who were sent over to Ireland to assist in ordaining young men over the different parishes, and in otherwise encouraging the poor persecuted remnant, was Mr. Blair, who, from his former connection with that unhappy country, felt a peculiar interest in the distressed Presbyterians. During the three months he spent in Ireland, he generally preached once every day and twice on Sabbath, chiefly in the open air, as no church could contain the crowds who waited on his ministry.

The rebellion and massacre were the means of bringing out a very important change in the ecclesiastical condition of Ulster. The Episcopal church was now in an enfeebled and prostrate state. Few of her clergy and not one of her prelates remained in the province; and of the Protestant laity, few were conscientiously attached to prelacy. Hence a large majority of the Protestant inhabitants of Ulster were in favour of a church founded on Presbyterian principles. A number of Scottish regiments were sent over to Ireland at this time, and being accompanied by chaplains who were ordained Presbyterian ministers, the foundations of the Presbyterian church were once more laid in Ulster, conformed in all respects to the parent church in Scotland. The army chaplains formed in each of the regiments sessions or elderships; and by their means also the first regularly constituted presbytery held in Ireland, met at Carrickfergus on Friday the 10th of June 1642. No sooner was it known in the surrounding country that a presbytery had been formed in Carrickfergus, than applications poured in from the adjoining parishes for admission into their communion, and for a supply of ministers. This was the origin of the Irish Presbyterian Church, which has since earned for itself a deservedly high place among the faithful churches of Christ for usefulness and efficiency.

Many of the Episcopal clergy now came forward and joined the presbytery. Before admission, however, they were called upon to profess repentance in public for their former conduct. The number of congregations was daily on the increase, and another application was made by the presbytery in 1643, to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland for an additional supply of ministers. This petition was intrusted to the Rev. John Scott, one of their number, who, on his appearance in the Assembly, was duly recognized and admitted as a member of the court. This meeting of the supreme ecclesiastical court of Scotland is noted in history as having been that on which the important document, commonly known by the name of the Solemn League and Covenant, was formally discussed and agreed to.

While the negotiations in regard to the Solemn League and Covenant were carrying on both in England and Scotland, the neighbouring kingdom of Ireland was still agitated by religious and civil dissensions. For a time the Romanist party appeared to be completely disconcerted by the success which attended the Scottish forces under Munro, and the British regiments under Sir William and Sir Robert Stewart; but their courage revived on the arrival of O'Neill, an experienced officer, who had distinguished himself in the Spanish and Imperial service. In preparation for the coming of this distinguished leader, steps had been taken, chiefly through means of the clergy, to establish a formal confederacy among all the Roman Catholics of the kingdom. For the accomplishment of this object, a General Assembly of Romanist lords and bishops, with delegates both lay and clerical from the provinces and principal towns, was summoned to meet in Kilkenny in October 1642. At this convocation the Romish faith was declared to be again established, and the ecclesiastical estates of the kingdom were ordained to be the possessions of the Romish clergy. An oath of association was at the same time adopted, and appointed to be administered by the priesthood to every parishioner, binding him to consent to no peace except on the following conditions:

"1. That the Roman Catholics, both clergy and laity, have free and public exercise of the Roman Catholic religion and function throughout the kingdom, in as full lustre and splendour as it was in the reign of King Henry the Seventh.

"II. That the secular clergy of Ireland, viz., primates, archbishops, bishops, ordinaries, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, prebendaries, and other dignitaries, parsons, vicars, and all other pastors of the secular clergy, shall enjoy all manner of jurisdiction, privileges, immunities, in as full and ample a manner as was enjoyed within this realm during the reign of the late Henry the Seventh.

"III. That all laws and statutes made since the twentieth year of King Henry the Eighth, whereby any restraint, penalty, or restriction, is laid on the free exercise of the Roman Catholic religion within this kingdom, may be repealed and declared void by one or more acts of parliament.

"IV. That all primates, archbishops, bishops, deans, &c., shall hold and enjoy all the churches and church-livings in as large and ample a manner as the late Protestant clergy respectively enjoyed the same, on the first day of October 1641, together with all the profits, emoluments, perquisites, liberties, and rights to their respective sees and churches."

When this assembly had closed its sittings in January 1643, it was resolved to prosecute the war with increased vigour, and the conduct of military operations in Ulster was intrusted to General O'Neill. Charles, being involved in a contest with his own parliament in England, was disposed as soon as possible to come to terms with the Romanists in Ireland. To carry out this object he held secret correspondence with the leaders, and even appointed commissioners to treat with the supreme council of the confederates. At the very outset, however, the success of the negotiations was frustrated by the influence of the lords justices and the Irish privy council. But the Earl of Ormond, who was a ready tool in the hands of the king, at length obtained a cessation of hostilities between the royal forces and those of the confederacy: the Roman Catholics engaging to pay the king £30,000, and Ormond guaranteeing to them and to their clergy the undisturbed possession of all the towns, castles, and churches in those parts of the kingdom which were occupied by their forces at the time of signing the treaty. This arrangement, instead of being generally approved, was the means of spreading a very unfavourable impression, both in England and in Scotland, as to the feelings of the king. He was now looked upon as decidedly favourable to the Roman Catholics. The parliament were indignant at the cessation of hostilities in Ireland, and they resolved to impeach Ormond as a traitor. The conduct of Charles in his management of Irish affairs, and the concessions which had been made with his sanction to the Romanists in Ireland, while at this critical period it inflicted a deep injury on the royal cause, led both the English parliament and the Scottish estates to take a still deeper interest than before in the success of the covenant.

Nowhere was the cessation more unpopular than among the Presbyterians in Ulster. It had weakened their strength by affording the king an excuse for withdrawing the English regiments in Leinster, and thus gone far to counteract the encouraging advantages they had gained by their successful struggles against the enemy. Amid these depressing events, the people of Ulster gladly hailed the arrival of Captain O'Conolly in November 1643, bearing a copy of the covenant and letters recommending it to the commanders of the British and Scottish forces. In vain did the lords justices issue a proclamation, which they commanded to be read to every regiment, denouncing the covenant as treasonable and seditious. Such was the feeling in favour of the sacred bond among both officers and men, that the commanders durst not publish the proclamation.

Meantime two measures were adopted, both of which were most obnoxious to the Irish Presbyterians. The first was the promotion by Charles of Ormond to the dignity of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the second was the removal of the Scottish forces from Ulster, by order of the Scottish estates. So strong was the alarm which the very proposal of the withdrawal of the Scottish army excited, that the Presbyterians threatened to abandon the country. Their apprehensions, however, were speedily set at rest by the arrival of the intelligence, that the Scottish estates, taking into view the critical state of matters in Ireland generally, but more especially in Ulster, had agreed to countermand their order for the removal of the Scottish army.

On the 16th of October 1643, the English parliament requested the Scottish commissioners to see that the covenant "be taken by all the officers, soldiers, and Protestants of their nation in Ireland." The matter was ultimately intrusted to the Scottish ministers, who were deputed by the General Assembly to visit Ireland. In the summer, accordingly, of 1644, the covenant was subscribed with great solemnity throughout every part of Ulster, both by the military and the masses of the people. And the benefit of this holy bond of union was soon extensively felt, in the increased feeling of attachment which was everywhere manifested to the Presbyterian cause, as well as in the revived interest which began now to be taken in the cause of piety and vital godliness. From this period, according to Dr. Reid, the able historian of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, may be dated the SECOND REFORMATION with which the province of Ulster has been favoured.

The conflict between Charles and the parliament of England was keen and protracted. The parliament had, on their own authority and in direct opposition to the royal views, abolished prelacy, convoked the Westminster Assembly, enforced the solemn league and covenant, and substituted the Directory in room of the Book of Common Prayer. After a time, a general desire was felt in the country that the unseemly collision between the king and the houses of parliament should, if possible, be brought to a close. Commissioners were appointed on both sides, but on the subject of Ireland, as well as on that of church government and the signing of the covenant, the negotiations were completely unsuccessful. It was proposed by the parliamentary commissioners, that the king should join with them in declaring the cessation to be void, that the war against the Irish insurgents should be carried on under their direction, and should not come to a close without their consent. But Charles refused to allow a single concession to be made, and the treaty of Uxbridge was suddenly broken off. This infuriated procedure, on the part of the monarch, evidently arose from the expectations which he had formed of concluding a peace with the Irish Romanists. Intent upon this object, he dispatched the Earl of Glamorgan privately to Ireland, with full powers to negotiate with the confederates in the king's name. Without delay a secret treaty was concluded at Kilkenny, Glamorgan engaging, on the part of the king, not only that the penal laws against popery should be entirely repealed, but that the Roman church should be re-established and endowed throughout the greater part of Ireland. The Lord-Lieutenant Ormond, wholly ignorant of this secret treaty with the popish party, made strenuous efforts to detach the northern Presbyterians from the cause of the parliament, and to induce them to espouse the cause of the king. On learning this movement on the part of Ormond, the parliament took instant steps for redressing the grievances of which the Ulster Protestants complained, and thus preventing them from joining the royalist party. Such a union, however, was rendered hopeless, not by the efforts of the parliament, but by the accidental discovery of a full and authentic copy of the private treaty which Glamorgan had, in the name and with the perfect sanction of the king, concluded with the confederates. This unexpected disclosure of the real designs of Charles, followed by the arrival in Ulster of commissioners from the parliament with supplies of money, provisions, and clothing, turned the whole current of popular feeling in that quarter against Ormond, and in favour of the parliamentary party.

The interests of religion in general, and the cause of Presbyterianism in particular, received considerable impulse at this time throughout the North of Ireland. By the exertions of the presbytery, aided and encouraged by the commissioners from the parliament, immorality was repressed among all classes, and arrangements were made for the regular administration of religious ordinances and the faithful exercise of church discipline. These beneficial measures were not a little advanced by the timely arrival from Scotland of a deputation of ministers from the General Assembly, whose counsel and advice were felt by the presbytery to be peculiarly valuable. It was a critical time, more especially as the universal favour in which the Presbyterian form of church government was held by the people of Ulster had led several episcopal ministers, particularly in the county of Antrim, to act a disingenuous part, by conforming to Presbyterian usages, so far as might be sufficient to retain the confidence of the people. Several ministers, adopting this dishonourable line of conduct, formed themselves into an association, which they called a Presbytery, though it wanted the characteristics of a true Presbytery. This misnamed court, which was composed of ministers only, without the presence of elders, held no correspondence with the regularly constituted Presbytery, which sat stately at Carrickfergus, and whose proceedings they looked upon with jealousy, as likely to counteract their own secret design of restoring prelacy as soon as a fitting opportunity occurred. The army-presbytery understood the object of this mock-presbytery, and they resolved either wholly to suppress it, or to reconstruct it on a proper and more orderly footing.

Commissioners were sent in 1645 as formerly, to the Scottish General Assembly, with a petition from "the distressed Christians in Ulster for a further supply of ministers." The application was cordially granted, and several ministers were appointed "to repair unto the North of Ireland, and there to visit, comfort, instruct, and encourage the scattered flocks of Christ." At the same meeting of Assembly an application was favourably entertained from the Presbyterians of Derry and its vicinity, and three additional ministers commissioned to labour in that district. The arrival of the brethren thus commissioned by the Assembly to visit Ulster, gave great encouragement to the arduous work of the Presbytery in seeking to instruct their own flocks, and to convert those of the Roman Catholics to whom they had access. In the discharge of this latter part of their duty, it is painful to notice that they proposed to inflict civil penalties upon those Romanists who adhered to their errors notwithstanding all exertions made for their conversion; and an act of Presbytery to this effect was publicly read in the several parish churches.

At this period, the province of Ulster received a large accession to its Presbyterian population by the emigration from Scotland of great numbers, who sought shelter in flight from the evils of civil war, and the cruel and devastating operations of the Earl of Montrose. A peace had now been concluded between Ormond in behalf of the king, and the supreme council of the Irish confederates at Kilkenny. But instead of allaying, this peace only increased the commotions with which the country was agitated. The Pope's nuncio had exerted himself to the utmost to prevent the peace from being concluded, and his opposition having proved fruitless, he put himself at the head of a new party consisting of the extreme Romanists, thus rendering the state of matters in Ireland still more complicated. The extreme party was joined by O'Neill and the Ulster Irish, who were averse to the peace; and the coalition thus effected enabled O'Neill to descend upon Ulster with a large army, where he obtained a complete victory over the British and Scottish forces at Benburb near the Blackwater. This sad calamity threw the presbytery into no small distress and alarm, but it did not prevent them from labouring with the utmost assiduity for the diffusion of the gospel all around them. About this time the parliament of England passed an enactment which gave great offence to the Ulster Presbyterians, namely, that lay courts of appeal should be instituted in which the decisions of ecclesiastical courts might be reviewed. The other acts of this period, however, were received with the utmost satisfaction by the friends of presbytery in Ireland. Prelacy was abolished; the directory substituted for the Common Prayer Book; the government of the church was declared to be vested in congregational elderships, classes or presbyteries, provincial synods, and National or General Assemblies; and the power of these courts to license, ordain, suspend, or depose ministers, and to pass ecclesiastical censures, was confirmed. These enactments in favour of Presbyterianism were rendered somewhat unsatisfactory by the introduction of several restricted provisions, in deference to the views of the Independents on the one hand, and the Erastians on the other. The discussions which, in consequence, arose in England, did not extend to the North of Ireland, where the principles of the Presbyterian polity were fairly and fully carried out. To fill the vacant charges, young men were invited over from Scotland, and in this way the number of Presbyterian ministers in Ulster rapidly increased.

The victory of Benburb gave the opponents of the peace which Ormond had concluded with the confederate Romanists a complete ascendancy in Ireland, and the Pope's nuncio, supported by General O'Neill, pronounced the highest ecclesiastical censures upon all who had negotiated with Ormond. He imprisoned the members of the supreme council, formed a new council, placed himself at its head, and remodelled the army at his pleasure. Not contented with adopting these decided steps in maintenance of the interests of the Romish church, he took upon himself the office of "commander-in-chief of all Ireland, under the sovereignty of the Pope." The first act of the nuncio in this new capacity was to direct O'Neill to blockade Dublin, into which Ormond had retired. After holding out for a time, the city was surrendered to the parliamentary forces in Ulster, who took possession of it in March 1647, and in the course of a few months a treaty was concluded when Ormond retired to England.

On obtaining possession of the metropolis of Ireland, the parliament took steps for the removal of the Scottish forces from Ulster, having requested the estates of Scotland to issue an order for their recall. The British regiments in Ulster were put under the command of Colonel George Monck, who having fixed his head-quarters at Lisburn, was empowered by parliament to execute martial law within his quarters. Remarkable for duplicity and cunning, this military officer endeavoured to conciliate the presbytery, deluding them with the assurance that the parliament was devotedly attached to the Presbyterian government, and firmly adhered to the covenant. In the end of 1647, a treaty was hastily concluded by the Scottish commissioners without due authority from their estates. This treaty was usually known by the name of the Engagement, and by it Charles bound himself to establish the Presbyterian church-government and worship for three years, stipulating, however, that in doing so, he was neither obliged to desire the settling that government, nor to present any bills to that effect. The commissioners from Scotland, on the other hand, engaged to support Charles against the army and the parliament; and, if necessary, to provide an adequate military force to secure an honourable peace. Such a force it was difficult to collect, and in this emergency commissioners were despatched to the Scottish forces in Ulster to induce them to return and declare for the engagement. The presbytery caused a public protest against the engagement to be read from their pulpits, and sent a commissioner to the General Assembly in Scotland to express their cordial concurrence with the parent church in opposing this attempt to restore the king to the throne. After the execution of Charles by his subjects, the presbytery of Ulster openly declared their abhorrence of the murder of the king, and the overthrow of lawful authority in England. On this subject they drew up a representation, which was read from all their pulpits, and the Solemn League and Covenant was formally renewed by the people. Application was made to General Monck to have the covenant renewed by the army, but both the crafty commander and the council of war declined to take any steps in the matter. Soon after the general retired to England, from which he never returned again.

In 1649, Oliver Cromwell made his appearance in Ireland in the capacity of general, and by his vigorous conduct of the war, soon put an end to the brief ascendancy of the prelatical party, and completely changed the aspect of affairs in Ulster, rendering the republicans masters of the province, of which they held uninterrupted possession until the Restoration. The presbytery meanwhile persevered in protesting against the power of the usurpers, and in favour of a limited monarchy in the person of Charles II. These views of the Presbyterian church in Ireland were in complete accordance with those of the parent church in Scotland, which sent over ministers to Ulster to encourage the presbytery in their adherence to the king, who had pledged himself to support the covenant. Now that the republican party had obtained the ascendancy in Ireland, the Independents, to whom Cromwell belonged, sought to spread their principles in that country; but though for ten years they received a state endowment, and enjoyed the full patronage of government, they never succeeded in establishing themselves as a religious sect in the kingdom. So slight was the hold indeed which they had got of the affections of the people, that the Restoration of Charles had no sooner taken place, than almost all their ministers fled, and their congregations dispersed, so that in the course of a few years the Independents or Congregationalists had almost disappeared from the country.

One of the first steps which was taken by Cromwell and his party in England after the execution of Charles I., and the abolition of the House of Lords, was to frame an oath called the Engagement, in which all persons were required to swear to be faithful to the commonwealth of England as now established without a King or House of Lords. The Engagement was introduced into Ireland, and pressed upon all classes of the people, and heavy penalties threatened against all who refused to take the oath. Many of the Presbyterian ministers in consequence were compelled to abandon the country, and the few who chose to remain were forbidden to preach, and had their stipends taken from them; notwithstanding which they continued in the disguise of rustics to wander up and down in their own parishes, as well as in other places, embracing every opportunity of instructing the people in Divine truth.

The severity thus exercised towards the Presbyterian ministers in Ulster was somewhat relaxed when Cromwell assumed the title of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth. Having dispatched his son Henry to ascertain the state of parties in Ireland, the beneficial effects of his visit were soon manifest in the improvement which took place in the religious condition of Ulster. The Presbyterian ministers were permitted freely to officiate, and those who had either fled to Scotland, or been banished to that country, were allowed to return to their flocks. The church began now to exercise the utmost caution in the admission of ministers, and various acts were passed by the presbytery bearing upon this subject. The number of congregations rapidly increased in all parts of the north of Ireland, and it was found necessary no longer to confine the meetings of presbytery to one place, but to have three different meetings in different districts of the province. These meetings were not constituted into presbyteries, strictly so called, but they acted by commission of the presbytery. They met at Down, Antrim, and Route with Lagan. In 1657, another division of the presbytery took place, Route being separated from Lagan. Shortly after another meeting was formed in Tyrone, so that the meetings became five in number; and this arrangement continued till 1702, when nine presbyteries were formed, which were subsequently increased to twenty-four.

The Ulster Presbyterian churches were not a little distracted in the middle of the seventeenth century, by some converts being made from among their members to the opinions of the Quakers. (See FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.) The first regular meeting of this body in Ulster was formed at Lurgan in 1654. Edmun-

sen, a zealous supporter of Quaker principles, was imprisoned at Armagh for haranguing the people at fairs and other public places on religious matters, proclaiming the unlawfulness of tithes, and the impropriety of public ordinances and of a hired ministry. Cromwell's party knowing that the Presbyterians in Ireland were at heart in favour of the legitimate monarch, gave his son Henry strict charges to watch narrowly all their movements. The Irish council frequently issued proclamations for days of fasting and of thanksgiving; these, however, the presbytery uniformly refused to observe. Henry viewed this resistance to authority with indignation; but on being promoted by his father to the office of lord-deputy of Ireland, his whole policy underwent a remarkable change, the Presbyterians being now treated with confidence and favour. In March 1658, he summoned a number of the more eminent Presbyterian and Independent ministers to meet in Dublin, and confer with him on the subject of their maintenance. The meeting, which consisted of thirty ministers, continued nearly five weeks, and the result of their deliberations was, that Henry caused arrangements to be made for each minister receiving a regular stipend of not less than £100. "But this," says Adair, "through the uncertainty of these times came to nought before it could be well effected." The attention of the assembled ministers was next called to several other matters deeply affecting the interests of the country, such as the instruction and conversion of the Roman Catholics, the promotion of peace and unity among all godly ministers though of different churches, the due observance of the Sabbath, and the suppression of heresy and profaneness. It was Henry's earnest desire to promote in every way the improvement of Ireland; and although the death of his father, Oliver Cromwell, led to a change in the government of England, by the succession of his eldest brother Richard to the Protectorate, Henry was still continued as head of Irish affairs, and raised to the dignity of Lord Lieutenant. Under this excellent and prudent ruler, Ireland enjoyed unusual tranquillity, and became every day more prosperous. The presbytery improved the precious opportunity which this season of internal quiet afforded to visit remote districts of Ulster, and settle ordained ministers over vacant congregations.

The government of Henry was of but short duration. His brother Richard, having proved himself quite incapable of managing the affairs of England, was deprived of his office as Protector, and the government became once more republican. Henry thereupon resigned the lord lieutenantancy of Ireland, and withdrew to England. The Irish Presbyterians, always opposed to republican government, agreed generally with the Scottish Presbyterians in their desire for the restoration of the exiled king. A general convention of Protestants met in Dublin about the beginning of February 1660, which appointed a fast to be kept throughout Ireland, one of the causes assigned for it being breach of covenant. The members of the convention were for the most part favourable to prelaey, and after sitting three months, they agreed to send commissioners to England desiring the restoration of the former laws and church government and worship.

Charles II. had in the meantime been brought back to England and placed upon the throne. In the days of his adversity, he had made great professions of attachment to the cause of presbytery, but in a short time after he had received the reins of government, he threw off the mask, restored prelaey and the Liturgy, denounced the covenant, and all who adhered to it, and refused toleration to non-conformists. The Presbyterians of Ireland, like those of Scotland, had been deceived by the hollow and insincere professions of the peridious monarch, and accordingly, immediately after the convention had closed its sittings, they sent over a deputation to the king, to lay before him their state, and solicit protection. At the same time also they sent a petition for the settling of religion according to the rule of reformation against popery, prelaey, heresy, &c., according to the covenant. On their arrival in London, the deputation, learning that the king had declared for prelaey and disowned the covenant, were requested to modify their petition by expunging all mention of the covenant and prelaey. They did so, and the king having given them an audience, listened respectfully to their petition, and sent them away with fair promises. In the meantime it was publicly known that Charles had actually named bishops for every diocese in Ireland, and that they were preparing to proceed to occupy their different sees.

For seven years the Presbyterians of Ulster had enjoyed an interval of peace and growing prosperity, during which they had gathered round them nearly the whole population of the province. They had now seventy ministers, and nearly eighty congregations, comprising a population of not fewer than 100,000 souls. The ministers were associated in five presbyteries, subordinate to a general presbytery or synod, which met usually four times in each year. In worship, government, and discipline, the Irish Presbyterians were entirely conformed to the Church of Scotland. Their church was now rooted in the affections of the people, and consolidated in all its arrangements. But a season of severe persecution was fast approaching. The prelates whom Charles had nominated to the vacant sees in Ireland repaired to their different dioceses. On the 27th of January 1661, two archbishops and ten bishops were consecrated in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. This was immediately followed by a proclamation issued by the lords justices, forbidding all unlawful meetings, under which meetings of presbytery were included, and directing the sheriffs and other officers to prevent or disperse them. In vain did the Ulster clergy apply for the exemption of their presbyterian meetings from the application of this proclamation; they were told that they might preach on the Lord's Day, and exercise other pastoral duties, but they must not dare to hold meetings for the exercise of discipline in church affairs.

The first who commenced active persecution against the Presbyterian ministers was the celebrated Jeremy Taylor, who had been appointed to the see of Down and Connor. This prelate declared in one day no fewer than thirty-six congregations vacant, on no other ground than that their ministers had not been ordained by bishops. Curates and priests were named by the bishop to the vacant charges. The rest of the brethren in the other dioceses were gradually ejected in the same way, and although they still continued preaching for a time, all of them, except two, were forced to desist within two or three months after their places were declared vacant. The two thus favoured were allowed through intercession in their behalf with the bishop, to exercise their ministry for six months after their brethren were silenced. All the Presbyterian ministers were now not only deprived of their churches and maintenance, but forbidden under heavy penalties to preach, baptize, or publicly exhort their people. In these distressing circumstances, these faithful servants of Christ had no alternative left them but to labour diligently in private. Accordingly, they visited from house to house, and held meetings for religious exercises under cloud of night. Sixty-one Presbyterian ministers in Ulster were at this time deposed from the ministry, and ejected from their benefices by the northern prelates. The summary nature of the steps thus taken in the case of the Presbyterians of Ireland, is to be accounted for by the fact that prelaey had never been abolished by law in that country, and therefore at the Restoration, being still the legal establishment, it was immediately recognized and enforced. Both in England and Scotland, on the contrary, prelaey having been already abolished, new acts of parliament required to be passed before the bishops had power to proceed against non-conformists. Of the seventy ministers who belonged at this trying time to the different presbyteries throughout Ulster, seven conformed to episcopacy, and joined the now dominant church, consenting publicly to renounce the covenant, and to be re-ordained by their bishop.

After an interval of twenty years, the Irish parliament met in May 1661, and besides establishing the former laws in regard to episcopacy in Ireland, they issued a declaration forbidding all to preach who would not conform, and ordered it to be read by every minister in Ireland to his congregation on the next Sabbath after receiving it. An act was passed by the same parliament for burning the Solemn League and Covenant; and this was accordingly done in all the cities and towns throughout the kingdom, the magistrates in every place being directors and witnesses. At this solemn time, when such deeds were transacted in the land, the presbyterian ministers in the north gave themselves much to prayer, and held frequent conferences in private for mutual encouragement and advice in such critical times. For a few months in the beginning of the year 1662, there was a partial relaxation of the penal statutes against non-conformity, both in the case of the Romanists and of the Presbyterians; but the bishops becoming alarmed at these indications of toleration, persuaded the lords justices to issue a proclamation to the effect that as recusants, non-conformists, and sectaries, had grown worse by clemency, no further indulgence would be granted by the state. A change now took place in the government, the Duke of Ormond being appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland; but his policy, in so far as regarded the Presbyterians, was the same as that of the lords justices. A deputation was sent by the Ulster brethren to wait upon the Duke with a petition for immunity from bishops and ceremonies, which, however, met with no success.

About this time a conspiracy, generally known by the name of Blood's Plot, was formed by some restless spirits for the overthrow of the government. Several concurring circumstances gave rise to the suspicion that some Irish Presbyterian ministers were to some extent connected with the plot. Such an opportunity was gladly seized for creating a prejudice against the whole body, and in consequence the greater number of the ministers of the north were either banished, imprisoned, or compelled to flee, though entirely unconnected with the conspiracy. It was to the credit of the Duke of Ormond, that when he ascertained the innocence of the Presbyterians he gave them exemption for six months from all annoyance on account of non-conformity. In the course of that time, Bramhall the primate, having died suddenly, his successor being a person of a mild spirit, prolonged the indulgence for six months longer. The ministers began gradually to resume their duties among their flocks, and in the course of four or five years the Presbyterians in Ulster had nearly recovered their former position in the province. In the year 1668, they began to build churches, and religious ordinances were publicly dispensed. The clergy held also monthly meetings of presbytery, though in private houses, and resumed their entire ecclesiastical functions, with the exception of licensing and ordaining ministers, so that in the beginning of the following year they had attained to considerable freedom. But the activity which was now displayed by the Ulster Presbyterians excited the jealousy of the Episcopalians; and Bishop Leslie of Raphoe, in particular, seemed inclined to take violent steps against the ministers of his diocese, but was compelled by the government to pause in his course of intolerance.

In 1672, Charles II., contrary to all expectation, granted a yearly pension of £600 to the Ulster Presbyterian ministers, which was distributed in equal proportions to all the ministers who were in the country in the year 1660, and on their death to their widows and orphans. The warrant for this grant continued in force for ten years, till 1682, though it was not probably paid regularly during that time. There is a tradition, indeed, that this Regium Donum was enjoyed by the ministers for only one year.

For several years after this period, little or nothing occurred of importance as regarded the church. Ministers continued to be planted by the presbyteries, not only in the north, but also in the south and west. Occasional instances of petty persecution still happened. Many of the laity were summoned before the bishop's court for refusing to attend on the established worship, and subjected to heavy fines or to excommunication. In 1684 a severe persecution was commenced anew in Ulster. The Presbyterian meeting-houses were closed, and public worship among them prohibited. This continued during the two following years; and such was the deplorable state of matters in the counties of Derry and Donegal, that several ministers from these parts removed to America, and laid the foundation of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA (which see).

Charles II. died in 1685, and was succeeded by his brother, James II., who proved himself to be a despotic monarch, and a bigoted supporter of Romanism. He commenced his government of Ireland by disarming the militia, who were almost exclusively Protestant. He next removed the lords justices, and intrusted the government to Lord Clarendon, who was sworn into office as lord-lieutenant in January 1686, but only a year had elapsed when this nobleman was recalled, and the most obnoxious Romanist in the empire, the notorious Lord Tyreconnel, appointed in his room. James seemed to be bent on establishing Popery in Ireland, but Tyreconnel had a still further object in view, to separate Ireland from the crown of England, and should the king die without male issue, to have it erected into an independent kingdom under the protection of France. To this treasonable scheme devised by Tyreconnel, Louis XIV. was privy, having by secret correspondence been made fully cognizant of the plan. The new lord-lieutenant proceeded to take steps for carrying out his project. He put the military power in the hands of the Romanists, and transferred to the same party the chief civil and corporate offices of the kingdom. The corporations of Ulster were also reconstructed with the view of placing them under the exclusive authority of the Roman Catholics. The ecclesiastical affairs of Ireland were regulated on the same principles. The Romish prelates received liberal salaries out of the revenues of the vacant sees; they wore their official costume in public, and in many cases they laid hold of the tithes for their own use. To encourage the established clergy to join the Church of Rome, they were allowed still to retain their benefices even after leaving the established church. At length, James issued his celebrated Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, suspending the execution of all the penal laws for religious offences, and prohibiting the imposition of religious tests as qualifications for office. This Declaration, which extended to Ireland, afforded seasonable relief to the Presbyterians from persecution. Their places of worship, which had been closed for five years, were now re-opened; stated meetings of presbytery were publicly held, and all ecclesiastical functions exercised as formerly.

The year 1688 was probably the most eventful year in the whole history of the British empire. Liberty lay prostrate at the feet of a despotic sovereign, and through royal influence Romanism was fast assuming the ascendancy. In these circumstances the Presbyterians, losing sight of all that they had suffered at the hands of the Episcopalians, cordially joined with them in opposing the common enemy. Any active movement was next to impossible, the army being almost to a man composed of Roman Catholics. But in the midst of the gloom which seemed to hang over the prospects of the Irish Protestants, the news arrived of the landing of the Prince of Orange in England, and suddenly the whole aspect of affairs was changed. The Presbyterians were the first to hail the arrival of the prince, and from Ulster a representative was sent to wait upon his highness, and in their name congratulate him on his arrival, and wish him success in his great undertaking.

At this moment, when the expectations of the Irish Presbyterians were at their height, an unfounded rumour was raised of an intended massacre of the Protestants of Ireland on a particular day. All rushed to arms in self-defence, and although the report, being false, soon subsided, the Protestants of Ulster still continued their defensive preparations. A Protestant association was formed in each of the counties; a council of war was elected, and a commander-in-chief or general for each county; while a general council of union was appointed to sit at Hillsborough for each of the associated counties of Ulster. No sooner had the organization of the northern Presbyterians been completed than Tyrconnel resolved to send the flower of his army to Ulster in order to disperse their associations, and reduce them to subjection; but before taking this step he issued a proclamation offering pardon to all who should lay down their arms, with the exception of ten of the leading Protestants of Ulster, and threatening those who rejected this offer with the penalties of high treason. This insidious offer of Tyrconnel was unanimously rejected by the general council of the Protestants, and they were all the more encouraged to give a decided refusal, by the arrival of a letter from the Prince of Orange approving of their conduct, and promising them speedy and effectual support. On receiving this welcome intelligence, the Presbyterians of the north immediately proclaimed King William and Queen Mary with the most cordial demonstrations of joy.

The Irish army advanced rapidly upon the northern counties, and achieved a decided victory over the Protestant forces at Dromore, thus opening to themselves the whole of the north-east of Ulster. Nor were the Protestants more successful on the western side of Lough Neagh than they had been on the eastern. At length Derry was the only city in which they could find a refuge, and their enemies were now resolved, if possible, to deprive them of this last resort. King James marched northwards from Dublin at the head of twelve thousand men, and a considerable train of artillery. He proceeded to blockade the small but fortified town of Derry. Meanwhile, in the disturbed state of the country, public worship was almost wholly suspended. Nearly fifty Irish ministers took refuge in Scotland, and were settled in various parts of the kingdom.

The enemy, with King James at their head, had concentrated their forces around the walls of Derry, which was garrisoned by about seven thousand brave Protestants, who were resolved to perish in its defence rather than surrender. The siege commenced on the 18th of April 1689, and for the long period of a hundred and five days did the Protestants maintain their ground, until, on the last day of July, the Irish army abandoned their trenches, and raised the siege, having lost 100 officers, and between 8,000 and 9,000 men. Enniskillen was maintained with equally undaunted bravery and remarkable success. Encouraged by these victories, the Protestants were still further cheered by the arrival of a large army from England commanded by the Duke of Schomberg. The timely aid thus sent them by King William relieved their minds from much anxiety. In a short time Ulster was restored to comparative tranquillity, the inhabitants returned to their homes, and business was resumed with its usual activity. The ministers gradually returned to their charges, and as soon as the presbyteries could be held, a solemn day of thanksgiving was appointed, and an address drawn up to the Duke of Schomberg, which was presented to him before he left Belfast. The deputation which was sent from Ulster to congratulate King William on the glorious Revolution, reported to the brethren, on their return, that they had received a most gracious answer to their petition, and a promise that an annual pension of £800 should be conferred on the ministers. Ample protection and toleration was now granted to the Presbyterians of Ulster, who are accustomed, even at this day, to ascribe the remarkable prosperity, which has since attended their church, to the benefits conferred on them by the reign of William of glorious memory.

Strongly attached to King William, it afforded the Irish Protestants the highest satisfaction to learn that his majesty had resolved to place himself at the head of his army in Ireland, and to conduct the war in person. On the king's arrival, the Presbyterian as well as the Episcopalian ministers, hastened to express their loyalty to their sovereign, and their devoted attachment to his cause. One of his first acts, after setting foot on the shores of Ireland, was to authorise the payment of £1,200 yearly to the Presbyterian clergy of Ulster, in which originated the grant called the Regium Donum or Royal Bounty, still enjoyed by their successors. The victories of William, the confident assurance of the royal protection, and the pecuniary grant which they had just received, tended to encourage them in the re-establishment of their church in the most favourable circumstances. The Presbyterians were at this period by far the majority of the Protestant population in Ulster.

Now that not only perfect toleration, but even royal favour, was enjoyed by the Presbyterian ministers in the north, they resolved to resume their synodical meetings, and to hold them half yearly. Accordingly, the first regular meeting of synod was held at Belfast on the 26th of September 1690. In the discharge of all their ministerial duties the ministers suffered no molestation either from the church or the state. The penal statutes against them were still in force, yet they had become a dead letter, and several Presbyterians were in the enjoyment of political and municipal offices. King William now set himself to the repeal of several obnoxious statutes, which seriously affected the Ulster Presbyterians. He commenced with abolishing the oath of supremacy, and substituting in its room the same oaths of fidelity and allegiance which had been in force in England since the year 1688. This was no small boon to the Presbyterians, as it opened up to them, without a violation of their consciences, all the civil, military, and municipal offices of the kingdom. But while their civil privileges were thus enlarged, their religious liberties were still under statutory restrictions. And this was all the more surprising, that the English Dissenters had, from the beginning of William's reign, enjoyed the benefit of the toleration act, though, in consequence of the sacramental test act, they were incapable of holding any public office.

The Irish parliament, which had not sat for twenty-six years, was convened towards the close of the year 1692; and in a few days after the session commenced, Lord Sydney, the lord-lieutenant, by the direction of the king, introduced a bill for the toleration of Dissenters similar to that which was in force in England. Through the influence of the bishops, however, the bill was defeated, and William's good intentions were frustrated. And yet practically such a measure was scarcely needed in Ireland at the time, in so far as the Presbyterians were concerned. They enjoyed the utmost freedom in the exercise of religious worship; all places of trust and power were open to them, and the most friendly co-operation existed between them and the Episcopalians, in all that regarded the best interests of the people. The pleasing harmony which thus prevailed among the different religious denominations in Ulster was first broken by Dr. King, bishop of Derry, who, in 1693, published a pamphlet with the view of showing the Presbyterians that their modes of worship were mere human inventions, and unwarranted by the Word of God, and that those of the Episcopal church were alone founded on the Bible. This production was not published in the first instance, but circulated privately among the Presbyterian ministers in the diocese. Contrary, however, to the author's wish, it found its way to London, where it was reprinted, and soon became known throughout the kingdom. A keen controversy now ensued, which unhappily roused the most bitter feelings of animosity among the different classes of Protestants at a time when unity was peculiarly desirable.

The king and his ministers were still bent on extending toleration to the Irish Presbyterians, and a new parliament having met in Dublin in 1695, another attempt was made, at the request of the king, to pass an act similar to the toleration act in England. Through the determined opposition of the High Church party, this second effort was equally unsuccessful. The subject of toleration was now discussed with great vigour and earnestness through the press. Pamphlets appeared on both sides manifesting no small ability and argumentative power. While this controversy was raging as to the expediency of extending toleration to the Irish Presbyterians, an act was passed in the Irish parliament, which met in 1697, guaranteeing ample toleration to the French Presbyterians, a large number of whom had settled in Ireland after the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1682. In consequence of the encouragement thus given to the French refugees, French nonconforming congregations sprang up in Dublin, Carlow, Cork, Waterford, and other places, whose ministers continued to receive salaries from government so long as a single French congregation existed in Ireland.

But although the Irish Presbyterians were unable to secure an act of toleration, they were, notwithstanding, making rapid progress both in numbers and influence. In the principal towns of Ulster they had risen to the highest offices in the municipal corporations. And while new congregations were formed in different parts of the province, an attempt was made to rear up a native ministry, by the establishment of a philosophical seminary at Killileagh. The five original presbyteries were now, in 1697, distributed into two particular synods, or sub-synods as they were sometimes called, which were appointed to meet at Coleraine and Dromore in the months of March and October of each year. The presbytery of Antrim, also, having become too large, was divided into two presbyteries, that of Antrim and that of Belfast. This arrangement of synods and presbyteries continued during the remainder of William's reign.

The flourishing condition of the Presbyterian church in Ulster began now to excite the jealousy of the clergy of the Establishment. The consequence was, that the presbyteries and synods were subjected to new grievances. It was demanded, in some places, that the burial service of the English Liturgy should be read by an Episcopal clergyman; oaths were required of them in other places which they could not conscientiously take, and attempts were made, for the first time, to prevent the Presbyterian ministers from celebrating marriages among their own people. Prosecutions were instituted against the ministers, in several instances, and heavy penalties imposed.

The Presbyterian body in Ulster felt it to be a very great hardship that the validity of marriages celebrated by their ministers should be called in question, more especially as they had been accustomed to such marriages from their first settlement in Ireland. After submitting to the annoyances connected with this matter, they resolved to bring the whole subject before the lord-lieutenant, and entreat the interposition of government in their behalf. The king, to whom the point was referred by his deputy, expressed his decided disapproval of the proceedings carried on against the Presbyterians, and his earnest wish that some measure should be devised for putting a stop to the prosecutions, without interfering with the rights of the Established Church. But instead of the royal wish being complied with, the prosecutions in the bishops' courts against marriages continued to multiply to such a degree, that in less than half a-year another appeal for redress was made to the Irish government. Their hope of obtaining relief from this or any other grievance, however, was now much diminished, King William having died in March 1701. No party in the kingdom mourned more deeply the loss of this excellent monarch than the Irish Presbyterians, in whose interests he had uniformly manifested a lively concern.

Deprived of their greatest earthly protector and friend, they were still exposed to prosecutions on account of marriages, and rumours began to spread of a design to suspend the Regium Donum, which had been granted by William. The synod, accordingly, lodged complaints on both these heads with the lord lieutenant; and while little satisfaction was given in the matter of the prosecutions, the Royal Bounty was continued as formerly, Queen Anne having issued letters-patent constituting thirteen ministers trustees for the distribution of the grant. But through the influence of the High Church party certain modifications were introduced into the mode of its distribution, in order to render the ministers more directly dependent on the government. To accomplish this object, the power of allocating the amount among the ministers was withdrawn from the trustees, and vested in the lord-lieutenant. Thus the grant was no longer divided share and share alike, but the plan of arrangement was now laid down in these words: "To be distributed among such of the non-conforming ministers, by warrant from the lord-lieutenant or other chief governor or governors for the time being, in such manner as he or they shall find necessary for our service, or the good of that kingdom." And yet, notwithstanding these written modifications, the Regium Donum seems to have continued to be distributed in equal proportions to all the ministers as formerly.

So rapidly had the Presbyterian congregations in Ulster increased in number, that it became necessary to organize anew the public judicatories of the church. Accordingly, the whole ministers were now arranged in nine presbyteries, distributed into three sub-synods, all being under the superintendence of one general synod, which continued to meet annually at Antrim in the first week of June. To raise the standard of theological acquirements among her young men, the church enacted, in 1702, that the curriculum of study should include not less than four years' study of divinity, besides the regular course of philosophy. The standards of the Church of Scotland, which she rightly regarded as her parent church, were those to which all her ministers were required steadfastly to adhere.

Queen Anne had no sooner ascended the throne, than she put herself in the hands of the High Church party, who were strongly opposed to the Presbyterians of Ulster. Accordingly, in the first English parliament of this reign, a bill was passed extending to Ireland the provisions of an act of King William's last parliament, by which all persons in office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, were required to take the oath of abjuration, which declared that the person pretending to be king of England, under the title of James III., had no right or title whatsoever to the crown. This oath was taken by almost all Presbyterian ministers in Ireland. There were, however, a few who scrupled conscientiously to take the oath, and who on this account received the name of non-jurors. These were looked upon by High Churchmen as Jacobites, and disloyal, and occasion was taken to cast the same reproach, however unjustly, on the whole Presbyterian body. For a time the non-juring ministers were unmolested, but at length various attempts were made, though without success, to put the law in force against them. Such was the hostility of the High Church party to the Presbyterians, that they prevailed upon the Irish House of Commons to pass a resolution, "That the pension of £1,200 per annum granted to the Presbyterian ministers in Ulster is an unnecessary branch of the establishment." But the government declined to carry out this resolution of the Commons, and the grant was continued as formerly.

A heavy blow was dealt at this time by the High Churchmen in Ireland against the Presbyterians. A bill was framed ostensibly to prevent the further progress of Popery, and as its provisions applied exclusively to the Romanists, it received the support of the Presbyterians, but when sent to England, a clause was introduced into it by the English ministry, no doubt with the full approbation of the Queen, "requiring all persons holding any office, civil or military, or receiving any pay or salary from the crown, or having command or place of trust from the sovereign," to take the sacrament in the Established Church within three months after every such appointment. By this Sacramental Test, dissenters of all kinds, including of course the Irish Presbyterians, were excluded from all offices of public trust and emolument. The consequence was, that most of the magistrates throughout Ulster were deprived of their commissions. For a time, indeed, it appeared doubtful whether the ministers were not prevented by the act from accepting the Regium Donum, but on consulting the solicitor-general, the synod were assured that they might continue to receive it with safety, inasmuch as it did not accrue to them out of any office or place of trust bestowed by the sovereign.

In vain were petitions presented to the Irish parliament by the Presbyterians and their friends, calling for the repeal of the Sacramental Test clause: all such petitions were utterly disregarded. Nay, such was the intolerant spirit which characterized this parliament, that an attempt was even made wholly to prevent Presbyterian ministers from celebrating marriages, but happily the design was not carried out, and no attempt was again made to interfere with the validity of Presbyterian marriages. Still further to injure the Presbyterian church, the parliament passed a resolution, which, though general, was designed to crush the philosophy school at Killileagh, in which young men were trained for the ministry in Ulster. The resolution ran thus:—"That the erecting and continuing any seminary for the instruction and education of youth in principles contrary to the Established Church and government, tends to create and perpetuate misunderstandings among Protestants;" but this resolution was entirely inoperative, and failed to inflict the slightest injury on the seminary at which it was aimed. The same party were more successful in their efforts to injure the non-juring ministers who had hitherto been allowed to remain unmolested; the parliament having been prevailed upon to pass two resolutions, which compelled Mr. McBride, one of the non-jurors, to quit his ministerial charge in Belfast, and to retire to Scotland, where he was forced to continue for three years.

Meanwhile the Presbyterian church was prosecuting her Master's work with the utmost activity and zeal. In 1705, it was enacted by the synod, that all persons licensed or ordained should subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith, as the confession of their faith. A number of congregations having sprung up in the south and west of the kingdom, a missionary fund was now instituted for their support, and active measures were taken for supplying with ordinances the scattered members of the church in remote districts of the country. It was the earnest wish of Queen Anne, and the Whig party, which had acquired the ascendancy in England, to obtain a repeal of the obnoxious Sacramental Test clause, but the High Church party, which still predominated in the Irish parliament, were resolved to uphold the test with even increased rigour. Circumstances soon afforded them an opportunity of displaying their zeal in this direction. It so happened that, with the exception of Derry, the Presbyterians in Ulster, who had held municipal offices before the passing of the Sacramental Test clause, still retained them, though they had ceased to act. This peculiarity having been accidentally discovered in the case of Belfast, the House of Commons took the opportunity of setting forth a declaration to the effect, that the office of Burgess was vacated in every case in which the occupant had not qualified by becoming a conformist. In consequence of this declaration, Presbyterian burgesses were everywhere throughout Ulster superseded by Episcopalians. The impolicy of the Sacramental Test clause became more especially apparent in the spring of 1708, when the French king attempted to land the Pretender in Scotland. This event excited great alarm among the Presbyterians in Ulster, from their vicinity to Scotland, but numbers of them refused to be enrolled in the militia lest they should be brought under the operation of the Sacramental Test. It was now plain to thoughtful men of all parties, that some remedy must be devised for so serious an evil. Efforts, therefore, were again put forth to procure a repeal of the obnoxious clause from the English parliament, as the Oath of Supremacy had been repealed in the previous reign. It was found, however, that any proposal of the kind would meet with insurmountable opposition, and therefore, it was judged to be quite inexpedient to bring forward the subject in the meantime.

The prospect of obtaining the speedy removal of the test, as well as the redress of their other grievances, now became brighter in consequence of the appointment to the government of Ireland of the Earl of Wharton, who had long been considered the leader of the Presbyterian interest of England. But the nomination of this nobleman to the lord-lieutenancy aroused the High Church party to redouble their exertions to maintain the test. At this crisis Dean Swift appeared, wielding his powerful pen in opposition to the claims of Presbyterian and other Dissenters. Amid all opposition, however, the Presbyterian church was still on the increase. Its congregations numbered more than one hundred and thirty, and it was proposed in the synod of 1708, that the supreme court should now consist of delegates from each presbytery, as in the case of the Church of Scotland. This proposal was fully discussed at the meeting of synod in the following year, and in consequence of the strong opposition which it met with from a number of ministers and elders, it was first postponed, and ultimately abandoned.

In 1710, the synod of Ulster resolved to adopt measures for preaching the gospel to the native Irish in their own language. This important work had been too long neglected, and as the Episcopal church had recently awakened to their duty in this matter, the Presbyterian church now followed their example. Seven ministers and three probationers, who were able to preach in Irish, were appointed to itinerate for this purpose, carrying along with them a supply of Bibles, Confessions of Faith, and Catechisms, all in the Irish language. But the troubles of the times prevented this scheme from being carried out to any great extent. To this period also must be referred the origin of what has been called "The General Fund," instituted "for the support of religion in and about Dublin and the South of Ireland, by assisting and supporting the Protestant dissenting interest against unreasonable persecutions, and for the education of youth designed for the ministry among Protestant dissenters, and for assisting Protestant dissenting congregations that are poor and unable to provide for their ministers." Large sums of money were contributed to this fund, by means of which ordinances were provided for many districts in the south of Ireland.

Meantime the Earl of Wharton, who had been again appointed lord-lieutenant, endeavoured, though without success, to prevail upon the parliament to repeal the Sacramental Test. A few months only had elapsed, however, when the High Church interest having re-acquired the ascendancy at the English court, the government of Ireland was transferred once more to the Duke of Ormond. This change in the rulers of the country led of course to an entire change in the whole aspect of public affairs. The penalties of the law were now put in force on the few non-juring ministers in Ulster, and three of them were compelled to seek safety in flight. The Irish parliament, but more especially the House of Lords, continued to manifest the most undisguised hostility to the Presbyterians. A representation and address was drawn up to the Queen's Majesty relating to the dissenting ministers, and though this document professed to narrate a number of grievances which the Episcopalians of Ireland suffered at the hands of the Presbyterians, the real design of the whole was to urge upon Queen Anne the withdrawal of the Royal Bounty. Another address having the same object in view was presented by the Convocation of the clergy. The Presbyterians, therefore, in self-defence, hastened to lay at the foot of the throne a faithful statement of their principles, vindicating themselves from the misrepresentations which their enemies had so industriously spread. Government, and even the Queen personally, received from the High Church party in Ireland numerous and earnest letters calling for active steps to be taken against the Ulster Presbyterians. Pamphlets were published of the most abusive and inflammatory character, accusing this peaceable and useful class of her Majesty's subjects, of disloyalty and rebellion. Not contented, however, with calumniating them by private correspondence and through the press, the High Church party proceeded to acts of open persecution. Through their influence the presbytery of Monaghan was summoned before the magistrates of the district, and indicted for a riot, simply because they held meetings in their capacity as a church-court. Such an outrage could not of course be borne in silence; and the synod having appealed in vain to the lords justices in Dublin, laid their case before the Queen, the lord-lieutenant, and the Earl of Oxford, who was at that time prime minister. In reply, instructions were sent from Government to the lords justices, that if the indictment should be sustained by the grand jury, the trial should be conducted before the Queen's Bench in Dublin, where it would be free from the influence of local prejudices, and more completely under the control of government. Before the day of trial came, the prosecution was stopped. But the Presbyterian clergy were now in various ways made the victims of that intolerant spirit which had been revived by the House of Lords and the Convocation. Ministers were prosecuted for celebrating marriages, and laymen for teaching schools and refusing to act as churchwardens.

The resignation of the Duke of Ormond, and the appointment to the lord-lieutenancy of the Duke of Shrewsbury, a man of a mild and conciliatory spirit, induced the Ulster synod to make another attempt to obtain the repeal of the Sacramental Test; on this also, as on former occasions, they were unsuccessful. The influence of the High Church party was now strong, and at their suggestion the Royal Bounty grant was entirely withdrawn in 1714 by the Irish government. Lawsuits still continued to be instituted against the Presbyterian clergy for celebrating marriages. And the change which had recently taken place in the political affairs of England by the ascendancy of Bolingbroke, was the means of adding still more grievances to those which already existed. A bill having been introduced into the English parliament for preventing the growth of schism, a clause was proposed and passed in the House of Lords extending its operation to Ireland. By this measure every Irish Presbyterian, who ventured to teach a school, except of the very humblest description, was liable to be imprisoned for three months. Encouraged by the assaults thus made at headquarters on the liberties of the Ulster synod, the Episcopalians in Ireland openly added insult to injury, and so far did they carry matters, that in the towns of Antrim, Downpatrick, and Rathfriland, the Presbyterian churches were actually nailed up. In the midst of these gross acts of persecution, and on the very day on which the schism bill came into operation, the unexpected death of Queen Anne checked the proceedings of the High Church party, and introduced an era of comparative liberty and peace.

The accession of George I. to the throne of England, was welcomed by the Irish Presbyterians as likely to secure to them the full possession of civil and religious freedom. They hastened therefore to lay their claims before the king and his ministry, craving the repeal of the Sacramental Test, full legal protection for their worship and government, and the restoration and increase of the grant of the Royal Bounty. Knowing that the Act of Toleration had been obtained by the English dissenters, on condition that they subscribed the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Established Church, excepting those which related to discipline, the Irish Presbyterians held a meeting at Antrim, for the purpose of maturely considering on what principles they would claim the protection of the laws. This point was carefully deliberated upon, and it was resolved that as they could not conscientiously subscribe the Thirty-Nine Articles, they were quite willing and ready to substitute subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith; but a few congregations in Dublin and the South of Ireland having been educated among the English dissenters were averse to subscribe the Westminster Confession; and in deference to the scruples of these brethren, the meeting proceeded to prepare a special formula to be substituted in room of the Westminster confession, in case the government should refuse to admit of their subscription of the latter. The formula agreed upon by the meeting was in these words:—"I profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ the eternal Son of God, the true God, and in God the Holy Ghost, and that these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power, and glory. I believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament were given by Divine inspiration, and that they are a perfect rule of Christian faith and practice. And pursuant to this belief, I agree to all the doctrines common to the Protestant churches both at home and abroad." A deputation from the Presbyterian body proceeded to London, and were received graciously by the king, who appeared to be sensibly moved in listening to the detail of their grievances; and by his command the grant of Royal Bounty was forthwith renewed, and hopes held out of an augmentation to its amount at no distant date.

It was quite plain to the High Church party that the king was disposed to favour the Presbyterians; hence they sounded the alarm that the church was in danger. These extreme views prevailed in Dublin College, and the Jacobite spirit which began to manifest itself among the students, attracted the notice of the government, more especially as the Pretender was well known to threaten an invasion. It was supposed that he might land in the northern parts of Ulster, and steps were immediately taken suited to the emergency. A militia force was enrolled, and although by joining it the Presbyterians exposed themselves to the penalties of the Sacramental Test Act, they hesitated not to take arms in defence of their religion and liberties, hoping that the government would protect them against the penalties of the law. A bill was accordingly passed through the Irish parliament, which secured dissenters in the militia against all the penalties of the obnoxious Act. The bishops did all in their power to prevent even this partial relief from being afforded to the Presbyterians, and accordingly after having been transmitted to London, the bill was abandoned by the government, and the Test Act remained in full force against the Presbyterians, whether they served in the militia, the regular army, or in any other capacity whatever. In order to neutralize the injurious effect of the triumph which the bishops had effected, the House of Commons passed a resolution, declaring, "That such of his Majesty's Protestant dissenting subjects of this kingdom as have taken commissions in the militia, or acted in the commission of array, have hereby done a seasonable service to his Majesty's royal person and government, and the Protestant interest in this kingdom." And still further to quiet the minds of the disappointed Presbyterians, the Commons, in opposition to the High Church party, passed an additional resolution to the effect, "That any person who shall commence a prosecution against any dissenter, who has accepted or shall accept of a commission in the army or militia, is an enemy to King George and the Protestant interest, and a friend to the Pretender."

Thus once more were the Irish bishops powerful enough to defeat the attempts made to repeal the Sacramental Test, even although both the King and the Irish House of Commons were disposed in this matter to favour the Presbyterians. It was highly creditable to the Presbyterian body that they came to the resolution of continuing in the public service at this critical period, even although by doing so they exposed themselves to the penalties of the Sacramental Test. A synod was now summoned to meet at Belfast, with the view of considering the terms on which application should be made to the government for a Toleration Act. The attendance both of ministers and elders was larger on this occasion than at any former meeting of synod, and after mature deliberation, it was agreed, that they should propose subscription of the Westminster Confession of Faith as the ground of toleration; and if the government should prefer the formula already referred to, they should add to it a clause which would make the last sentence run thus:—"And pursuant to this belief, I agree to all the doctrines common to the Protestant churches at home and abroad, contained in their and our public Confessions of Faith." The synod directed their attention also to the necessity of preaching the gospel in the Irish language, in districts where Roman Catholics abounded, and they unanimously resolved to encourage this excellent design to the utmost of their power. Those of the brethren who were able to preach in Irish were commissioned accordingly to preach in succession in various districts. A school for teaching Irish was opened in Dundalk, and steps were taken for printing editions of the catechism, and of a short grammar in the Irish tongue. A very favourable report of the success which had accompanied this important scheme was made to the synod in 1717, and they resolved "to continue to use their utmost endeavours to further so good a work." The nine presbyteries of which the church consisted in 1702, were now augmented to eleven, having under their care about 140 congregations.

The Irish Presbyterians knowing that it was the earnest desire of the king and his ministers to redress the grievances of which they justly complained, held a meeting at Newry, to consider the propriety of making another effort to obtain relief. They appointed a deputation from both the North and South to repair to London for this purpose. On reaching the metropolis, the deputation waited upon the members of Government, from whom they received assurances that something effectual would be done for their relief in the next session of parliament; and in the meantime the king and his ministers placed on the civil list the sum of £800 a-year, as an augmentation of the Royal Bounty, one-half to be appropriated to the synod of Ulster, which comprised 140 ministers, while the other half was to be devoted to the ministers of Dublin and the South, who amounted at this date to no more than thirteen. In the course of the following year (1719), the Government sought to fulfil their pledge by causing a bill to be introduced into the Irish House of Commons, "for rendering the Protestant dissenters more useful and capable of supporting the Protestant interest of this kingdom." The High Church party, afraid that too liberal concessions might be made to Presbyterians, introduced a counter bill, "for exempting the Protestant dissenters of this kingdom from certain penalties to which they are now subject." The object of this latter measure was to grant nothing more than a bare toleration for dissenting worship; and in this meagre and unsatisfactory form it passed into a law, but not without the most strenuous and persevering opposition from some High Churchmen. In the course of the same session of parliament, a bill of indemnity was passed discharging those in public offices or employments from the penalties incurred by not taking the Sacramental Test. A similar act of indemnity was repeated annually for a long period, either voted by the Irish Parliament, or as was generally the case, sent over from England.

Up to this period of its history, the Presbyterian church in Ireland had been characterized by a strict adherence to the doctrines of the Westminster Confession of Faith, and a complete accordance both in worship and discipline with the parent Church of Scotland. Now, however, heretical views on the essential doctrines of the gospel began to be broached by some ministers connected with the Belfast Society, an association of ministers which had been organized in 1705 for mutual improvement in theological knowledge. The originator of the new opinions appears to have been a young minister, the Rev. John Abernethy, who was ordained minister of a congregation in Antrim. He taught that the ground of a sinner's acceptance in the sight of God was his sincerity, that error was innocent when not wilful, and that all belief in positive doctrines was uncertain, or at all events non-essential. In regard to ecclesiastical discipline, Mr. Abernethy, and those of the Belfast Society who agreed with him, held that the church had no right to require subscription to a human confession of faith, and that to demand such a subscription was to violate the right of private judgment, besides being inconsistent with Christian liberty and true Protestantism. The origin of these lax and erroneous opinions in Ulster is probably to be traced to the circumstance, that Mr. Abernethy had been a fellow-student and intimate friend of Professor Simpson, who was cited before the General Assembly in Scotland for teaching Arminian and Pelagian errors in the Divinity Hall of Glasgow; and besides, several of the leading members of the Society had studied under this heretical professor. It was strongly suspected, moreover, that in addition to their other errors, these young men had imbibed the Arian opinions of Dr. Samuel Clarke, but this charge they solemnly denied. For fifteen years the errors which had crept into the church made silent but steady progress, and those who held them became the most prominent and influential members of the synod. At length, Mr. Abernethy published a sermon, which he had preached before the Belfast Society, under the title of 'Religious Obedience founded on Personal Persuasion.' From the appearance of this discourse in print, is to be dated the commencement of that controversy which raged among the Ulster Presbyterians for seven years, giving rise to a number of publications on both sides, and terminating in the exclusion of the members of the Belfast Society from the community of the Synod.

At the commencement of this important controversy, the practice had begun to be adopted by some presbyteries of allowing subscription of the standards with reservations and explanations. This objectionable practice was legalised by the Synod, under what is known by the name of the Pacific Act, and laxity of discipline having been thus introduced into the proceedings of the supreme court of the church, the example was soon followed by the inferior courts. In the presbytery of Belfast, Mr. Halliday, who was a strong advocate for the new opinions, refused to avail himself of the provisions of the Pacific Act, or to subscribe the Confession of Faith in any form. In utter contravention of the laws of the church, the presbytery were contented to receive a meagre and unsatisfactory declaration of his faith, which he tendered to the brethren, insisting that no church had a right to demand any fuller confession. Four members of the presbytery protested against the reception of such a declaration, in place of subscription to the Westminster Confession, and appealed to the sub-synod of Belfast. This quarterly provincial synod met in the first week of January 1721, when the reasons of protest were approved by the whole synod, with the exception of the members of the Belfast Society: and the majority of the presbytery who had admitted Mr. Halliday, without subscription of the standards, were publicly rebuked at the bar of the court. Notwithstanding this decision of the sub-synod, Mr. Halliday still refused to subscribe the Confession. The whole church was much agitated by the divisions which had arisen among its ministers, and in this painful state of matters the supreme court held its annual meeting at Belfast. The attendance of both ministers and elders was unusually large, showing the deep interest which was felt in the present critical state of affairs. At this synod memorials were presented from seventeen congregations spread over seven counties of Ulster, entreating that in order to quiet the apprehensions of multitudes, as well as to remove all cause of reproach, "all the members of synod, and all inferior judicatories of the church, may be obliged to subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith as the confession of their faith." In the spirit of this memorial, the synod commenced their proceedings by passing a resolution, which denied in the strongest manner that they had departed "from the commonly received doctrine concerning the essential Deity of the Son of God, by denying his essential Divine perfections, particularly his necessary existence, absolute eternity, and independence." The members of the Belfast Society declined voting for this resolution, "not," as the minutes of synod bear, "because they disbelieved the article of Christ's supreme Deity; for this article they professed in the strongest terms to believe; but because they are against all authoritative human decisions as tests of orthodoxy, and because they judged such decisions unseasonable at this time." To meet more directly the object of the memorial which had been laid before them, the synod agreed not to enjoin, but simply to permit all the members of synod who were willing to do so, to subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith. This resolution also was keenly opposed by the members of the Belfast Society, but was carried by a decided majority. A large number of ministers accordingly signed anew the Confession of Faith, and from this time the two parties were known by the names of Subscribers and Non-Subscribers.

At this meeting of synod, Mr. Halliday was admitted as a member of the body without being called upon to subscribe the Confession, on the simple proviso that this be no precedent in any instance for the future. And to render the Pacific Act more effectual, as well as to secure the peace of the church, three resolutions were passed, first, that no person should be licensed, ordained, or installed, without the concurrence of two-thirds of the presbytery then present; secondly, that should any single member protest against such license, ordination, or installation, further proceedings therein should be arrested until the next synod; and thirdly, that should the Pacific Act be again violated, the presiding minister should be suspended at the discretion of the synod.

The entire province of Ulster was now in a state of commotion, the people arraying themselves on either side of the controversy. Pamphlets were published in rapid succession by the champions of both parties. So keen indeed did the conflict become, that great anxiety was felt lest a rupture should take place between the two parties at the next meeting of synod, which was appointed to be held at Derry. The attendance, owing to the remoteness of the place of meeting, was not so large as at the last synod. After discussion, which was conducted with considerable warmth, the following five resolutions were adopted with the view of removing division and preserving peace. 1. The declaring articles of faith in Scripture words only shall not be accepted as a sufficient evidence of a person's soundness in the faith. 2. The synod resolved most constantly and firmly to adhere to the Westminster Confession of Faith. 3. The synod resolved to maintain the Presbyterian government and discipline as hitherto exercised. 4. The synod desire to exercise Christian forbearance towards the non-subscribers, so long as they governed themselves according to the acts of the synod, and did not disturb the peace of the church. 5. The synod earnestly and most seriously exhorted the people under the ministry of the non-subscribers to condescend as far as their consciences allowed them in adhering to their pastors.

These attempts on the part of the synod to compromise matters were altogether unsuccessful. The lay-members of the church were much dissatisfied with the leniency shown by the supreme court to the non-subscribers, as being in their view utterly inconsistent with the purity and safety and peace of the church. It now became every day more and more apparent that a disruption of the synod was at hand. In several presbyteries accordingly, vacant congregations refused to admit into their pulpits non-subscribing ministers. So strong indeed was the feeling against these ministers which pervaded the Presbyterian population generally, that subscribing ministers found it necessary to cease from employing them at communion seasons, or holding ministerial intercourse with them in any way. To allay the irritation which existed in the minds of many, the sub-synod of Derry at their meeting in May 1724, drew up a "Seasonable Warning," as it was termed, which they circulated widely among the people, and which had the effect of convincing them that a large body of ministers and elders were firm in upholding the doctrines and constitution of the church.

Meantime great anxiety prevailed throughout the church as to the probable result of the deliberations of the supreme court. The meeting took place at Dungannon, and the deepest interest in its proceedings pervaded all classes. A very large number of members, both clerical and lay, were present. The subject which engrossed the attention of the synod throughout almost its entire sittings was the case of Mr. Nevins, one of the non-subscribing ministers, who was accused of holding and avowing Arian tenets. The result was, that after a protracted trial, extending to nearly two weeks, he was cut off from the communion of the synod, but neither disjoined from his congregation, nor deposed from the ministerial office.

The warfare between the subscribers and the non-subscribers continued to be carried on with the greatest earnestness through the press, the latter party exhibiting a decided superiority in literary prowess. Popular favour, however, was decidedly on the side of the Subscribers, and it was daily becoming more obvious that the expected separation of the two parties could not be much longer delayed. While the public mind was in a state of the utmost excitement, the synod held its usual annual meeting at Dungannon on the 21st of June 1726. The non-subscribers laid on the table five overtures or "expedients for peace," as they chose to term them. This elaborate production took up extreme ground, and left the synod no other alternative but to exclude its authors from the communion of the church. An attempt was made to delay matters for another year, but this motion was negatived by a large majority. The subject of separation was now deliberated upon, and on the votes being taken it was found that by a large majority, composed chiefly of elders, the ministers being nearly equally divided, the separation was carried. Yet even this decision was partial and limited in its character. It excluded the non-subscribers from "ministerial communion with subscribers in church judicatories as formerly;" that is, it simply excluded them from ecclesiastical fellowship, by being members of the synod or its inferior courts, but did not exclude them either from Christian fellowship or from ministerial communion in religious ordinances and sacraments. And though the open, avowed non-subscribers were now removed from the synod, there still remained a number of ministers who were secretly attached to the principles of the non-subscribers, but who, not being honest enough to avow their sentiments, still continued in communion with the synod. A question naturally arose in the altered state of matters as to the distribution of the Royal Bounty, but in a private meeting of the ministers, it was unanimously agreed, that the usual proportions of the grant should be paid to the members of the excluded presbytery, as regularly as if they still formed a constituent part of the synod.

The Irish Presbyterians had, a few years before this, received from government the full benefit of the Act of Toleration. They had still reason to complain of several grievances which remained undressed. Sites for churches were refused by Episcopalian landlords. Presbyterians were still excluded by the Sacramental Test from places of public trust under the crown, and they were liable to be prosecuted for their marriages celebrated by their own clergy. The accession of George II., in 1727, however, was hailed as holding out favourable prospects, the highest authorities, both in church and state, being generally disposed to relieve them from the disabilities under which they still laboured. But though their hopes from government were now brightening, the social condition of the province of Ulster was far from satisfactory, and an extensive emigration of the agricultural population took place, the people flocking in great numbers to the West Indies. An inquiry was immediately instituted by government into the causes of this alarming diminution of the Protestant population in the north of Ireland, and the Presbyterians urged anew upon the attention of the civil authorities the necessity of repealing the obnoxious Sacramental Test Act. The High Church party were naturally afraid that the claims of the Ulster Presbyterians might be acknowledged, and Dean Swift appeared once more as the stern opponent of toleration, publishing a powerful pamphlet on the subject. In 1732, the English Protestant Dissenters exerted themselves strongly to procure the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. And in the following year the Irish Presbyterians directed their efforts towards the procuring of the repeal of their Test Act, but although their claims were admitted by the English ministry, their hopes of redress were once more doomed to be disappointed. The only relief, indeed, which the Presbyterians received during the reign of George II., was an act passed in 1738 by which they were exempted from all prosecutions for marriages celebrated in their congregations by ministers who had qualified under the Toleration Act.

Notwithstanding the numerous disadvantages under which the Ulster Presbyterians had long laboured, their numbers had steadily increased, thirty new congregations having been organized within the last thirty years. The consequence of this was, that the dividend of the Royal Bounty, which annually accrued to each individual minister, was rapidly diminishing. In these circumstances, the synod, between the years 1744 and 1750, frequently had under their consideration the propriety of applying to government for an addition to the Royal Bounty. It was strongly feared that the cause of the Pretender would be warmly espoused by the Irish Romanists, but all apprehensions for the security of Ireland were quieted by the promptitude with which the Presbyterians of Ulster took up arms to resist the enemy should he venture to land upon their shores. Their determination to risk their lives and fortunes in defence of the Protestant king and constitution, was set forth in a "Declaration" which they published as soon as the standard of the Pretender had been raised in Scotland. These demonstrations of loyalty were duly appreciated by the Earl of Chesterfield, the lord-lieutenant, and the Presbyterians were given to expect that they would probably receive some mark of the royal favour. In 1746, accordingly, when the rebellion had been suppressed, the synod forwarded a memorial to government, setting forth their present distressing circumstances, occasioned by the pressing poverty of the country, and craving an increase of the grant which they had received from the Royal Bounty. This memorial appears not to have been presented at headquarters; and though, in 1749, a similar resolution was formed by the synod, in consequence of discouragements it was speedily abandoned. The following year a fund was established for the benefit of the widows and families of deceased ministers; an institution which has flourished beyond all expectation, and though the endowment originally contemplated was £12 annually, each widow now receives yearly £34, present currency; and when a minister dies, leaving a family and no widow, the children receive the annuity for ten years.

The non-subscribers now occupied a separate position from the Ulster synod under the name of the Presbytery of Antrim; but although by their separation from the body the church was to some extent purified, their students being still educated chiefly in Glasgow, a class of ministers gradually arose in the synod, who held lax, and, in many cases, erroneous principles, such as were usually termed New-Light. In the course of time this party acquired a complete preponderance both of influence and talent in the synod. In the Irish Episcopal Church also, at this period, that is about the middle of last century, evangelical doctrine had almost fled from its pulpits. Several of the inferior clergy held Arian opinions, and one of the bishops was an avowed Unitarian. The two parties of Presbyterians, the subscribers and non-subscribers, though ecclesiastically separated from each other, were brought frequently into friendly intercourse, on the footing of their common connection with the Widows' Fund, and in theological sentiment they began gradually to approximate to each other. Pure Calvinistic doctrine was now very generally repudiated by the leading ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and the whole body was gradually drifting away from the good old theology of the Westminster Confession. The Seceders, however, who preached sound evangelical doctrine, were gradually on the increase, and numbers of Presbyterians, who loved the truth, gladly sought refuge from the heresy which pervaded their own church in the orthodox Seceding congregations. Thus the apathy of the synod of Ulster promoted the success of both branches of the Secession Church, the Burghers and the Antiburghers. See ASSOCIATE PRESBYTERY OF IRELAND.

So great was the indifference which the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster manifested even to the concerns of their own church, that not more than one-half, and scarcely sometimes one-third of their entire number, attended the meetings of the general synod. To remedy this growing evil, it was proposed, in the meeting of 1752, that the synod should for the future be composed of delegates from the respective presbyteries, and that their charges in attending should be defrayed by their constituents. The project, however, was postponed from year to year, and at length abandoned. For a long period the Ulster synod had been sadly degenerating both in doctrine and discipline, and while ever since the separation of the presbytery of Antrim there had been a party in the synod who sympathised with the non-subscribers, that party was no longer a minority, but a large and overwhelming majority. It is not surprising, therefore, that in 1758 a resolution should have been unanimously adopted by the synod for the renewal of friendly intercourse with the non-subscribers, who were well known to adhere as firmly as ever to their original principles, and to be departing more and more widely from the Westminster standards. The following year, accordingly, a deputation from the presbytery of Antrim appeared at the synod, and handed in a commission appointing them to attend the synod, and to join in consultation with it in all matters of general concern to the Protestant Dissenting interest. Some of the members were taken by surprise, and were scarcely prepared for this step on the part of the non-subscribers; but the commission was sustained without opposition. Next day, however, some of the members adverted to the subject, stating that the minute of the previous year, inviting the non-subscribers, contemplated their taking part in the discussions of the synod only in reference to their common secular concerns. This explanation was accepted by the synod. Another opportunity soon presented itself of exhibiting publicly the affinity which the two bodies now felt to exist between them. George II. having died in 1760, the Ulster synod and the Presbytery of Antrim joined in an address of congratulation to the new sovereign, George III., on his accession to the throne, describing themselves as "The Presbyterian ministers of the Northern Association in Ireland." The students of both parties were trained under theological professors, and the ministers held brotherly intercourse by preaching in each other's pulpits. Nothing, indeed, seemed to lie in the way of a complete coalition, but the fear of alienating a large body of the laity who were decidedly opposed to the heretical principles avowed by the non-subscribers. In the low state to which vital religion had now sunk among the Irish Presbyterians, it is scarcely to be wondered at that the cause made so little progress among the people, that from 1756 to 1769 only two congregations were added to the synod of Ulster.

Emigration had for a number of years past diminished to a considerable extent the number of Presbyterians in the north of Ireland, and the dividend which the Royal Bounty afforded to each minister was so small that they had a difficulty in obtaining an adequate maintenance. The natural result of such a state of matters was, that the number of candidates for the ministry was quite insufficient to supply the vacant congregations. This led to a relaxation of the rules laid down in regard to the course of study necessary to obtain license, and men of indifferent qualifications were both licensed and ordained. But this evil was light compared with the alarming indifference to sound doctrine which so extensively prevailed. The doctrines of the Westminster Confession were almost completely set at nought, and the proposal was broached by a number of ministers to set aside the law of subscription. Such, however, was the attachment of the laity to the Confession, that it was deemed prudent to relinquish the design; although the supporters of the Confession were now but a minority in the supreme court, and several presbyters dispensed with subscription both in cases of license and ordination.

Though the Irish Presbyterians, both ministers and people, were in a very depressed state, so far as outward prosperity was concerned, and thousands had emigrated to America, they were fast rising in political importance. When the revolutionary war commenced between America and Britain, and the French took part with the revolted provinces, her ships of war threatened a descent upon the coasts of Ulster. The government hastened to conciliate all parties in Ireland in order to secure their support, more especially as the Irish people had voluntarily set up an extensive military organization for their own defence. In June 1778, or about three months after the volunteer companies had begun to be formed, the Irish House of Commons made another attempt to obtain the repeal of the Sacramental Test, a clause to that effect having been appended to a bill which was designed to relieve the Roman Catholics of some of their disabilities. The bill passed with the appended clause, but when forwarded to England in order to receive the sanction of the privy council, it was returned without the clause which had been appended; and thus the grievances of which the Ulster Presbyterians had so long complained still remained unredressed. The volunteers rapidly increased until they reached the large number of 42,000; and while a large proportion of the population were thus in arms, discontent was rapidly spreading in consequence of the deep injury which the American war had inflicted upon trade. Such a state of things could not fail to excite considerable anxiety in the government; and as a matter of policy, the Irish parliament had no sooner met in 1779 than a bill was introduced, and unanimously carried, for the relief of the grievances of Dissenters. After a little delay the measure having been approved by the privy council, was sent back to Ireland unaltered, and speedily passed into a law.

The Irish volunteers had now become a formidable body. On the 15th February 1782 they held a meeting at Dungannon, which was attended by the representatives of one hundred and forty-three corps in military dress, and passed resolutions indicating their determination to maintain the principles of constitutional freedom. At this time the volunteers in Ireland amounted to nearly 100,000 men, well armed and disciplined, who, with one voice, boldly asserted the independence of the Irish legislature. It was found to be impossible to resist the demands of the people, and the English government yielded so far as to acknowledge the legislative independence of Ireland. Various other acts were passed favourable to the Presbyterians, among which may be mentioned one which declared the validity of all marriages celebrated among Protestant Dissenters by ministers of their own denomination. In 1784 a further boon was conferred upon the Ulster synod by an increase of the Regium Donum, the king having been pleased to grant £1,000 per annum. Some disappointment was felt that the sum was so small, but the men of power in Ireland had resisted the bestowal of a larger grant. About the same time the Irish Seceders received a bounty from government of £700 per annum. In the course of a few years the question as to the necessity of a more adequate provision for the Presbyterian ministers was taken up by the Irish House of Commons, who passed an unanimous resolution to present an address to his majesty on the subject. The wishes of the Commons, however, were anticipated by a king's letter, dated 21st January 1792, granting during pleasure an additional sum of £5,000 per annum for the use of the Presbyterian ministers of Ireland. Of this sum the synod of Ulster and presbytery of Antrim received £3,729 16s. 10d., the rest being distributed among the Seceders, the Southern Association, and the minister of the French congregation, St. Peter's, Dublin. But though favoured with outward prosperity, the internal condition of the Presbyterian church of Ireland was melancholy in the extreme, erroneous opinions as to the vital doctrines of Christianity being openly avowed by the leading ministers of the body. Pelagian and semi-Pelagian views were very generally taught from the pulpits. The presbytery of Killileagh was particularly noted for the number of heretical ministers which it contained. The course of education prescribed for students of theology in connection with the synod of Ulster was so limited that any candidate who had attended a divinity class only one session of five months, might be licensed as a preacher. Ministers who had passed through such a brief course of study were not likely to prove efficient instructors or able defenders of the faith. The subject was brought under the notice of the general synod, and in 1786 the Belfast academy was opened, though it does not appear to have been attended by any considerable number of students of divinity, these continuing still to resort to the Scottish universities. At this period the church made little or no progress. For the twenty years preceding 1789 not one new congregation was regularly established. The Seceders and Reformed Presbyterians, however, were, during the same time, rapidly on the increase.

In 1795 the Government had signified their intention of erecting and endowing a seminary at Maynooth for training candidates for the Romish priesthood. Some hopes were at the same time entertained that the English parliament would vote a sum for the establishment of a Presbyterian college in Ulster. Negotiations were carried on for some time with men in power, but to the mortification of the Irish Protestants, Maynooth was built and endowed, while the establishment of a Protestant seminary was postponed for an indefinite period. The state of Ireland was now such as filled the hearts of all good men with sorrow and alarm. "The three Romish provinces," says Dr. Reid, "exhibited a miserable array of ignorance, poverty, profligacy, and outrage. Even in Ulster, laxity of principle had introduced laxity of practice,—drunkenness, profane swearing, and Sabbath breaking were fearfully prevalent, and the writings of Thomas Paine, which had been diligently circulated, had extensively diffused the leaven of infidelity."

Such was the moral condition of Ireland when the rebellion of 1798 broke out. The object of this conspiracy was wholly of a political nature, having in view the separation of Ireland from Great Britain, and the erection of an independent republic. The Irish Presbyterian ministers, as a body, steadfastly opposed all insurrectionary movements, and gave no countenance to the Society of United Irishmen. The same sentiments were shared by a large portion of the Presbyterian laity. In several districts of Down and Antrim, however, and especially in the town of Belfast, a spirit of disaffection was widely diffused among the people. But it was highly creditable to the ministers connected with the synod of Ulster, that very few of their order were implicated in the Rebellion, and such was the confidence which the military authorities reposed in the loyalty of the ministers, that the meeting of synod in 1798 was held with their sanction, and under their protection. At that meeting a resolution was passed expressing strong disapprobation of the conduct of those individuals belonging to their flocks who had taken part in the conspiracy. A pastoral address was also drawn up, and addressed to the Presbyterian people, remonstrating with those who had joined the ranks of the rebels. The sum of £500 was unanimously voted to the government towards the defence of the kingdom; and the presbyteries were enjoined under penalty of severe censure to institute a solemn inquiry into the conduct of ministers and licentiates charged with seditious and treasonable practices, and to report to next meeting of synod. When the synod met in June 1799, the reports from the several presbyteries showed that very few of the ministers had been concerned in the Rebellion, and that only one, the Rev. James Porter of Greyabbey, had been arrested, tried, and executed for treasonable practices. Of the small number involved in the Rebellion, two were reported as still in confinement; others had expressed their sincere contrition; others were no longer connected with the body, and the remainder had either voluntarily, or with the permission of the government, removed from the kingdom. It may be noticed, that the greater number of the Presbyterian ministers who were implicated in the Rebellion held New Light principles.

The project now began to be started of a legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland. To reconcile all parties of the Irish people to this most important measure, various inducements were held out. The members of the synod of Ulster were assured that a university for their special benefit would be founded at Armagh, and a divinity professorship endowed; that the Regium Donum would be liberally increased, and that a royal commissioner of their own communion should sit in their annual synod, as in the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland. All these proposals were afterwards abandoned, except that which referred to an increase of the Regium Donum. While this subject was under consideration, the union of the two countries of Great Britain and Ireland was consummated. This great event took place on the 1st of January 1801. Some apprehensions were entertained that, in consequence of a change of government which happened about this time, the proposed increase of the Regium Donum might not be obtained, but at the annual meeting of the synod of Ulster in 1802, it was officially announced that "his Majesty's confidential servants had come to a determination to recommend to the king to increase the Regium Donum in the next year, and that a future communication would be made as to the amount, and the regulations which it might be thought necessary to adopt." A new arrangement accordingly was made, the members of the synod of Ulster, and of the synod of Antrim, to whom alone the grant was restricted, being divided into three classes, those located in cities or large towns, those in the more populous districts, and those in more thinly peopled localities. The congregations amounted at this time to 186, which were divided into three classes, containing 62 each. The ministers, according as they belonged to the first, second, or third class; were to receive respectively, £100, £75, or £50 each per annum. The agent for the distribution of the bounty was henceforth to be appointed and paid by government. Much dissatisfaction was expressed by many members of the synod with the system of classification, but the government refused to modify the terms of the grant, and they were therefore with some murmuring submitted to. The Regium Donum to the synod of Ulster and presbytery of Antrim, had previously amounted to £6,329 6s. 10d., but by the addition now made it amounted in 1803 to £14,970 18s. 10d., late Irish currency. Such a liberal government allowance was received with satisfaction and gratitude, and the result has been such, even in a political and financial point of view, that the government has never had cause to repent of its liberality.

It is lamentable to reflect, that at the very time when the synod of Ulster was experiencing so largely and liberally the countenance of government, its usefulness as a Christian institution was at a low ebb. Many of the ministers had imbibed Arian and even Unitarian principles. The subscribers and non-subscribers were so mingled together, that it was almost impossible to distinguish the one party from the other, and in 1805, the synod unanimously resolved that the licentiates of the presbytery of Antrim, of the Southern Association, and of the Church of Scotland, should be fully entitled to officiate in its pulpits. In such a state of matters practical religion among the people had sunk, as was naturally to be expected, to a very low state. But how often has the truth of the Divine promise been exemplified in the history of every section of the church of Christ, "At evening time it shall be light." In the midst of the spiritual darkness and death which now overspread the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, there were still found some godly ministers and praying people who longed and looked for a revival of true vital religion in the land. Nor did they long and look in vain. No sooner had the excitement of the Rebellion passed away, than a number of pious ministers and laymen belonging to the various Protestant denominations met at Armagh, and formed an association under the designation of the 'Evangelical Society of Ulster,' having in view the establishment of a system of itinerant preaching throughout the towns and villages of the province. A number of Congregationalists or Independent churches sprung up about this time in Ulster, and several of the Secession ministers with their congregations joined that body. One eminent minister belonging to the synod of Ulster, the Rev. Alexander Carson of Tobermore, withdrew from the body and joined the Baptists. Amid the keen discussions which agitated both the synod of Ulster and the Secession synods on the subject of the Regium Donum, a number of the lay members belonging to both bodies passed over to the Reformed Presbyterian church, which repudiated a state endowment. Besides, so zealous was this last-mentioned denomination, and so faithfully did they preach the pure gospel of Christ, that numbers of the more pious portion of the community hastened to join them, so that numerous congregations arose in all parts of the country professing the principles of the Reformed Presbyterians.

The rapid increase of the other branches of the Protestant Dissenters in Ireland, had a decidedly beneficial influence upon the synod of Ulster. Arian and Socinian preachers began now to be discountenanced by the people, and whenever a vacancy occurred, their places were filled by evangelical ministers. A better spirit now showed itself in the deliberations of the synod. Plans were devised, and money was raised for the supply of Bibles on easy terms to the poorer classes of Presbyterians. This benevolent and truly Christian movement was chiefly carried forward by Mr., afterwards Dr. Hanna of Belfast, to whom on many accounts the Presbyterians of Ireland are under deep obligations. The appointment of this excellent and able evangelical minister as Professor of Theology, which took place in 1817, by a unanimous vote of synod, formed a new era in the history of the Presbyterian church of Ireland. It indicated that sound evangelical doctrine had now obtained an ascendancy in the synod; it cemented the union between the General Synod and the Belfast Institution, and it enabled the church to train its students at home, instead of obliging them to repair for their theological education to Scottish universities. The synod now began to raise the standard of education among its candidates for license, and to carry out this important object, the students were required to devote two sessions instead of one to the study of theology. Since that time another session has been added to the theological curriculum. For a long time the synod of Ulster had held ecclesiastical intercourse with the synod of Munster and the presbytery of Antrim; and this was tolerated, though most reluctantly, by the evangelical ministers, who were yearly on the increase, as long as there was no ecclesiastical code to which they could appeal; but a canon of discipline and church government having been prepared and adopted by the synod in 1824, the ecclesiastical relationship between the synod and the Munster and Antrim brethren ceased to be recognized. And another advantage which accrued to the church from its possession of a regular code of laws was, that the question of subscription to the standards was finally settled by the established rule, that "presbyteries, before they license candidates to preach the gospel, shall ascertain the soundness of their faith, either by requiring subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith, or by such examinations as they shall consider best adapted for this purpose." Some definite arrangement on this point was absolutely demanded by the position of the church at this period. For half-a-century the practice of requiring subscription from either licentiates or ordained ministers had been unknown, and as the natural consequence of such laxity, heresy had grown up and been tolerated in the bosom of the Presbyterian church. To such an extent had this evil spread that, according to a statement made by Dr. Cooke, when examined before the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry, of two hundred ministers belonging to the Ulster synod, about thirty-five were Arians. The evidence containing this statement appeared in February 1827, and its publication caused no small excitement: more especially as in addition to Dr. Cooke's startling statement, the fact became known that the Rev. William Porter, who was then clerk of the Ulster synod, had, in answer to the inquiries of the Commissioners, openly avowed himself to be an Arian, and expressed his belief that the system was "gaining ground among the thinking few," giving it as his opinion, that there were "more real Arians than professed ones" amongst the ministers with whom he was officially connected. At the next annual meeting of synod, a motion was proposed to the effect that "the Rev. William Porter having publicly avowed himself to be an Arian, be no longer continued clerk." After a long and keen debate, it was agreed to condemn certain parts of his evidence, but that he should be allowed to retain his situation as clerk of the synod. The matter did not terminate here however. Mr., now Dr. Cooke, who has ever proved himself the champion of orthodoxy against error of every kind, moved that the members of the court, "for the purpose of affording a public testimony to the truth, as well as of vindicating their religious character as individuals, declare, that they do most firmly hold and believe the doctrine concerning the nature of God contained in these words of the Westminster Shorter Catechism, namely, that 'there are three persons in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory.'" This motion was admirably fitted to test the principles of the body, and accordingly a discussion ensued of the most earnest and exciting kind, which lasted for two entire days, at the close of which Mr. Cooke's motion was carried by an overwhelming majority, only two ministers venturing to vote in opposition to it, while eight declined voting.

No sooner had the synod closed its sittings, than the Arian party in the church resolved to make a desperate struggle in defence of their principles. Mr. Montgomery of Strabane had delivered a brilliant speech in support of the New-Light opinions, and this able production was forthwith printed and industriously circulated, and a few days before the meeting of the synod in 1828, the author was presented by his admirers with a complimentary address and a service of plate. The whole Presbyterian body were keenly alive to the importance of this meeting of synod. It was more numerous than attended by both ministers and elders than any synod had ever been in the whole course of the history of the Irish Presbyterian church. This was felt to be the crisis of the Arian controversy, and the immense majority of the Presbyterian laity being decidedly in favour of the Old-Light principles, watched with the most intense interest the proceedings of the church at this eventful period. Mr. Cooke, as he had done from the commencement of the controversy, took the lead against the Arians, and to put an end to the growth of this noxious heresy within the church, he moved a series of overtures, the obvious design of which was to exclude from the sacred office all Arians, Socinians, Pelagians, and Arminians, as well as all who were destitute of vital godliness. These overtures, which passed by a large majority, are too important not to be inserted in full. They were as follows:—

"I. That many of the evils which now unhappily exist in the General Synod of Ulster, have arisen from the admission of persons holding Arian sentiments, contrary to the accredited standards of this body, as founded on the Word of God, from the occasional admission of others, who, though nominally holding in sound words and profession the form of godliness, were yet deniers of the power thereof, and consequently destitute of that zeal which is necessary to the dissemination of the gospel.

"II. That while we are individually bound to use all Scriptural means to guard against the continuance of these evils, it is also our duty as a church to adopt such regulations as may, with the Divine blessing, prove effectual to prevent the introduction of ministers unenlightened by the Spirit of God, and to advance spiritual religion in our Church courts and congregations.

"III. That before any person be recognized as a candidate for the ministry, he shall, previously to entering a theological class, be enjoined to present himself at our annual meeting to be examined by a committee of this synod respecting his personal religion, his knowledge of the Scriptures, especially his views of the doctrines of the Trinity, original sin, justification by faith, and regeneration by the Holy Spirit, and likewise as to his motives for offering himself a candidate for the sacred office of the ministry; and that should any such examinant be found opposed to those doctrines, or appear to be destitute of vital godliness, he shall in no case be recognized as a candidate for the ministry of this synod.

"IV. That students after having finished their theological course, and their trials in the presbytery, shall again present themselves for a similar examination before the same committee, and it shall be the duty of that committee to ascertain their soundness in the faith, by requiring from them a statement of their views of the doctrines contained in the Westminster Confession of Faith.

"V. That if any person thus licensed be afterwards found not to preach the doctrines of the Trinity, original sin, justification by faith, and regeneration by the Holy Spirit, or to avow any principles in opposition to these doctrines, he shall not be continued in fellowship with this body.

"VI. Persons who are already preachers in this body, but have not been licensed according to these regulations, shall, previously to ordination, be required to undergo a similar examination.

"VII. Should any person be licensed or ordained in opposition to these regulations, such license or ordination shall not be deemed valid by this body.

"VIII. The committee for these examinations shall annually be appointed in open synod."

The design of this last overture was to exclude all Arians from the committee of examination.

The synod, by passing these overtures, had evidently taken a step which most effectually excluded Arians from the ministry in connection with the synod of Ulster. The New-Light party now saw that it was next to impossible for them to continue much longer in the communion of the synod, and they began seriously to meditate the propriety of separating from the body. A few months, accordingly, after the meeting of synod, a meeting was convened in Belfast, and a remonstrance adopted, in which they plainly stated that if the obnoxious overtures were not repealed, they would be compelled to form themselves into a separate association. Next synod, which was to meet at Lurgan in June 1829, was expected to decide the fate of the Arian party, but the pressure of other business compelled the postponement of the subject to a special synod, which was appointed to be held in Cookstown on the third Tuesday of the following August. Before that day, however, the Arians met in Belfast, and agreed to absent themselves from the ensuing synod, feeling that it was useless to prolong a contest so unequal. Mr. Porter alone of all the New-Light party was present at the synod, and read an address explaining the cause of their absence. Their remonstrance was presented, signed by 18 ministers, 15 students or licentiates, 197 elders, 138 members of the committees of congregations, and 314 seatholders. In the address which Mr. Porter read, a request was made that if the overtures were confirmed, the synod should nominate a committee furnished with full power to enter into an arrangement with them for a Christian and friendly separation. The synod acceded to the proposal, and a conference was arranged to take place in Belfast on the 9th of the following September. The result was, that seventeen ministers withdrew from the jurisdiction of the synod of Ulster, and formed themselves into a separate body on the 25th of May 1830, under the name of the REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER (which see). They were still permitted by government, however, to enjoy their share of the Regium Donum, they retained their interest in the Widows' Fund, and they continued in possession of their places of worship though numbers of their people now forsook their ministry.

From the date of the withdrawal of the Unitarians the Ulster synod began to experience a great revival of true religion, and to make rapid progress in the work of church extension. "Within twelve months after the adoption of the overtures in 1828," as we learn from Dr. Reid, "no less than eleven new congregations sprang up in the synod, and in the ten years immediately following the Arian separation, the growth of the body was greater than it had been during the century preceding. From 1729 to 1829, the synod added only about seventy-three to the number of its congregations; from 1830 to 1840 no less than eighty-three congregations were erected." The important subject of theological education now occupied much attention, and in the course of seven years the number of professors was trebled, and in 1840 it was proposed to add another session to the theological curriculum. The synod engaged also with redoubled zeal in the cause of missions both at home and abroad. For some years the national system of education established by government for Ireland occasioned keen discussion, and even angry controversy, but in January 1840 the synod succeeded in obtaining such modifications of the system as enabled it to accept assistance from the funds provided by the legislature. Another topic of great importance was brought under the consideration of the synod, that of subscription to the Confession of Faith. In 1832 the synod agreed to require subscription from candidates for license or ordination, but at the same time a written explanation was allowed on any point about which scruples were entertained. This rule, however, was found to give rise, in many cases, to considerable embarrassment, and in 1835 the synod resolved that in future no exceptions or explanations were to be received, but that the candidates for license or ordination must give an unqualified subscription to the formula. This measure was followed by a renewal of communion with the Church of Scotland, the General Assembly in the following May unanimously agreeing to readmit the members of the Ulster synod to ministerial fellowship.

It was quite obvious, from the whole proceedings of the synod, that a doctrinal reformation had been wrought in the church, commencing from the separation of the Arian or Socinian party. The adoption of the overture requiring unqualified subscription was the crowning act of this great revival. All the evangelical Dissenters rejoiced in the all-important change which had thus been effected in this interesting section of the Protestant Church in Ireland. The Irish Secession Church seemed to sympathise more than any other with the Ulster synod in its renovated state. The two bodies were now completely agreed both in doctrine and polity, besides having been placed by the government in 1838 on precisely the same footing as to the reception of the Regium Donum. A desire began to be very generally entertained accordingly, that a union of the two churches should take place as soon as possible. The movement on the subject commenced among the students connected with the Belfast Academical Institution, and from them it spread among the elders and people of both denominations. In 1839 memorials in favour of a union were presented both to the synod of Ulster and the Secession synod. Committees were appointed on both sides to prepare preliminaries, and after agreeing in their separate judicatories to the terms of incorporation, the two bodies were formally united into one church on the 10th July 1840, the united synods being regularly constituted under the title of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. Thus the Ulster synod, by this happy union, received an accession to its numbers of 141 additional congregations, raising its entire number to 433, and the whole united body was divided into 23 presbyteries, which have since been increased to five synods, 26 presbyteries, 491 congregations, and 533 ministers. The Irish Presbyterian Church from this time took a high position as a large and influential body. An attempt was made soon after the union to prevent Presbyterian ministers from celebrating marriages between their own people and Episcopalians, and the English judges even went so far as to declare such marriages illegal. But in 1814 an act was obtained from the legislature warranting the exercise of the disputed privilege, where at least one of the parties belongs to his own denomination. An Episcopalian minister, however, can perform the ceremony where both the parties are Presbyterians or Romanists, and no minister not connected with the Establishment can legally marry an Episcopalian or a Romanist.

In 1846 a wealthy lady connected with the Presbyterian church bequeathed a sum of £20,000 towards the erection and endowment of a Presbyterian college. Considerable discussion took place as to the most suitable locality for such an institution, but it has at length been built in the town of Londonderry. Within the last sixteen years, as we learn from Dr. Dill, the Home Mission of the Irish Presbyterian Church has planted about 160 new churches in destitute localities: established a number of mission-stations and out-stations in the south and west; supported from 300 to 400 Irish and English mission schools, in which upwards of 20,000 Roman Catholics have been taught to read the Scriptures; and circulated large numbers of Bibles and tracts in popish districts. The Home Mission has two departments of operation, the one devoted to the conversion of Roman Catholics, and the other to the supply of the spiritual wants of the Protestant population, and especially the Presbyterian. The mission to Roman Catholics is again divided into two branches, one to the English-speaking, and the other to the Irish-speaking Romanists, both of which have, through the Divine blessing, led to the rescue of many from the errors of Romanism, and their admission into the communion of the Presbyterian Church.

ISBRANIKI, a sect of Russian Dissenters which arose about the middle of the sixteenth century. The appearance of this sect excited no small commotion. The name which they assumed means the Company of the Elect, but their enemies styled them Raskolniki or Schismatics. Some Lutheran writers have alleged that these Isbraniki were sprung from the ancient BOGOMILES (which see). The cause of their separation from the national church appears to have been somewhat singular. The church books, which were printed in 1562 under the czar, John Basilides, were printed from manuscript copies, which being considered incorrect, were somewhat altered in their printed form. The changes introduced were regarded by some as teaching unsound doctrine, and a sect having arisen who adhered to the former books, called themselves by the name of Staroverci, or believers in the old faith. These Dissenters, however, were comparatively few in number till about the middle of the following century, when, in consequence of the church-books having been revised by the patriarch Nikon, the outcry of unsound doctrine was again raised, and the number of Dissenters increased. Of all the doctrines which they held, that which gave greatest offence was their denial of different orders and gradations of clergy. On account chiefly of this tenet they were exposed to much persecution, but under Alexander I. they were tolerated by the State.

ISIS, one of the principal deities of the ancient Egyptians, the wife of Osiris and the mother of Horus. She was the goddess of the earth, and processions were held in her honour, at which her votaries carried wheat, barley, and other cereal grains. Osiris symbolized the sun and the Nile, Isis represented the moon and Egypt fertilized by the Nile. Osiris was worshipped under the form of an ox or a bull (see APIS); Isis under the form of a cow. As the mythology of ancient Greece has been believed to be derived from that of Egypt, Isis came to be identified with Demeter; and hence the fabulous stories in regard to the latter came to be transferred to the former. Isis was also worshipped in Greece under the names of Pelagia and Aegyptia; while, in the western parts of Europe, her worship was in course of time likewise established. In the time of Sulla it came to be introduced at Rome, but the private observance of the rites of Isis was afterwards forbidden on account of their immoral character. For the same reason her temples were destroyed by the public authorities at Rome, but so partial were the people to the worship of Isis, that it was restored and sanctioned by the triumvirs in B. C. 43. Under Augustus this licentious worship was again forbidden, but it was revived under Vespasian, and continued until the introduction of Christianity which gradually banished all Pagan worship throughout the Roman empire. Apuleius introduces Isis as giving the following account of herself: "I am Nature, the mother of all things, mistress of the elements, the beginning of ages, the sovereign of gods, the queen of the Manes, the first of the heavenly natures, the uniform face of the gods and goddesses. It is I who govern the luminous firmament of heaven, the salutary breezes of the sea, and the horrid silence of heaven, with a nod. My divinity alone, though multiform, is honoured with different ceremonies, and under different names. The Phrygians call me the Pessinuntian Mother of the gods; the Athenians, the Cecropian Mother; the Cyprians, the Paphian Venus; the Sicilians, the Stygian Proserpine; the Cretans, Diana Dictynna; the Eleusinians, the Old goddess Ceres; some Juno, some Bellona; others Hecate; and others, again, Rhamnusia. The oriental Ethiopians and Egyptians honour me with peculiar ceremonies, and call me by my true name Isis."

ISITES, a Mohammedan sect who believed the Koran to have been created. They alleged that the Koran delivered by Mohammed was merely a copy of that which was written by God himself, and was kept in the library of heaven: and to reconcile this notion with the statement of Mohammed, they declared that when the prophet affirmed that the Koran was not created, he referred to the original, and not to his own copy. See KORAN.

ISJE, the name of a central province of Japan, to which the religious sect of the Siutoists requires each of its adherents to make a pilgrimage once a year, or at least once in their life. In Isje is the grand Mia, or temple of Tensio-Dai-Din, which is the model after which all the other temples are built. An account of this celebrated pilgrimage is given by Kämpfer, whose words we quote: "This pilgrimage is made at all times of the year, but particularly in the spring, at which season vast multitudes of these pilgrims are seen upon the roads. The Japanese of both sexes, young and old, rich and poor, undertake this meritorious journey, generally speaking, on foot, in order to obtain, at this holy place, indulgences and remission of their sins. Some of these pilgrims are so poor, that they must live wholly upon what they get by begging. On this account, and by reason of their great number, they are exceedingly troublesome to the princes and lords, who at that time of the year go to court, or come thence, though otherwise they address themselves in a very civil manner, bareheaded, and with a low, submissive voice, saying, 'Great Lord, be pleased to give the poor pilgrim a seni, towards the expense of his journey to Isje,' or words to that effect. Of all the Japanese, the inhabitants of Jedo and the province O-ju are the most inclined to this pilgrimage. Children, if apprehensive of severe punishment for their misdemeanors, will run away from their parents and go to Isje, thence to fetch an Ofarri, or indulgence, which upon their return is deemed a sufficient expiation of their crimes, and a sure means to reconcile them to their friends. Multitudes of these pilgrims are obliged to pass whole nights lying in the open fields, exposed to all the injuries of wind and weather, some for want of room in inns, others out of poverty; and of these last many are found dead on the road, in which case their Ofarri, if they have any about them, is carefully taken up and hid in the next tree or bush.

"Others make this pilgrimage in a comical and merry way, drawing people's eyes upon them, as well as getting their money. They form themselves into companies, generally of four persons, clad in white linen, after the fashion of the Kuge, or persons of the holy ecclesiastical court of the Dairi. Two of them walking a grave, slow, deliberate pace, and standing often still, carry a large barrow adorned and hung about with fir-branches and cut white paper, on which they place a resemblance of a large bell, made of light substance, or a kettle, or something else, alluding to some old romantic history of their gods and ancestors; whilst a third, with a commander's staff in his hand, adorned, out of respect to his office, with a bunch of white paper, walks, or rather dances, before the barrow, singing with a dull, heavy voice, a song relating to the subject they are about to represent. Meanwhile, the fourth goes begging before the houses, or addresses himself to charitable travellers and receives and keeps the money which is given them. Their day's journeys are so short, that they can easily spend the whole summer upon such an expedition."

It would appear from the accounts of travellers, that Isje, the object of this most meritorious of pilgrimages, presents nothing that corresponds to its fame, or the greatness of the empire. It is rather held forth as a monument of antique poverty and simplicity. The Mia or temple where the pilgrims pay their devotions, is a low wooden edifice, with a flat thatched roof, and on entering nothing is to be seen but a looking-glass of cast metal, which is regarded as a symbol of the Deity, and some white paper cut in different forms, which they take for an emblem of the purity of the heart. The doors are likewise embellished with white paper. When any one comes to worship at the temple, he never presumes to enter, but stands without, and while he says his prayers, he looks only into it through a lattice-window.

ISLAM, the name given by Mohammed to the religion which he taught. The word means either "resignation to the will of God," or "a state of salvation," but the former is the meaning recognized by the majority of the Mohammedan writers. Faith in the Koran is Islām, and a believer derives from the same Arabic root the name of Moslem or Mussulman. The word Islām is also sometimes used to denote the whole body of the faithful; but they are more generally called Moslems or Mussulmans. See MOHAMMEDANS.

ISLEBIANS. See ANTINOMIANS.

ISMAILIYAH, or ISMAELIANS, a Mohammedan sect which branched off from the SCHITES (which see), in the age of the seventh Imām. Jaafar, the sixth Imām, had nominated his son Ismail his successor, but on his premature death he declared his second son Moussa his heir. Now as Ismail had left children, those of the Schītes who regarded the Imānate as hereditary, denied the right of Jaafar to make a second nomination. They formed a sect accordingly, called Ismaelians, to which belonged the Fatimite Caliphs of Egypt, and also the ASSASSINS (which see), whose name was once so justly dreaded both in Europe and Asia. The Ismaelians were a secret association, as has already been described under the article Assassins, in which the history of the sect is given. The following account, however, of the Egyptian Ismaelians, as given by Dr. Taylor, may interest the reader: "The Ismaelians of Egypt met in their grand lodge twice every week: their president, or Dai-al-Dout, paid a formal visit to the sovereign, and lectured him on some portion of the secret doctrines. Maerisi tells us that the degrees of the order were extended in Egypt from seven to nine, and furnishes us with the following account of the stages of initiation. In the first stage, the candidate was shown the doubts and difficulties attending the religion of the Koran, he was inspired with an anxious desire to have its mysteries explained, and some glimpses of the Ismaelian doctrine were then afforded, in order that he might be induced to take an oath of blind faith and unlimited obedience to his Dai, or instructor. In the second stage the nature of the Imámate, as a divine institution, was explained. The peculiar doctrines of the Ismaelians commenced at the third degree, when the candidates were taught that the number of Imáms was seven, and that Ismail was the last and greatest. In the fourth stage it was declared, that since the creation there had been seven legislators divinely inspired, each of whom had modified the doctrines of his predecessors. These seven prophets were said to be 'endowed with power of speech' because they authoritatively declared the divine will; they were each followed by 'a mute prophet,' that is, one whose duty was simply to enforce the doctrines of the preceding, without the power of altering or modifying them. The seven legislators were Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Christ, Mohammed, and Ismail; their seven disciples or 'mute prophets' were Seth, Shem, Ishmael, Aaron, Simon (Peter), Ali, and Mohammed the son of Ismail.

"In the fifth degree, it was declared that each of the 'mute prophets' had appointed twelve Dais, or apostles to spread the knowledge of the faith, and that the number twelve was next in sanctity to the number seven. Having passed through these inferior degrees, in which the great aim of all the tenets taught was to inspire converts with a high respect for their instructors, the secret doctrines were revealed to them in the next gradations. Those who attained the sixth degree, were told that religious legislation should be subordinate to philosophical; in the seventh stage, they were introduced to the mystical speculations, which characterize Oriental metaphysics; in the eighth, they were taught the indifference of human actions, and in the ninth, the initiated received their final lesson, 'to believe nothing and dare every thing.'"

ISOCHRISTE (Gr. equal to Christ), some followers of Origen, who were charged with maintaining that the Apostles were raised to equal glory with their Master. They were condemned by a council at Constantinople in A. D. 553.

ISRAELITES. See JEWS.

ISRAFUL, the angel who, according to the Mohammedans, will sound the trumpet which is to summon the world to judgment on the great day.

ISTHMIAN GAMES, one of the great national festivals among the ancient Greeks, which derived its name from the isthmus of Corinth on which it was celebrated. The games were held in honour of Poseidon every third year, although Pliny alleges that they were celebrated every fifth year. They consisted of wrestling, horse and chariot races, and other athletic exercises; along with contests in music and poetry. At a later period, fighting of animals was introduced among the amusements of the joyful festive season. The victors in the Isthmian games received a garland of pine-leaves or of ivy. See GAMES.

ISTHMUS, a surname of POSEIDON (which see), derived from the isthmus of Corinth, on which stood a temple dedicated to his worship.

ITALIC SCHOOL, a sect of ancient Greek philosophers, founded by Pythagoras, who flourished in the last half of the sixth century before Christ. He commenced with the great general idea of absolute, all-comprehending unity, which he called the Monad, and which included spirit and matter, but without separation or division. This Monad was the Pythagorean god. From unity arises multiplicity, or the universe consisting of manifold beings, all evolved from the original Monad. Matter when thus disengaged from the primitive unity becomes the principle of darkness, ignorance, instability and change, while spiritual beings, in the same circumstances, have fallen into a state of imperfection and division. In its fundamental character then the Grecian Italic school was essentially pantheistic.

According to this system, all the efforts of intelligence and will ought to be directed towards their emancipation from the thralldom of matter, and the influence of the variable, with the view of reaching the knowledge of the true which is invariable. The conception of absolute unity is the highest point of science, and when arrived at this point the mind is completely delivered from the influence of matter. The will also being involved in the same bondage to matter, can only be freed by such exercises as fasting and abstinence, by which the soul restricts the dominion of the senses. But the complete emancipation of the soul from the bondage of matter could only, according to Pythagoras, be effected by successive transformations or metempsychoses; and the final deliverance of the soul is its transformation into God.

Such were the fundamental principles of the Italic school of philosophy, which, though originated by Pythagoras, was followed up by Timeus of Locrum, in his work on the Soul of the World, in which the universe is regarded as one vast intelligent being, of which God is the soul, and matter the body. Ocellus Lucanus carried these pantheistic notions still further, recognizing one uncreated, imperishable being, which, however, undergoes successive phases of decay and renovation.

ITALIC VERSION (OLD), a translation into

Latin both of the Old and New Testaments, which was held in general estimation before the time of Jerome, who undertook to revise it at the desire of Damasus, bishop of Rome. Jerome had not proceeded far in his work of revision, when finding that the Old Testament had been translated not from the Hebrew, but from the Greek version, he determined to execute an entirely new translation, directly from the Hebrew original. Hence originated the VULGATE (which see).

ITALY (CHRISTIANITY IN). At a very early period in the history of the Christian church, even in the days of the apostles, the gospel had found its way into Italy. This is evident from the circumstance that when Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, there existed in Rome, the capital of Italy and indeed the metropolis of the world, a church so considerable that the apostle could address them in these words, Rom. i. 8, "I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world." It is very probable that Rome being a general rendezvous of people from all countries, both Jewish and Gentile converts may soon after the day of Pentecost have taken up their residence there, and formed themselves into a Christian church. Among those who were present indeed at the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit, are expressly mentioned "strangers from Rome," by whom doubtless the seeds of Divine truth would be conveyed to their native city; and hence from the salutations at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, it is plain, that some of the oldest Christians lived at Rome. It has long been a favourite assertion of the Roman Catholic Church, that the Apostle Peter was the founder of the church at Rome. For this opinion, however, there is no solid historical foundation; and the whole facts of the case militate against such an idea. Had it been founded by an apostle, Paul would neither have addressed it by letter, nor visited it in person, since it was a fixed principle with him, not to build upon another man's foundation. And it is remarkable that while Caius and Dionysius, the former writing in the end, and the latter in the middle of the second century, speak of Peter as founding the church at Rome, the Apostle Paul is mentioned as engaged along with him in this work. And Caius states, that in his time the graves of the two apostles were pointed out at Rome. Taking all these circumstances together, it seems to be an established point, that at a date later than any noticed in the Acts of the Apostles, both Peter and Paul had jointly ministered to the Christian church at Rome, which had existed in a flourishing state many years previous to their visit.

But a difficulty arises in connection with this view of the subject, from the circumstance that on Paul's arriving in Rome, as stated in Acts xxviii. 22, the elders of the Jews, who resided in the city, begged him to give them some information as to the sect of the Christians, of whom they seem to have known nothing, except that it was everywhere spoken against. At first view it appears inconceivable on the supposition that a Christian church existed in Rome, that the Jews should not have been aware of its existence. And yet notwithstanding the ignorance manifested by the Jewish elders, the very same narrative plainly informs us, though incidentally, of the fact, that at that very time there was a body of Christians resident in the city, some of whom hastened to meet the apostle, whose heart, we are told, was cheered by the sight of them. "So we went," says Luke, who accompanied the apostle, "toward Rome. And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum, and The Three Tavernis: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage." How then, since it cannot be denied that a body of Christians dwelt in Rome when Paul arrived there, were the Jews unacquainted with the fact of their existence? "The only possible explanation," says Olshausen, "of this phenomenon—and it is one which at the same time indicates the origin of the tendency which we afterwards find in the Roman Church—appears to be this. It must be assumed that the Christians of Rome were induced, by the persecutions directed against the Jews under Claudius in the ninth year of his reign, to make their differences from the Jews clearly and strongly apparent—perhaps in consequence of the influence which even at that early time some disciples of St. Paul already exercised on the Roman Church; exactly as at a later date the Christians of Jerusalem separated themselves from the Jews, that they might not be confounded with them, and might be allowed to live in Aelia. If disciples of St. Paul early acquired a decisive influence in Rome, we shall also understand how it was that the Apostle could regard the Roman Church as his own, and could open his correspondence with it without invading another's field of labour. In consequence of this persecution of the Jews, Aquila and Priscilla took refuge at Corinth; and there they were found by the Apostle Paul (Acts xviii. 2), who, without doubt, became even at that time acquainted, by means of these fugitives, with the Roman Church and its circumstances. On this knowledge St. Paul, four or five years later, at the beginning of Nero's reign, on his third missionary journey, wrote from Corinth his epistle to Rome. There is little likelihood that any great number of Jews can have ventured so early to return to Rome; those who returned were obliged to keep themselves in concealment, and it was naturally the interest of the Christian community there to remain as far as possible from them. Even three years later, when St. Paul himself appeared in Rome, the body of Jews there may still not have been considerable,—in part, too, it may not have been composed of its old members, who had lived there before the persecution by Claudius, but of altogether new settlers, who were unacquainted with the earlier existence of a Christian community. And thus it might come to pass within eight or ten years that the Christian community at Rome appears entirely separated from the body of Jews in that city; and in such a state of separation we find it, according to the notice at the end of the Acts."

On the authority of Tertullian, we learn, that when the Roman Emperor Tiberius heard from Pilate concerning the miracles of Christ, and his resurrection from the dead, he actually proposed to the senate that Christ should receive a place among the Roman deities, but the proposal was negatived by the senate. This story, however, which is referred to by no other writer except Tertullian, is too improbable to be credited on his single and unsupported testimony. So ignorant were the Pagans of the new religion, that at first the Christians were confounded with the Jews, so that the edict of Claudius for the banishment of the Jews from Rome, A. D. 53, in all probability involved the Christians also; and hence the confused statement of Suetonius, who lived half-a-century after the event:—"the emperor Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome, who were constantly raising disturbances, at the instigation of Chrestus." With the advance of Christianity in the Roman Empire, the Christians came to be distinguished from the Jews, and to be no longer regarded as a Jewish sect.

The persecution of the Christians commenced at Rome in A. D. 64, under the emperor Nero; and while the Christian religion was prohibited throughout all the provinces of the empire, the cruelty of the emperor fell exclusively on the Christians in Rome, who were accused as being the incendiaries of the city. Domitian, who assumed the imperial purple A. D. 81, adopted also the most severe and persecuting measures against all who embraced Christianity, in whatever part of the empire they might be found. The short reign of Nerva, extending from A. D. 96 to A. D. 99, afforded the Christians a breathing time, all complaints against them being suspended, and a temporary toleration of their religion being granted. The fury of their enemies, however, burst forth with fresh violence on the death of Nerva and the accession of Trajan, more especially as Christianity was spreading rapidly on every side, and the rites of Paganism were everywhere passing into discredit. Pliny the younger, in writing to the emperor concerning the state of religion in Bithynia and Pontus, over which he had been appointed proconsul, says, "The contagion of this superstition has seized not only cities, but also the villages and open country." Tacitus, who lived at the same period, speaks of Christianity as a destructive superstition, which, in common with many other evil opinions and practices, found a home in the great Roman capital. During the reign of Trajan many Christians perished for their religion; but even while sanctioning persecution throughout the whole empire, the emperor issued a rescript, granting pardon to such as manifested repentance by renouncing the Christian faith. The result of this was, that the Christian church at Rome passed through a sifting-time which separated the chaff from the wheat, and while some drew back at the threatening prospect of death, multitudes readily submitted to martyrdom rather than deny their Lord.

Popular fury imagining itself to be supported by law, now rose with unmitigated violence against the Christians, and the first years of the government of Hadrian, who ascended the throne A. D. 117, were disgraced by the most reckless assaults made upon the innocent and unoffending Christians. The emperor was warmly attached to the Pagan customs of his country; but being a lover of justice and social order, he issued a rescript designed to protect the Christians against the unbridled rage of the populace. With this view it required that no accusations against Christians were to be received, unless they were drawn up in legal form, and when legally brought to trial and convicted of acting contrary to the laws, they were to be punished according to their deserts; but a severe punishment was also to be inflicted on false accusers. On the death of the emperor, A. D. 138, his rescript lost its force: but under his successor, Antoninus Pius, several public calamities, which were imputed by the people to the Christians, roused the popular rage to a greater height than it had ever before reached. The emperor, naturally of a mild and gentle disposition, hastened to put an end to such violent proceedings. Though repressed for a time, however, they broke forth again under his successor, Marcus Aurelius, who, while he professed the calm philosophy of the Stoics, joined with the lawless mob in oppressing the Christians. In his reign a pestilence of the most destructive kind spread its ravages throughout the whole Roman empire, and while it was raging in Italy, he looked upon it as a warning from the gods to restore their worship in its minutest particulars. He summoned priests, therefore, from all quarters to Rome that they might observe the Pagan rites, by which he hoped to avert the evil. But this zeal for the renewal of the ancient worship only rendered him more cruel and unsparing in his persecution of the Christians. By a strange incident, however, which occurred in the course of Providence, Marcus Aurelius was led to change his whole line of policy towards the Christians. It is thus briefly noticed by Neander: "While prosecuting the war with the Marcommannians and Quades in 174, he, with his army, was thrown into a situation of extreme peril. The burning sun shone full in the faces of his soldiers, who were suffering under the torture of intolerable thirst; while, at the same time, under these unfavourable circumstances, they were threatened with an attack of the enemy. In this extremity, the twelfth legion, composed entirely of Christians, fell upon their knees. Their prayer was followed by a shower of rain, which allayed the thirst of the Roman soldiers, and by a storm which frightened the barbarians.

The Roman army obtained the victory, and the emperor, in commemoration of the event, gave those Christian soldiers the name of the 'thundering legion.' He ceased to persecute the Christians; and though he did not receive Christianity immediately into the class of 'lawful religions,' yet he published an edict which threatened with severe penalties such as accused the Christians merely on the score of their religion."

The Christians under Commodus, who succeeded to the throne A. D. 180, enjoyed a season of respite and tranquillity after the protracted sufferings of the previous reign. Not that the old laws were repealed, but the emperor, though a person of licentious habits, was from some cause or another disposed to befriend the Christians. Irenæus, who lived at this period, says, that Christians were to be found in the imperial court enjoying the same privileges which belonged to all throughout the Roman empire. Commodus was assassinated A. D. 192, and Clement of Alexandria, who wrote soon after this event, describes the Christians as exposed to heavy persecution. "Many martyrs," says he, "are daily burned, crucified, beheaded, before our eyes." Septimius Severus, on reaching the empire, threw the shield of his imperial protection over the Christians, knowing that men and women of the highest rank in Rome, senators and their wives, belonged to the persecuted sect. In the course of a few years, however, this emperor passed a law, forbidding under severe penalties a change either to Judaism or to Christianity. The circumstances of the Christians were now rendered distressing, and entire communities were glad to purchase freedom from persecution by the payment of large sums of money. No improvement in the state of matters took place under the cruel Caracalla, but a spirit of hostility to the Christians prevailed in all the provinces of the Roman empire, which, however, began to pass away at the commencement of the reign of Heliogabalus A. D. 219. The aim of this emperor was to establish, not the ancient Roman idolatry, but the Syrian worship of the sun; and Christianity, therefore, he tolerated as he did other foreign religions. From very different motives this toleration continued under Alexander Severus from A. D. 222 to A. D. 235. Partial to a species of religious eclecticism, he recognized Christ as a Divine Being, on a footing with the other gods; and it is said that he wished to have the name of Christ enrolled among the Roman deities. He does not appear, however, to have adopted Christianity by an express law of the empire among the tolerated religions. But the partial quiet which the Christians enjoyed during the reign of Severus came to an end with his assassination, when the throne came to be occupied by Maximinus, who allowed full scope to the popular hatred which existed in many parts of the empire against the Christians. A more favourable period for the Christians returned again in A. D. 244, when Philip the Arabian, who is said to have been himself a Christian, ascended the throne. Origen, who lived at this time, and was on terms of intimacy with the imperial family, states, that the Christians now enjoyed a season of quiet. "The number of the Christians," he says, "God has caused continually to increase, and some addition is made to it every day; he has, moreover, given them already the free exercise of their religion, although a thousand obstacles still hinder the spread of the doctrines of Jesus in the world."

During this long time of peace Christianity made rapid and extensive inroads on the Paganism of the Roman empire, and the fury of the adherents of the old religion was aroused to check, if possible, the encroachments of the Christian faith. Decius Trajan, who conquered Philip the Arabian, and ascended the throne of the Cæsars A. D. 249, was a devoted friend of Paganism, and was, therefore, resolved to restore the ancient laws against the Christians, which had fallen into desuetude, and to put them in execution with the utmost rigour with the view of effecting an entire suppression of Christianity. He commenced his reign by demanding from all his subjects complete conformity to the ceremonies of the old Roman religion on pain of torture, and in the case of bishops on pain of death. The persecution began at the city of Rome with great severity, and gradually extended to the provinces. At its very outset the Roman bishop Fabianus suffered martyrdom. Imprisonment, exile, torture, and death were the portion of those of both sexes, of every age, and of all ranks and conditions, who were disposed to hold fast the testimony of Jesus. In the close of the year 251, Decius fell in a war against the Goths. The calm which the Christians enjoyed, in consequence of this event, continued during the reign of Gallus and Volusianus, which extended only through a part of the following year. But a destructive pestilence, with drought and famine, excited, as in former times, the fury of the populace against the Christians, as being, in their view, the cause of these calamities. An imperial edict now appeared, requiring all Roman subjects to sacrifice to the gods, and when it was discovered that the altars were far less frequented than in former times, new persecutions arose, in order to compel an increase of sacrifices, and to sustain the declining interests of Paganism. The bishops of Rome, who were, of course, under the immediate eye of the emperor, were the first to bring down upon themselves the sword of persecution; both Cornelius and Lucius, who successively held the episcopate of Rome, were first banished, then condemned to death. The assassination of Gallus, A. D. 253, restored tranquillity and peace to the oppressed Christians; and the Emperor Valerian, in the first year of his reign, seemed disposed to treat them with clemency, and even kindness. But in the course of a few years he was persuaded to alter his course of acting towards the Christians. He deprived the churches of their teachers and pastors; then he prohibited public as-semblies of Christians, endeavouring in this way to check the progress of Christianity without resorting to bloodshed. Measures of severity were now resorted to, chiefly, in the first instance, against bishops and clergy, but afterwards against the laity also; even women and children were subjected to the scourge, and then condemned to imprisonment or to labour in the mines. Finding that such measures were ineffectual, Valerian resolved to adopt a more vigorous line of procedure. In A. D. 258, accordingly, an edict was issued, declaring that "Bishops, presbyters, and deacons were to be put to death immediately by the sword; senators and knights were to forfeit their rank and their property; and, if they still remained Christians, to suffer the like punishment; women of condition, after being deprived of their property, were to be banished. Those Christians who were in the service of the palace, who had formerly made profession of Christianity, or who now made such profession, should be treated as the emperor's property, and after being chained, distributed to labour on the various imperial estates." In consequence of this rescript, the Roman bishop, Sixtus, and four deacons of his church, were condemned to suffer death.

Valerian, having been engaged in war with the Persians, was taken prisoner, and the imperial sceptre passed into the hands of his son Gallienus. This emperor immediately published an edict, seeming to the Christians the free exercise of their religion, and restoring to them the cemeteries, as well as other buildings and lands belonging to the churches which had been confiscated in the reign of his father. This edict was very important, recognizing, as it did, the Christian church as a legally existing corporation, entitled to hold common property, and now brought under the express protection of law. For more than half a century the Christians enjoyed a season of peace and tranquillity, and their ranks were joined by individuals drawn from all orders of society. Men of wealth and station now began, in considerable numbers, to profess Christianity, and splendid churches to be erected in the large cities. And even when Dioclesian was first invested with the imperial dignity, Christians were sometimes raised to the highest offices of trust. The Pagans were naturally jealous of the growing esteem in which Christians were now held, and more especially as, in their view, the rise of Christianity must necessarily hasten the downfall of the old religion. This crisis the Pagan party felt to be imminent. All their influence, therefore, they brought to bear upon Dioclesian to induce him to enter upon an exterminating persecution of the Christians. But the emperor was most unwilling to undertake the bloody task. A fitter tool was found in Dioclesian's son-in-law, Caius Galerius Maximian, a prince who was zealously devoted to the Pagan religion, and held sacrifices and divination in high estimation. This man, accordingly, being commander of the forces, issued an order to the army requiring every soldier to perform sacrificial rites; and in consequence Christian officers resigned their commissions, and Christian soldiers quitted the service, that they might remain steadfast to their faith. This was the commencement of a time of persecution, but beyond the harsh military order Dioclesian refused to move. At length, through the influence of Galerius, he was persuaded, in A. D. 303, to commence a bloody persecution. An edict was forthwith issued, prohibiting all assemblies of Christians for religious worship; ordering all Christian churches to be demolished, and all manuscripts of the Bible to be destroyed. Christians who held places of honour must either renounce their faith or be degraded; while those in the humbler ranks of life were to be divested of their rights as citizens and freemen. Christian slaves were pronounced to be incapable of receiving their freedom as long as they remained Christians. In judicial proceedings also, whenever Christians were concerned, the torture was authorized to be used.

The impression made upon the Christians by this edict of Dioclesian was, that nothing less was aimed at than the total extirpation of Christianity. All the prisons were now filled with the Christians, and a new edict appeared, commanding that such as were willing to sacrifice should be set free, and the rest compelled by every means to offer sacrifices to the gods. The floodgates of oppression were now thrown open, and cruelties of every kind were practised upon the Christians. Constantius Chlorus, however, in A. D. 305, was raised to the dignity of emperor along with Galerius, and being naturally of a mild disposition, as well as a friend to Christianity, the sword of persecution was now sheathed, and the Christians enjoyed a temporary respite. But in the course of three short years, a command was issued by Galerius, directing the fallen temples of the gods to be restored, and requiring that all free men and women, and slaves, and even little children, should sacrifice and partake of what was offered at heathen altars. This cruel edict led to new tortures, and a fresh effusion of blood; a state of matters which, however, was happily soon followed by another respite, more particularly to the Christians in the West, which lasted till the beginning of the year 310. Galerius, having been attacked by a severe and painful disease, now relaxed his severity, and in the following year the remarkable edict appeared which put an end to the persecution of Christians in the Roman empire.

With the succession of Constantine commenced a new era in the history of the Christian church. Soon after his remarkable conversion to Christianity, A. D. 312, he proceeded to establish it as the religion of the state, and sought to remodel the government of the Christian church, so as to make it correspond with the civil arrangements of the empire. From this time the bishops of Rome began to put forth those arrogant claims which terminated in the full development of the papacy, A. D. 606. The acknowledgment of the Pope as Universal Bishop, was, of course, a work of time, and it is a well-known fact, that the papal supremacy was resisted in Italy after it had been owned by the most remote churches of the West. So early as the fourth century, the worthy Ambrose, archbishop of Milan, which was the capital of the diocese of Italy, prepared a particular office or form of worship, which was known by the name of the Ambrosian Liturgy; and even after the Pope had appointed the Roman Missal to be used in all the Western churches, the church of Milan continued still to adhere to their own ritual. It was not, indeed, till the eleventh century that the archbishops of Milan would consent so far to acknowledge the authority of Rome, as to receive their pall from the Pope. When Honorius first demanded the submission of the church of Milan, a universal feeling of indignation was excited among the people, as well as the clergy. And it was not without a strong remonstrance that the point was at length yielded, but as a standing memorial of their independence, they still continued to use the Liturgy of Ambrose. For a long period the papal claims met with occasional resistance from the archbishops of Milan, and when Gregory VII., in A. D. 1074, issued his famous decree enforcing the celibacy of the clergy, the church of Milan rejected the papal edict, pronounced the Pope and all who adhered to him on this point to be chargeable with heresy, and they even threatened to make a formal separation from the Church of Rome.

During the dark ages, Italy was the scene of some of the most valiant struggles against Papal domination. Claude of Turin, in the ninth century, who protested against the worship of images and against pilgrimages to Rome; and Arnold of Brescia, the disciple of Abelard, in the twelfth century, who lifted his voice against the secularization of the church and the temporal authority of the Pope; are examples of the reforming spirit which has so often characterized the Christians of Italy. (See ARNOLDISTS.) The labours of the enthusiastic young priest of Brescia produced a powerful effect upon the ardent minds of the Italian people, and prepared them for welcoming the Waldenses, who, penetrating through the Alps, effected a settlement in Lombardy A. D. 1180, and so rapidly spread themselves throughout Italy, that in the beginning of the thirteenth century, some of them were found even in Rome itself. Actively engaged in propagating their simple scriptural tenets, these hereditary witnesses for the truth could not fail to call down upon themselves the fulminations of the Vatican. In A. D. 1231, accordingly, Gregory IX. issued a bull, directing that a strict search should be made for these heretics, and that when discovered, they should be given up into the hands of the secular authorities to be punished; while those who gave them shelter and protection were to be declared infamous, along with their children to the second generation. The Patarenes, as the Waldenses were then called, had churches in almost all the towns of Lombardy, and in some parts of Tuscany, as well as in Naples and Sicily. For a long time their students of theology were educated in Paris, but in the thirteenth century they had academies in Lombardy for training their candidates for the ministry.

A colony of Vaudois, in A. D. 1370, found an asylum in Calabria, but their simple worship, so unlike to that of Rome, soon attracted the notice of the priests, who raised the cry of heresy against them. The colony, however, maintained its position, and received from time to time accessions to its numbers, continuing to flourish for nearly two centuries, when, as the light of the Reformation began to dawn upon Italy, it was assaulted with fury by Rome's supporters, and completely exterminated. For a long period the corruptions of the Roman Church were so thoroughly known and recognized among the Italian people, as to form a staple subject of raillery and reproach in the works of their most celebrated poets. Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, and Ariosto, each in turn made the most withering exposure of the errors and evil practices of the Romish clergy, and especially of the monks and friars. The novelists joined with the poets in these assaults upon the ecclesiastics of the time: and a series of spirited lampoons and pungent satires imbued the minds of many among all classes of the Italian people, with the most thorough contempt both for the clergy and the church to which they belonged.

But of all the precursors of the Reformation, Italy owes its deepest debt of gratitude to the great Florentine Reformer, Girolamo Savonarola. This eminent man was born in Ferrara in 1452. Endowed with great talents, he devoted many years to the study of philosophy and theology. Being a man of strong imagination, and warm piety, he was impressed with a firm persuasion that he had received a mission from above. His discourses to the people produced a powerful effect, inveighing as he did with the most impressive eloquence against the abuses of the church, and the unfaithfulness and vices of the clergy. Having settled at Florence in 1489, he so wrought upon the minds of the people, by his powerful and fervid appeals, that a speedy improvement took place in the whole aspect of the town. "Luxury," says Dr. McCrie, "was repressed, the women gave an example of modesty in their dress, and a change of manners became visible over the whole city." Nor did he call for a reform of Florence alone, but of the whole country, commencing, as he alleged it ought to do, with the head of the church. The reigning Pope was Alexander VI., whose notorious vices Savonarola most unsparingly exposed. The result of such boldness it was easy to predict. The daring monk was apprehended, accused of heresy, interdicted from preaching, and visited with a sentence of excommunication. For a short time the Reformer yielded to the Papal decision, but at length summoning courage, he appeared again in public, renouncing obedience to a corrupt tribunal; and conducting divine service in the face of the interdict, he preached to immense crowds, who listened with the deepest interest to the discourses of the reforming monk. Alexander was enraged at this open defiance of his Pontifical authority, and watching his opportunity, he prevailed upon the Florentines to give up the heretical monk into his hands, on which he condemned him to the flames, along with two of his reforming associates. In pursuance of this sentence, Savonarola was burnt at the stake on the 23d of May 1498.

The cry for reform in the church, which the Florentine reformer had so loudly and perseveringly re-echoed, was now familiar as household words throughout all Italy. For a century this cry had rung in the ears of the people, and both from the pulpit and the press the church had been assailed as essentially Antichristian both in its doctrines and practices. Such invectives could no longer be tolerated, and in 1516 a papal bull was issued forbidding preachers to treat in their sermons of the coming of Antichrist. It was too late. Such a mass of corruption did the Popes and the Papal church appear to the discerning Italian people, that contempt for the organized framework of the church gave rise, first to indifference about religion, which afterwards passed by a gradual and easy process into cold scepticism, and this again attempted to hide itself under a forced outward respect for the forms of the church. But in spite of all the attempts made by the Popes to uphold the credit of the Romish system, the writings of Luther and Melancthon, Zwingli and Bucer, were extensively circulated throughout Italy, and perused by many with the greatest eagerness. And the reformed opinions were all the more easily spread, as the attention of numbers of the learned Italians had been directed to sacred and oriental literature. These studies naturally led them to the examination of the Holy Scriptures, and prepared them for taking an active and intelligent part in the religious controversies of the period. "The reformers appealed," says Dr. McCrie, "from the fallible and conflicting opinions of the doctors of the church to the infallible dictates of revelation, and from the vulgate version of the Scriptures to the Hebrew and Greek originals; and in these appeals they were often supported by the translations recently made by persons of acknowledged orthodoxy, and published with the permission and warm recommendations of the head of the church. In surveying this portion of history, it is impossible not to admire the arrangements of providence, when we perceive monks and bishops, and cardinals and popes, active in forging and polishing those weapons which were soon to be turned against themselves, and which they afterwards would fain have blunted and laboured to decri as unlawful and empoisoned."

In vain did the Romish clergy exclaim loudly against the translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue: translations into the Italian began to appear soon after the invention of the art of printing, and tended to pave the way for the reception of the reformed doctrines in Italy. And the intercourse which had been opened up between that country and the Protestant parts of Europe, tended to propagate the new opinions among all classes of the people. So seriously was this inconvenience felt by the defenders of the old religion, that they would willingly have put a stop, if it had been possible, to all intercourse between the Germans and Italians. During the first half of the sixteenth century, however, this intercourse was rendered more intimate and close in consequence of a number of German soldiers who had embraced the Protestant faith having come into Italy in the army of Charles V., as well as in that of his rival Francis I. These Protestant soldiers mingling with the Italian people, made them acquainted with the opinions of Luther and his associates. And the impressions thus conveyed to the popular mind in favour of the Reformation, were not a little strengthened by the bitter and angry contest between the Pope and the emperor. Manifestoes were published on both sides full of threats and recriminations. Nor did the emperor rest contented with mere verbal fulmination. He advanced with his army into the territories of the church, besieged Rome itself, and took his holiness prisoner. The following scene, described by the elder McCrie, shows the contempt with which the German soldiers treated the rites of the Romish church: "A party of German soldiers, mounted on horses and mules, assembled one day in the streets of Rome. One of them, named Grunwald, distinguished by his majestic countenance and stature, being attired like the Pope, and wearing a triple crown, was placed on a horse richly caparisoned. Others were arrayed like cardinals, some wearing mitres, and others clothed in scarlet or white, according to the rank of those whom they personated. In this form they marched, amidst the sounding of drums and fifes, and accompanied by a vast concourse of people, with all the pomp and ceremony usually observed in a pontifical procession. When they passed a house in which any of the cardinals was confined, the procession stopped, and Grunwald blessed the people by stretching out his fingers in the manner practised by the Pope on such occasions. After some time he was taken from his horse, and borne on the shoulders of one of his companions on a pad or seat prepared for the purpose. Having reached the castle of St. Angelo, he drank from a large cup to the safe custody of Clement, in which he was pledged by his attendants. He then administered to his cardinals an oath, in which they engaged to yield due obedience and faithful allegiance to the emperor, as their lawful and only prince; and not to disturb the peace of the empire by intrigues, but, as became them, according to the precepts of Scripture and the example of Christ and his apostles, to be subject to the civil powers. After a speech, in which he rehearsed the civil, patricial, and sacrilegious wars excited by the popes, and acknowledged that Providence had raised up the Emperor Charles V. to revenge these crimes and bridle the rage of wicked priests, the pretended pontiff solemnly promised to transfer all his authority and power to Martin Luther, that he might remove the corruptions which had infected the apostolical see, and completely re-fit the ship of St. Peter, that it might no longer be the sport of the winds and waves, through the unskillfulness and negligence of its governors, who, intrusted with the helm, had spent their days and nights in drinking and debauchery. Then raising his voice, he said, 'All who agree to these things, and would see them carried into execution, let them signify this by lifting up their hands;' upon which the whole band of soldiers, raising their hands, exclaimed, 'Long live Pope Luther! Long live Pope Luther!' All this was performed under the eye of Clement VII."

Throughout all the Italian States, and more especially in the large towns, were found numerous and ardent friends of the Protestant cause. And even the very disputes which were agitated among the Reformed churches themselves were made subjects of controversy among the Italian Protestants. This was remarkably the case with the difference which existed between Luther and Zwingli respecting the presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Supper; the former interpreting the words of institution literally, the latter figuratively. Both views of the subject had their respective supporters in Italy, but the majority were in favour of the opinions of the Swiss Reformer. The controversy was warmly agitated among the Protestants of Modena, Bologna, and other parts of Italy; but it was carried on with the greatest heat in the Venetian territories, where the doctrine of the German Reformer chiefly prevailed. Another controverted point, which was keenly discussed among the Italian Protestants, was the doctrine of the Trinity. It is not improbable that the heretical writings of Servetus may have found their way into Italy. At all events the Reformed church at Naples was disturbed in its infancy by the diffusion of Arian principles among its members; and in the Venetian territories, where the Protestants were numerous, though not organized into settled congregations under regular pastors, these unscriptural notions obtained ready acceptance. Socinian writers are accustomed to trace the origin of their sect to meetings which were held towards the middle of the sixteenth century in the territories of Venice, but chiefly at Vicenza, where they allege that private conferences or colleges met and agreed upon a creed which was drawn up on Socinian principles. This statement, however, is doubted by Mosheim and other ecclesiastical historians, and their hesitation to admit its accuracy is amply justified by the consideration, that not the slightest allusion is made to the subject in any part of the works of Faustus Socinus.

But although it is scarcely probable that the Socinian doctrines originated in Italy, it is undeniable that a number of the Italian Protestants were, at the Reformation period, infected with these heretical opinions, and, accordingly, when driven from their country and settled in the Grisons, we find the Grison churches agitated by violent disputes, not only on the doctrine of the Trinity, but on various other articles of the Christian faith. And yet Protestantism in Italy, with all the errors which came to be mingled with it, was a living, a growing principle, which had taken such root in the country, that the friends of the Reformation entertained the most sanguine hope that Italy would throw off the yoke of Rome. The Pope himself became alarmed at the rapid progress of the new opinions; and, in 1542, the Romish clergy were urgent with his Holiness to take some effective measures for the defence of the Catholic faith. Those of the ecclesiastics, accordingly, who were suspected of favouring the new opinions, were carefully watched, and occasion eagerly sought of lodging formal complaints against them. Oclino and Martyr, in particular, who attracted crowds to listen to their discourses, while their writings were extensively circulated and eagerly read by the Italian people, were surrounded by spies, and snares having been laid for their lives, they were compelled to escape from the country. The erection of a court of inquisition was now eagerly pressed by the more zealous Romanists as absolutely necessary to preserve Italy from being overrun with heresy. Accordingly, Pope Paul III. founded at Rome the congregation of the Holy Office, by a bull dated 1st April 1543. This court at first confined its operations to the States of the church; but gradually extending its authority, it established branches in other parts of the country. The senate of Venice refused to allow the inquisition to be set up within their territories, except in a very modified form. On two different occasions, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Neapolitans had resisted the establishment of the inquisition in their country, and even when Charles V., in 1546, renewed the attempt, such a commotion was excited that it was found necessary to abandon the design. In almost every part, however, of the Italian States, Rome, by watching its opportunity, and acting with its usual caution, succeeded in peaceably establishing the inquisition, and in this way alone, as popish historians admit, was the Reformation suppressed in Italy. No sooner was this engine of tyranny and cruel oppression set up than multitudes of the Italian Protestants fled from the country, and the prisons of the inquisition were rapidly filled with those who remained behind. The public profession of the Reformed religion was now strictly prohibited, but so numerous were its private adherents, that it cost the inquisitors the labour of twenty years to extirpate them. At Modena, Ferrara, and the territories of the Venetian republic, the popes found the utmost difficulty in suppressing the Reformed doctrine. One occupant of the see of Rome after another, lighted up the fires of the inquisition for the destruction of Italian Protestantism; but although the open confession of the Reformed doctrines was rendered impossible, persons were found in different parts of Italy, in the seventeenth century, who secretly held these principles.

Great numbers of the Protestant Italian refugees found a home in the Grisons, where they enjoyed liberty of conscience and the pure preaching of the gospel. Zealous and unwearied in their endeavours to advance the cause of truth and righteousness, their settlement in that country proved a blessing to many. New churches sprung up on every side, and in a short time the Protestants became a decided majority of the population. The provinces situated between the Alps and Italy, more especially the valley of the Valteline, formed the principal seat of the Italian Protestants who had been driven from their native land. But little bands of these refugees repaired to other places, such as Zurich, Basle, and Geneva in Switzerland, Lyons in France, Strasburg in Germany, Antwerp in the Low Countries, and even to London, in each of which towns they formed Protestant churches where the gospel was preached in the Italian language.

Since the suppression of the Reformation in Italy, that unhappy country has been crushed under the combined influence of Papal oppression and political despotism. But as Sismondi has eloquently remarked, "her heart still beats with the love of liberty, virtue, and glory: she is chained and covered with blood; but she still knows her strength and her future destiny; she is insulted by those for whom she has opened the way to every improvement; but she feels that she is fated to take the lead again and Europe will know no repose till the nation which in the dark ages lighted the torch of civilization with that of liberty, shall be enabled herself to enjoy the light which she created." In every part of Italy, but more especially in Tuscany and Naples, the slightest attempt to assert liberty of thought in matters of religion, is instantly met with persecution in various forms. The Bible in the vernacular language is a proscribed book: and tracts containing doctrines not in unison with the dogmas of Rome, expose the persons in whose possession they are found to the vengeance of the priests. In the dominions of the King of Sardinia, however, the Protestant religion is tolerated, and the Waldenses, that long-persecuted sect, which has never bowed its neck to the yoke of Rome, maintains its scriptural principles, and practises its simple worship without molestation or interruption of any kind.

ITOGAY, a household god among the Mongol Tartars. He is the guardian of their families, and presides over all the products of the earth. Old travellers tell us, that no one presumes to dine until this god and his family are first served, their entertainment consisting in the mouths of the idols being covered with grease. When the people have dined, they throw out the fragments which remain, expecting them to be devoured by some unknown spirits.

INIUS, a surname of Apollo, from a district in the island of Rhodes, where he was worshipped.

J

JAAFARITES, a Mohammedan sect who held in the highest reverence the memory of Jaafar, the sixth Imam, who is considered by many of the Schîtes as little if at all inferior in knowledge to Solomon himself. When the celebrated Nadir Schah proposed to assimilate the Persian Mohammedan system to that of the Turks, he suggested that Jaafar should be acknowledged as the head of the new national faith. His plans, however, were altogether unsuccessful. See IMAMS (THE TWELVE).

JABAJAHITES, a Mohammedan sect, who denied the perfect foreknowledge of God, and asserted that the providence of God in the government of the world is regulated by circumstances as they arise; and they held also that the Divine knowledge, like human, was improved by experience.

JACOBINS, a name which was applied in France to the DOMINICANS (which see) because their principal convent was situated near the gate of St. James (Jacobus) in Paris. At the commencement of the first French revolution, the meetings of its most zealous promoters were held in the hall of this convent, and from this circumstance Jacobin came to be another name for a revolutionist.

JACOBITE CHURCH, a name which the Syrian church assumes to itself. When the Syrian Christians are interrogated as to the reason of this name, they usually allege that they are the descendants of Jacob or Israel; that they are the descendants also of the earliest converts of the apostle James; and that they are sprung from the adherents of the monk and presbyter Jacob Baradaeus, who, in the sixth century, was mainly instrumental in preserving, establishing, and extending the Monophysite party in Syria and the adjacent countries. In his zeal for the propagation of the Monophysite tenets, Jacob wandered in the disguise of a beggar through the Syrian provinces, confirming and encouraging the oppressed party, and ordaining pastors over them. The patriarch of Antioch was made superior of the sect, and Jacob laboured as a bishop at Edessa for thirty-three years, until A. D. 558, when he died. At the close of his laborious life, Jacob left his sect in a very flourishing condition in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, and other countries, where they have flourished more or less till the present day.

The great body of the members of the Jacobite church are now found in Mesopotamia, particularly in the neighbourhood of Mosul and Mardin. Their primate or highest ecclesiastical functionary is the patriarch of Antioch, who, since the end of the ninth century, has uniformly taken the name of Ignatius, in memory of the martyred bishop of Antioch. This dignitary usually resides in a monastery near Mardin. The second dignitary, the primate of Tagrit, resides near Mosul, and is termed Maphrida or fruit-bearer. The whole number of Jacobites is calculated to amount to nearly 150,000 souls, which, according to Dr. Wilson, are thus distributed: "In the pashalik of Aleppo, and chiefly in that city and in Antioch, they number probably about 2,000. In Damascus they have only a few families. There are very few, if any, of them to be found in Lebanon; and in the southern parts of the Holy Land, including Jerusalem, where they have a bishop and a monastic establishment, they probably do not exceed a hundred or two. In the provinces of Malabar and Travankûr in India, their numbers, by the persecutions and frauds of the Roman Catholics, have been considerably reduced. Those who remain independent of Rome, in a letter to their brethren of Mesopotamia, stated their numbers a few years ago at 11,972 families, having forty-five churches and a half. In the government census of Travankûr of 1836, they are given at 118,382 souls, the Romo-Syrians being, in addition to this number, 56,184 souls. The Syrian and Nestorian communities in India have now for many years been united. The time of the merging of the former into the latter is not exactly known."

In their public worship the Syrian Christians use the Syrian language, though their vernacular tongue is the Arabic. They acknowledge only the councils of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus. Like other Monophysites, they allege that the Divine and human nature of Christ were so united as to form only one, yet without any change, confusion, or mixture of the two natures. While their liturgical standards contain much scriptural, evangelical doctrine, the Jacobites have imbibed some dangerous errors. They address prayers to the saints, particularly to the Virgin Mary, and John the Baptist, whom they address as powerful intercessors with Christ in their behalf. They believe in baptismal regeneration. In dispensing baptism the face of the child is turned toward the East, and a triple affusion of water is made with the left hand of the priest as he pronounces the name of each of the persons of the Trinity. The anointing with holy oil is also in use in the Jacobite church, and the rite of Confirmation follows that of Baptism and Chrism after the expiry of seven days. The doctrines of the real presence, and the sacrifice of the mass, are tenets of this church, but they use leavened bread in the eucharist. The priest alone drinks of the cup; but he dips the cake, with the cross and sections corresponding with the twelve apostles imprinted upon it, in the wine, before handing it to the people. Prayers are offered for the dead by the Jacobites, and they maintain the doctrine of sacerdotal absolution. They attach great importance and efficacy to the sign of the cross. Their fasts are numerous, and kept with great strictness, so that, as Dr. Wolf was assured by one of their deacons, for seven months in the year they are neither allowed to eat meat, nor fish, nor eggs, and can eat nothing else but herbs.

There are some Romanist Jacobites in Syria, who have a patriarch of their own at Aleppo. In 1847, the Jacobite bishop of Mardin went over to the Church of Rome, along with some of his flock. In general, however, their attachment to the Monophysite doctrine proves an insuperable obstacle to their conversion to the Romish faith. Accordingly, a Jesuit, in the seventeenth century, declared, that "if you combat them, they only answer by invectives, making the sign of the cross with only the middle finger of their hand, holding, at the same time, the other fingers closed, in order to make you understand that they acknowledge only one nature in Jesus Christ, and that you shall never make them believe the contrary." The Egyptian Jacobites are called Copts (see COPTIC CHURCH), and the Indian Jacobites or Syrian Christians of Malabar, receive the name of Christians of St. Thomas. (See THOMAS, ST., CHRISTIANS OF).

JACOBITES, a name applied to the adherents of James II., particularly to the non-jurors, who separated from the high Episcopal church simply because they would not take the oath of allegiance to the new king, and who, in the public services, prayed for the Stuart family. They were most numerous in Scotland, but were much lessened by the defeat of the Pretender in 1745, and still more so at his death in 1788.

JACOBITES (ORDER OF), a Romish order of mendicant monks established by Innocent III. in the thirteenth century, but which ceased to exist in the course of the same century.

JAGOUTH, or YAGHUTH, one of the five principal gods of the ancient Arabians. He was usually represented under the form of a lion, and is mentioned by name in the Koran.

JAH. See JEHOVAH.

JAINS, a remarkable sect of Hindus found scattered throughout India, but more especially in South Canara. The hills about Gawilghur have been a favourite retreat of the Jains, who, in many particulars, resemble the ancient followers of Budha. Several of their tenets are similar; their temples are frequently of the same fashion: and their images have the curly hair and African features peculiar to the Buddhist idols. These two sects agree in denying the divine origin and authority of the Vedas; the worship of both is chiefly directed to certain eminent saints, having the same attributes though bearing different names; and they both recognize the subordinate deities of the orthodox Hindus. The doctrine of transmigration, also, is held by both these sects. In all other matters they are at variance. The Jains admit the doctrine of caste, so far as to acknowledge the usual division into the four principal tribes; but they select their priests from the Vaisyas or cultivators, instead of from the Brahmans. Hence the Brahmans entertain the most inveterate hostility to the Jains, who are always found in separate communities, and such is the mutual enmity of the two parties, that while the Brahmans are wont, in their daily prayers, to curse the Jains, these again often utter the cry, "May the Brahmans perish!"

One of the great peculiarities which belong to the religion of the Jains is the remarkable and even ludicrous extent to which they carry their scruples respecting the destruction of animal life. "Their absurdities in this matter," remarks a writer much conversant with India, "are far beyond those of the Hindoos. With one exception,—the sacrifice of the ram,—they esteem the destruction of any sentient creature, however minute, as the most heinous of crimes: and continually carry at their girdles a small broom, suspended by a string, with which they tenderly sweep aside every insect which they may observe in their path, lest they should accidentally tread upon it. To so senseless a length do they carry this principle, that they will not pluck any herb or vegetable, or partake of any sort of food, which may be supposed to contain animalcules; so that the only articles of sustenance remaining to them appear to be rice, and a few sorts of pulse, which they cook with milk. They affirm, indeed, that it is as foul a murder to kill an insect as to slay a man; and so extreme is their precaution to avoid the commission of the crime, that it is with great reluctance, and only when reduced to the necessity by urgent thirst, that they will drink water: even then, they invariably suck up the fluid through a piece of fine muslin. In like manner, when they require water for ablution, or any unavoidable household purpose, they carefully strain it repeatedly, before they venture to use it. The most noxious vermin and insects are also treated with the same consideration as the most harmless creatures; and if, through persevering annoyance, they are compelled to deprive certain odious insects of the asylum usually found upon their persons, they remove the tormentors with the utmost care, and tenderly place them out of harm's way."

The Jains allege that they have preserved the true and primitive religion, and that Hinduism, as it now exists, is a monstrous combination of heretical dogmas and practices. The Vedas, the eighteen Puranas, the Trimurti, the Avatars of Vishnu, the Lingam, the worship of the cow, and other animals, the sacrifice of the Homa, and all adoration of sensible objects are rejected by the Jains, who maintain these to be perversions of the primitive religion. It is not improbable, indeed, that the Jains may be identical with the Gymnosophists of India mentioned by the Greek writers, and in confirmation of this idea it may be stated, that in Hindustan they are called Digambaras, which means "devoid of clothes," thus corresponding to the name applied to them by the Greeks. Their philosophical opinions are thoroughly materialistic. Thus the formation of the universe is explained by the combination of identical or homogeneous atoms. They divide beings or existences into two great classes, animate and inanimate, the former being the subjects of enjoyment, and the latter the objects of enjoyment. Animated beings they allege to be eternal, but having bodies they are composed of parts formed by the four elements, earth, air, fire, and water. The soul is believed to exist in three states,—that of bondage by its own activity, that of liberation by the fulfilment of precepts designed to destroy activity, and that of perfection when all activity has ceased. This last is the highest distinction to which a Jain devotee can be elevated. It is styled Sanyasi Nirvani, and is reached only after a long course of penance. "In this sublime state," we are told, "the soul is supposed to be partially absorbed into the essence of the Divinity, and the man becomes almost insensible to earthly concerns. He is said to be devoid of all human passions, and acknowledges none of the requirements of nature: hunger and thirst are unknown to him; abstruse contemplation is his only sleep; heat and cold, disease and infirmity, alike fail to inflict pain or inconvenience; and his eye rests with equal indifference upon good and evil. Being divested of all wants, he lives in absolute independence of his one-time fellow mortals, and estranges himself from all communion with them, having no thought, affection, or inclination, except for things divine. In this manner, he advances step by step, in purity and excellence, during which time the principles or elements of his natural body are gradually dissolved, until, having passed through eleven intermediate stages, he arrives at ultimate perfection, and becomes inseparably united with the Deity."

The Jains have a literature peculiar to their sect, more particularly a series of works called Puranas, which ought not to be confounded with the Puranas of the Hindus, for although they occasionally insert legends borrowed from the latter, their special object is to trace the legendary history of the Tirthakaras, or deified teachers, worshipped by the sect. The number of these teachers whom they reverence amounts to twenty-four for a given period, and they enumerate by name the twenty-four of their past, the twenty-four of the present, and the twenty-four of the age to come. They are called Jinas, and their statues, either all or in art, are assembled in their temples, sometimes of colossal dimensions, and usually composed of black or white marble. The objects now held in highest esteem in Hindustan by the Jains are Pārswanāth and Mahāvira, the twenty-third and twenty-fourth Jinas of the present era, who seem to have superseded all their predecessors. (See JINAS.) The Jain temples in Southern India afford some of the finest specimens of Hindu architecture. They are apparently of great antiquity, and are usually found in groups of eight, ten, or more huddled closely together in some very retired and romantic spot.

The sect of the Jains is said by Mr. Colebrooke to have been founded about B. C. 600, by Pārswanātha, and established by Mahavira. The sect contains two great subdivisions, the Svetambaras, white-robed, who abound in Gujerat, and Digambaras, unclothed, who abound in Rajpootana. The latter separated from the general body about A. D. 552, and are distinguished by certain peculiarities. Thus they represent their gods without clothing: they deny their deified saints to be supreme gods: and they require their ascetics to use no clothing or any other article of equipment but a fan of peacock's feathers and a cup. The sacred books of the Jains are written in the Pali language, and according to their historical records, they were first committed to writing about 980 years after Mahavira, or about A. D. 380. The most ancient Jain temples are stated to have been founded about one hundred years before.

JAKUTI, a god of the Japanese, whom they invoke in time of sickness, or when death is seemingly near at hand.

JAMES'S (ST.) DAY, a Christian festival held in honour of James the brother of John, who was the first apostle that gained the crown of martyrdom. It is celebrated in the Romish church on the 25th of July, and in the Greek church on the 23d of October.

JAMES'S (ST.) LITURGY, one of the Liturgies used in the Greek church. This is the Liturgy of Jerusalem, which is usually ascribed to the apostle James, who was the first bishop or pastor of the Christian church in that city. It is so long as to require five hours to read the whole of it, and accordingly it is read publicly in some churches only once a-year, that is, on the 23d of October, which is the festival of St. James's day. The standard rituals of the Greek church are those modifications of St. James's Liturgy which are used at Constantinople; namely, that of St. Chrysostom, which is in ordinary use, and that of St. Basil, which is substituted for it on certain appointed days. These two are simply abridgments of the Liturgy of St. James. It is very doubtful whether this Liturgy usually ascribed to James is really the work of that apostle. The only foundation on which the opinion rests, is a doubtful fragment ascribed to Proclus, archbishop of Constantinople, and the thirty-second canon of the sixth General Council in Trullo. Eusebius and Jerome, however, both of whom give catalogues of the ecclesiastical writings previous to their own times, make no mention of any Liturgies as having come from the pens of apostles.

JAMES OF COMPOSTELLA (CHURCH OF), a church at Compostella in Galicia, a province of Spain, which is famous for the devout pilgrimages made to it by Spanish devotees of the Romish church. It is dedicated to James the Greater, who is alleged by Spanish writers to have been the apostle who first planted Christianity in Spain, and whose figure is said for many centuries to have rested on the high altar of the church in the form of a wooden bust, with forty or fifty white tapers continually burning before it. The pilgrims kiss the figure three, or four times in token of reverence. There is in the same church a stone cross under which they pass three times, through so small a hole that they are forced to lay themselves flat against the pavement. The body of the apostle, who is known to the Spanish populace by the name of St. James of Galicia, is alleged to have been at Compostella about the beginning of the ninth century, and since that time it is believed to have performed great miracles there.

JAMES THE LESS (FESTIVAL OF). See PHILIP (ST.) AND JAMES'S (ST.) DAY.

JAMMABOS, mountain priests of Japan, an order of the religion of Sinto. They go armed with swords and scimitars, and hence they are sometimes called mountain soldiers. They are a kind of wandering monks, dependent on the benevolence of the public for subsistence. Kaempfer thus describes them: "They do not shave their heads, but follow the rules of the first founder of this order, who mortified his body by climbing up steep, high mountains; at least, they conform themselves thereto in their dress, apparent behaviour, and some outward ceremonies; for they are fallen short of his rigorous way of life. They have a head, or general, of their order, residing at Miako, to whom they are obliged to bring a certain sum of money every year, and who has the distribution of dignities and of titles, whereby they are known among themselves. They commonly live in the neighbourhood of some famous Kami temple, and accost travellers in the name of that Kami which is worshipped there, making a short discourse of his holiness and miracles, with a loud, coarse voice. Meanwhile, to make the noise still louder, they rattle their long staves, loaded at the upper end with iron rings, to take up the charity money which is given them: and, last of all, they blow a trumpet made of a large shell. They carry their children along with them upon the same begging errand, clad like their fathers, but with their heads shaved. These little bastards are exceedingly troublesome and importunate with travellers, and commonly take care to light on them, as they are going up some hill or mountain, where, because of the difficult ascent, they cannot well escape, nor indeed otherwise get rid of them without giving them something. In some places they and their fathers accost travellers in company with a troop of Bikuni or nuns, and, with their rattling, singing, trumpeting, chattering and crying, make such a frightful noise as would make one almost mad or deaf. These mountain priests are frequently applied to by superstitious people, for conjuring, fortune-telling, foretelling future events, recovering lost goods, and the like purposes. They profess themselves to be of the Kami religion, as established of old, and yet they are never suffered to attend, or to take care of, any of the Kami temples."

The solemn vow which the Jammabos make in entering into the order is to renounce all temporal advantages for the prospect of eternal happiness. The founder of the order seems to have lived in the sixth century. He wandered about in deserts, and climbed the steepest mountains, subjecting himself to the severest hardships and privations. In course of time, his followers became divided into two orders, called Tojufu and Fonsaufu. The former are obliged to go on a pilgrimage once a-year to the mountain of Fikoosan, a very lofty and precipitous mountain; and so completely is this a test of character, that if any person living in sin shall venture to climb the hill, the devil will instantly enter into him. The other order of Jammabos are obliged annually to pay a visit to the sepulchre of their founder, which is also situated on the top of a high and almost inaccessible mountain. In preparation for this hazardous undertaking, they practise frequent ablutions and severe mortifications. During their pilgrimage they eat only herbs and roots. On their return they go to Miacō and present a gift to the general of the religious order to which they belong, who in turn bestows some honourable title on the pilgrim. The Jammabos dress like laymen. They wear a sabre fastened to their girdles, a staff in their hands, with a brass head and four rings of the same metal. They wear about their necks a scarf or rather a silk band adorned with fringes, which is longer or shorter according to the rank of the priest. They have a curiously shaped cap on their heads, and a wallet upon their backs, with a book in it, a little money, and a coat. They wear sandals on their feet composed either of straw or the stalks of the Lotos, a flower which is consecrated to religious uses. At their original institution the Jammabos were Sintoists, but they have blended that form of religion with the worship of strange gods.

JANGAMAS, a Hindu sect, the essential characteristic of which is wearing the LINGA (which see), or symbol of creative production, on some part of the dress or person. The type is of a small size, made of copper or silver, and is commonly worn suspended in a case round the neck, or sometimes tied in the turban. In common with the worshippers of Shiva generally, the Jangamas smear their foreheads with ashes, and wear necklaces, and carry rosaries made of the Rudrāśka seed. The clerical members of the sect usually stain their garments with red ochre. They are not numerous in upper India, and are rarely encountered except as mendicants leading about a bull, the living type of Nandi, the bull of Shiva, decorated with housings of various colours, and strings of cowrie shells. The conductor carries a bell in his hand, and thus accompanied goes about from place to place, subsisting upon alms. In the South of India the Jangamas or Lingayets, as they are often called, are very numerous, and the officiating priests of Shiva are commonly of this sect. Wilks, Buchanan, and Dubois, represent the Jangamas as very numerous in the Deccan, especially in Mysore, or those countries constituting ancient Canara. Besides the Jangama priests of Kedamath, a wealthy establishment of them exists at Benares.

JANNES AND JAMBRES, two Egyptian magicians referred to in 2 Tim. iii. 8, as withstanding Moses, probably by attempting to imitate the miracles which Moses and Aaron actually performed. The names of Jannes and Jambres do not occur in the Old Testament, but they are mentioned in the Talmud and several Rabbinical works. The paraphrast Jonathan, in Num. xxiii. 22, says they were the two sons of Balaam, who accompanied him when he went to Balak king of Moab. Many of the heathen writers, as cited by Eusebius, speak of them as Egyptian scribes famous for their skill in magic. The Mohammedans have several traditions concerning them.

JANSENISTS. The influence of the Reformation in Germany in the sixteenth century extended even within the bosom of the Romish church. The watchword of Luther and his associates, that we are justified by faith, without the works of the law, was felt by multitudes even of those who still remained under the bondage of the Man of Sin, to be the very truth of God; and the Protestant world is not generally aware that, from the time of Henry the Fourth of France, to the end of the reign of Louis the Fourteenth, there existed, in the very heart of the Papacy, a large, learned, and devotedly pious body of men, who held the grand doctrines of Bible Christianity, and busied themselves in translating and widely disseminating the word of God.

In the winter of 1604, two students of great promise attended the ancient college of Louvain. Their dispositions were far from similar, but their tastes and pursuits were the same, and they both of them were animated by the most fervent and enlightened piety. Jean du Verger de Hauranne, one of those estimable youths, was sprung from a noble and ancient family. Cornille Jansénius, the other, who was four years younger than his college companion, was the son of honest and industrious, though humble parents. Du Verger had studied previously at Paris, and Jansénius at Utrecht; but they met at Louvain, and studied theology together, with a view to the priesthood. They soon became closely united in a friendship which lasted through life—a friendship originating in piety, and cemented by the love of Christ. In consequence of intense application to study, the health of Jansénius was so injured that he was advised, on leaving college, to try the effect of the air of France. Du Verger invited him to accompany him to Bayonne. There the two students applied themselves to the study of the Fathers, and in particular of Augustin, but more especially did they give much of their time to searching the Scriptures, which they knew were able to make them wise unto salvation. From these studies, continued for six years, originated Jansenism in the Romish church,—a system of doctrine which, being accordant in its grand features with Bible truth, was not long in arousing, against all who held its tenets, the determined hostility of the Jesuits. The system of doctrine thus learned in secret by Jansénius and his friend was not made public until after the death of the former, when his Commentary on Augustin was given to the world.

After having prosecuted their researches for a long period at Bayonne, the two friends at length separated.—Jansénius returning to Louvain, and Du Verger establishing himself at Paris. In the course of a few years, Jansénius became so distinguished for his talents and theological attainments, that he was elected to the bishopric of Ypres. Du Verger in the meantime earned a high reputation at Paris, not more for his learning than for his marked piety, and unblemished purity of character. His learning attracted the admiration of many, especially of the higher classes, and he was introduced to court by Cardinal Richelieu as the most learned man in Europe. Eight bishoprics were successively offered to his acceptance, but respectfully declined. As his popularity increased, the good man seemed all the more to shrink from public notice. He retired to a private lodging in Paris, where he spent his whole time in prayer, almsgiving, and spiritual direction. Though thus hidden from the view of society in general, a secret and gradually increasing influence began to diffuse itself. People of all classes flocked to him for advice. The result was that many in every rank and every order of society, seemed to be animated by a new spirit, striving to walk in the fear and love of God.

About this time, Du Verger was appointed to the abbacy of the monastery of St. Cyran, from which he derived the title by which he is best known in history—the Abbé de St. Cyran. Being on terms of intimate friendship with M. Arnauld d'Andilly, eldest brother to Mother Angelica, he was introduced to the acquaintance of that excellent abbess, and in consequence became a frequent visitor at the Convent of Port-Royal, and soon after became its spiritual director. That monastery happened then to be at the very height of its fame.

Jansénius, who, as we have already mentioned, had returned to Louvain, acquired in the course of a few years such renown as a scholar, that he was invested with the superintendence of the Collège de Sainte Pulchérie in connection with the university where he had so long and so successfully studied. Here he composed several theological works which still more enhanced his fame as a scholar and a divine. At length his learning procured for him the chancellorship of the University of Louvain, which was soon followed by his consecration to the bishopric of Ypres. Every step of his promotion was resisted by the Jesuits, but his acknowledged merit prevailed over all opposition. In his ecclesiastical character, he was the object of universal admiration. In humble and unostentatious piety, in strong faith, in masculine force of understanding, and gentle simplicity of heart, he was outshone by none of his contemporaries. His grand ambition was to realize in his own person, the character of him who was styled the father of the faithful, and the friend of God. He devoted much of his time and attention to the reform of his diocese. For twenty years, however, he occupied all his leisure hours in the preparation of a translation of selected portions from the works of Augustin, with an ample commentary, chiefly with a view to refute the errors of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians. He was spared, in the providence of God, to achieve this laborious and important undertaking; and on the very day of its completion, he was seized with the plague, which was then raging in Flanders, and, after an illness of only a few hours, died on the 6th of May 1638.

The great work in which Jansénius had for twenty years been engaged he lived to complete. It was entitled AUGUSTINUS (which see), being the result of careful and protracted research into the writings of Augustin. In the course of two years after his decease, this valuable production, intended to establish and bring out into prominent relief the doctrine of free grace, issued from the press, notwithstanding the strenuous and unwearying efforts put forth by the Jesuits to prevent its publication. And when the Augustinus was given to the world, a keen controversy arose in reference to the real character of the doctrines which it contained. A charge of heresy was preferred against the book before the college of Sorbonne in Paris, and the apostolic see at Rome. It was drawn up by Father Cornet, a Jesuit of some notoriety, and consisted of five propositions, which he alleged had been extracted from the work of Jansénius. They were as follows:—

1. Some commandments of God are impracticable by the righteous, and sometimes even when they attempt obedience, the needed grace is wanting.
2. No man can resist inward grace in the state of nature.
3. In order to moral accountability it is not necessary to be free from inward necessity, but only from outward constraint.
4. The semi-Pelagians admitted the necessity of an inward prevenient grace in order to every good act, and even to the reception of faith; but they were herein heretical that they required this grace to be such as the will of man can yield to or resist indifferently. 5. It is semi-Pelagian doctrine to say that Christ died or shed his blood for all men. The charge was sustained by both tribunals and a bull was issued by Pope Innocent X., condemning the Augustinus as containing dangerous, false, and unsound doctrine. Having succeeded in their design, the Jesuits procured a formula to be drawn up, embodying the five propositions of Father Cornet, which formula all teachers of youth, and candidates for the ministry, were commanded to sign. This was designed to ensnare the Jansenists, who, however, readily signed the formula, but each adding a solemn declaration that the five propositions were not to be found in the "Augustinus." The Jesuits, enraged at being frustrated in their designs to ensnare the Jansenists, applied to the Pope for another bull, which was accordingly issued, declaring that the five propositions were not only heretical, but that they were truly extracted from the "Augustinus," and were condemned in the very sense in which they were found there. Having procured this bull, confirmatory and explanatory of the former, the Jesuits drew up another formula, which ran in these words: "I condemn from my inmost soul, as well as orally, the doctrine of the five propositions which are contained in the work of Cornelius Jansenius, a doctrine which is not that of St. Augustine, whose sentiments Jansenius has misrepresented." This formula the Jansenists refused to sign, and thus an excuse was found for commencing a relentless and bitter persecution, which was carried on for a number of years on the part of the Jesuits. At length, in the good providence of God, the persecution to which the Jansenists had for many years been subjected, ceased for a time. Clement IX. succeeded to the papedom, who, being a man of a mild and gentle spirit, signalized the commencement of his pontificate by throwing open the prison doors, and removing the ecclesiastical censures which had been so liberally inflicted during the reign of his predecessor. Thus matters continued throughout the remainder of the seventeenth century—the Jansenist doctrines making silent, but steady progress in spite of the bitter opposition and rancorous hatred of the powerful party of the Jesuits. It was now all too evident that the Roman Catholic Church in France had suffered a severe shock. The hated heresy of Jansenius now numbered among its supporters the ablest, the most energetic, and withal the most pious members of the Romish Church. The press, the pulpit, the parlour were alike infected with an apparently irrepressible love for the Evangelism of the Bible. The Scriptures were fast rising in the estimation of all classes, and ere long, it was to be feared, the priest would lose his influence, and the church would be abandoned by its people.

Such were the dark and gloomy prospects of Romanism, not in France alone, but throughout all Europe, at the opening of the eighteenth century. Many of the learned and noble-minded supporters of Jansenism had disappeared from the scene, but a goodly band of devoted Bible Christians, both men and women, still maintained the truth as it is in Jesus. These found a rallying-point in the Convent of Port-Royal, which, though it had been called to pass through the fires of persecution, at the hands of the Jesuits, was still preserved, as a Pharos amid the darkness, to guide many a benighted traveller to the haven of eternal peace. Long had the bitter enemies of the doctrine of free grace watched for an opportunity of finally rooting out a monastery which had both done and suffered so much to maintain and to extend the principles of Jansenism. There were many obstacles, however, which stood in the way of the accomplishment of a purpose which the Jesuits had so long and so fondly cherished. Often did they put forth their hand to smite, but they had not courage to destroy. The ambitious Péréfixe, the archbishop of Paris, had so far yielded to the pressure of the Jesuits as to imprison the inmates of Port-Royal des Champs, but only a few months had elapsed when he was constrained to restore the sisters to their former position. Neither public opinion nor his own conscience would permit a more prolonged captivity. That haughty prelate, however, as well as his successor, was now numbered with the dead. The archiepiscopal office was now held by the Cardinal de Noailles, a man of mild, gentle dispositions, but on that account all the more likely to be wrought upon by the crafty, designing Jesuits. For a time he resisted firmly all the arguments and entreaties with which they plied him to prevail upon him to destroy the hated convent, and in this resistance he was not a little encouraged by the salutary influence which his excellent secretary, M. Thomassin, exercised over him. But the pliable archbishop at length yielded, and agreed to comply with all that was required of him. In vain did his secretary remonstrate. M. de Noailles had pledged his word to the Jesuits, and he refused to retract. Perceiving that his master had given himself up into the hands of the Jesuits, M. Thomassin, with tears in his eyes, for he was much attached to the Cardinal, calmly, but firmly, replied, "No, my Lord, it shall never be said that your faithful servant, Thomassin, has lent his pen to your Eminence's enemies, who only plot and combine to dishonour you." Retiring from the presence of the archbishop, the secretary repaired to the church of St. Nicholas du Louvre, of which he was Provost, and there, kneeling at the foot of the high altar, he committed himself and the cause in defence of which he had surrendered all his worldly prospects, to that God who alone can bring light out of darkness, and order out of confusion. There he remained in close communion with his Heavenly Father, until the shadows of evening had gathered around him, and the last solitary lamp in the church had been extinguished. Thus absorbed in secret prayer, he felt a security and peace indescribable by human language. In supporting the cause of Christ he had drawn down upon himself the frown and the fury of man, but he was now rejoicing in the favour and the fellowship of his God.

Meanwhile the Cardinal de Noailles, though forsaken by his secretary, who refused to lend himself to the persecution of the Jansenists, had no difficulty in finding ecclesiastics to aid him in his unhallowed work. A petition to the Cardinal was speedily drawn up and presented, and a decree was forthwith issued for the demolition and final extinction of the Convent of Port-Royal. It was on the 11th of July 1709 that the Cardinal signed the decree. Some time, however, was allowed to pass away before it was put into execution.

The public indignation was excited by the cruel deed which the Jesuits had thus perpetrated, and one burst of execration was heard from every quarter. The enemies of the truth seemed to have prevailed. The gospel of the grace of God was trampled under foot, and while the truly pious in the Gallican Church mourned over the destruction of Port-Royal, the adherents of the profanely called Order of Jesus exulted in the thought that they had rooted out a heresy which threatened ere long the very existence of popery in Europe. Port-Royal had afforded a refuge and a rallying-point for all to whom Christ was truly precious, and the influence of the doctrines and example of this Jansenist community had diffused itself so far, and rooted itself so deep, that French popery was fast assuming an Evangelical and Protestant aspect. It was high time, therefore, that an end should be put if possible to this contagious heresy. The crushing blow was given, and Jansenism was now, to all appearance, utterly destroyed. But the triumph of the Jesuits was only a seeming, not a real one. Port-Royal had kindled a light in France which has never, even till this day, been extinguished. From the seclusion of Port-Royal issued some of the most erudite and elegant, as well as withering exposures of the Jesuits, who, writhing under the lash of the Jansenist scholars, described Port-Royal as a place where forty sharp pens were at work, all pointed by Dr. Arnauld. Of the distinguished men to whom this remark referred, it is sufficient to mention the names of Pascal, Le Maistre, De Sacy, Arnauld, and Nicole,—scholars of whom any age or nation might well be proud. Seldom in the annals of the world's history has so bright a constellation of geniuses adorned the same country at one time. Truly providential was it, that, at a crisis so important, when the cause of truth was in such imminent danger, there should have been raised up a band of men so admirably suited, both by talents and education, for the successful defence of the faith once delivered to the saints. Not a trace of the convent is now to be found, but the spirit, the principles of the convent, are still alive and operating with an unseen and pervading power, not only in France, but throughout many other parts of the Roman Catholic Church. To Port-Royal we owe it that the Gallican Church still preserves so complete an antipathy to the spirit of Ultra-montanism, and even amid the infidelity and political vacillation of France there is a fire smouldering at this moment among the Romanists of that country, which is destined, we doubt not, at no distant period, to make way for the complete establishment of the principles and the piety of the Huguenots of former days.

Only two or three years elapsed after the demolition of the Jansenist convent of Port-Royal, when the alarm of the Jesuits was anew excited by the publication and extensive circulation throughout France of 'Quesnel's Annotations on the New Testament.' Already had the cause of Jansenism been greatly promoted by the press, more especially by the writings of Arnauld, Nicole, and others, but, above all, by the 'Provincial Letters of Pascal.' And now that a Jansenist divine of such piety and power as Quesnel was circulating still more widely the Augustinian views which had already obtained the approbation and acceptance of multitudes throughout all France, the Jesuits felt that some decided step must be taken to check the further progress of Jansenism. A bull was accordingly issued in 1713 by Clement XI., which is usually known by the name of the Bull Unigenitus, and which condemned the work of Quesnel, enumerating in detail no fewer than one hundred and one propositions contained in it, which were alleged to be heretical and unsound. The appearance of this papal bull gave rise to a keen controversy in the Gallican church, only forty bishops supporting the decree of Clement, while all the rest, headed by Noailles, the archbishop of Paris, boldly resisted the fulminations of the Vatican, and appealed from the Pope to a general council. The Jesuits, however, at length prevailed, the Bull Unigenitus was submitted to by the Gallican church, and many of the Jansenists were compelled to escape from France, and to seek refuge in other parts of Europe.

Arnauld and a considerable remnant of the Jansenist party found an asylum in the Netherlands. Utrecht, in particular, has, down to the present day, been a special seat of Jansenism. "There arose," says Ranke, "an archiepiscopal Church at Utrecht, which held itself to be in general Catholic, yet without absolutely independent of Rome, and waged an incessant warfare against the Jesuit ultramontane tendency." The Augustinian opinions had made extensive progress in Holland, and in the end of the seventeenth century, the Roman Catholics of that country, amounting to 330,000, appear to have been mostly Jansenists.

In former times Holland belonged to the diocese of Utrecht, a see which was founded by the English missionary Willibrord, A. D. 696. The bishop was a suffragan of the archbishop of Cologne, but, in 1559, Pope Paul IV. separated Holland from the province of Cologne, and erected Utrecht into an archbishopric with five suffragans, whose sees were Haarlem, Deventer, Leuwarden, Groningen, and Middelburg. When Protestantism became the established religion of the Seven United Provinces, the archbishops of Utrecht still continued to exercise spiritual authority over the Roman Catholics in Holland, but the suffragans were no longer appointed. The two chapters of Utrecht and Haarlem remained as before, the former electing the archbishop in case of a vacancy, while the election was confirmed by the Pope, and in addition to his dignity, as filling the see of Utrecht, he was uniformly accredited by the Pope as his vicar-apostolic in Holland.

From the period of the Reformation, the Jesuits kept their eye upon Holland with the view of securing to themselves the whole influence and authority which was claimed by the archbishop of Utrecht; and when the doctrines of Jansenism came to be canvassed, and numbers of the persecuted Jansenists took refuge in Holland, the followers of Loyola keenly opposed those prelates of Utrecht who asserted the doctrines of grace as taught by Augustin. Archbishop Codde, in particular, who was consecrated to the see of Utrecht in 1689, was made the victim of Jesuit intrigue. That worthy prelate treated the Jansenist refugees from France with the utmost kindness. More especially Father Quesnel, who took up his abode at Amsterdam, and ended his life there, experienced the most marked attention from Archbishop Codde. The Jesuits were indignant at the favour shown to one who had been the main instrument, in their view, of propagating Jansenist principles in France, and indeed throughout all Europe. They secretly forwarded to Rome accusations against the obnoxious archbishop, who was forthwith summoned to appear before the Pope and answer to the charges which had been laid against him. In obedience to the papal mandate Codde proceeded to Rome, but on arriving there, he was treacherously detained for three years, at the end of which he succeeded in making his escape and returned to Holland. Meanwhile, although no sentence of deposition had been pronounced upon him, and he still retained his archbishopric, he had been deprived of his office of vicar general of the Pope, and another appointed in his room. In the absence of Archbishop Codde, the Jesuits had been busy sowing the seeds of dissension among the Romanists in Holland, and not without considerable success. A schism had been introduced into the church of Utrecht, many of the people having joined the Jesuit party in opposition to the Jansenist prelates. The archbishop endeavoured to interest Pope Clement XI. in his favour, but to no purpose; and at length he resolved to withdraw, which he did, allowing the chapters of Utrecht and Haarlem to appoint vicars-general in his stead. The papal nuncio at Cologne, however, announced that he had received a commission from the Pope to exercise this authority. The chapters forthwith protested and appealed against the claim, but without effect.

At the death of Archbishop Codde the chapters, instead of electing a successor, contented themselves with appointing vicars-general as before. Matters continued in this position for several years, and in 1719 the chapter of Utrecht, despairing of obtaining a hearing from the Pope, appealed to the next general council which should be held. Soon after, the chapter of Haarlem took the same step. At length the chapter of Utrecht resolved to adopt more decisive measures. In 1721 they addressed a letter to Innocent XIII., requesting that no obstacles might be thrown in the way of their electing an archbishop to the vacant see of Utrecht. To this communication they received no reply, and although they wrote again the following year, their second letter also remained unanswered. In these strange and unaccountable circumstances, the chapter resolved to proceed to a canonical appointment; and, accordingly, on the 27th April 1723, they elected to the vacant see Cornelius Steenhoven, and wrote to the Pope requesting his confirmation of their appointment. To all their applications, however, Rome was silent, and having no other resource they sought and obtained consecration for their new bishop at the hands of an exiled Jansenist bishop, by name Varlet, who had taken up his residence at Amsterdam. These proceedings were formally reported to the Pope, who at length broke silence, and issued three damnatory and excommunicatory briefs. Steenhoven occupied the see of Utrecht for only a few months, when he died, and the chapter elected as his successor Johannes Cornelius Barchman Wuytiers, who was consecrated in the same way as his predecessor had been—a proceeding which called forth another condemnatory brief from the Pope. Barchman and his clergy appealed against the brief of the Holy Father to the next general council. They also formally appealed against the Bull Unigenitus.

Many Romish prelates made common cause with the new archbishop of Utrecht, who now became a marked object of hatred to the Jesuits and the papal see, more especially as he published a charge in 1730, condemnatory of the legend of Pope Gregory VII. This amiable and excellent prelate, however, died in 1733, and was succeeded by M. Vander Croon, who was consecrated as before. An excommunication from the Pope followed, of course, which contained, in this instance, an erroneous statement, that the chapter of Utrecht had become extinct, and, therefore, could not possibly elect an archbishop. It had now become evident that the church of Utrecht could henceforth expect no countenance from Rome, and, therefore, the new prelate resolved to re-establish the suffragan bishoprics which had once existed, in order that an independent succession of prelates might be supplied. This step Archbishop Vander Croon was about to take when his plans for the good of the church were cut short by his death in 1739. His successor, Archbishop Meindaarts, however, carried the project into execution, restoring the suffragan see of Haarlem in 1742, and that of Deventer in 1758. An account of these proceedings was transmitted to Pope Benedict XIV., accompanied with a complaint against the Jesuits for their injurious interference with the church of Utrecht. In 1763, Meindaarts summoned a provincial synod, which is known by the name of the Council of Utrecht, and which declared that the church of Utrecht still retained its connection with the Pope and the Church of Rome, but rejected the doctrine of the infallibility of both the church and the Pope in matters of fact, and such points as had no reference to Christian faith and practice. This synod appealed against the Bull Unigenitus to a general council; declared its attachment to the doctrines of Augustin, and asserted the right inherent in the cathedral chapter at Utrecht to elect their own bishop. The Pope, indignant at the independence avowed by this provincial synod, excommunicated the whole Jansenist church of Utrecht, both ministers and people. This sentence still remains in force. Onward to the present hour, the election of every Romish bishop and archbishop, in the Jansenist church of Utrecht, has been followed by a new brief of excommunication, with one solitary exception, that of Johannes Bon, who was consecrated suffragan bishop of Haarlem in 1814. To bring about a reconciliation with the see of Rome, a conference was opened in 1823 with the papal nuncio at the Hague; but it was broken off in consequence of the demands which the nuncio made, that the Church of Utrecht should acknowledge the validity of the Bull Unigenitus, and should unconditionally surrender to the authority of the Pope.

In 1825, Johannes Van Santen was elected Archbishop of Utrecht, and on the 13th January of the following year, a brief of excommunication was issued as usual from the papal see. In reply to this fulmination, Van Santen, with his two suffragan bishops, issued a circular, addressed to all the bishops of the Catholic church, entreating them to use their endeavours to induce the Pope to adopt a different line of action. They also addressed a "Declaration to all Catholics," clerical and lay, recounting their grievances, and the injurious treatment they had received at the hands of Rome, and appealing to a future general council. In this declaration they give an account of the conference which had been sought at the Hague in 1823, but which had been refused unless the church of Utrecht would consent to give an implicit and absolute submission to the Pope. A formula was drawn up by the secretary to the Pope's nuncio, which the clergy were required to subscribe before the nuncio would even permit an interview. The formula runs thus: "I, the undersigned, declare that I submit myself to the apostolic constitution of Pope Innocent X., dated May 31, 1653, as well as to the constitution of Pope Alexander VII., dated October 16, 1656; also to the constitution of Clement XI., which commences with these words, Vineam Domini Sabaoth, dated July 16, 1705. I reject and condemn with my whole heart the five propositions extracted from the book of Cornelius Jansenius, in the sense intended by the author, the same in which the holy see has itself condemned them in the above-named constitutions. I further submit myself, without any distinction, mental qualification, or explanation, to the constitution of Clement XI., dated September 8, 1713, beginning with the word, Unigenitus. I accept it purely and simply, and thereto I swear:—So help me God and this holy Gospel." These terms could not be accepted by the church of Utrecht, and the nuncio refusing to modify them, the conference held with his secretary terminated with a declaration on the part of the Jansenist clergy, that "they had learned by instances drawn from ecclesiastical history, such as those of Popes Stephen VII., Sergius III., Gregory II., John XXII., and some others, how true was the testimony thus expressed by Pope Adrian VI.: It is certain that the Pope is fallible, even in a matter of faith, when he sustains heresy by decree or command: for many of the popes of Rome have been heretics."

Thus closed the last public attempt made by the Jansenist church of Utrecht to become reconciled to Rome, and she stands to this day in an anomalous position as a portion of the Romish church, yet formally cut off from her communion. Private dealings have been held, on the part of Rome, with the venerable Archbishop Van Santen, to induce him to sign the above formula, but he has firmly resisted all the temptations thrown in his way. Capucini, a papal nuncio, who was sent into the Netherlands with full authority to regulate every thing for the consolidation of the Roman Catholic church, had a long interview with Van Santen, in the course of which he endeavoured, by the most plausible arguments, to prevail upon the aged prelate to subscribe the formula, but his arguments and his entreaties were alike unavailing.

The Jansenists of Utrecht differ from the Church of Rome on three points. The first regards the condemnation of Jansenius by Pope Alexander VII., to which they object on the ground that the five heretical propositions, said to be extracted from the 'Augustinus' of Jansenius, are not to be found in that book. Secondly, they reject the Bull Unigenitus, because it condemns doctrines which are in accordance with the Bible and the creed of the church; and also because the Bull in question has never been sanctioned by a general council, nor received by a large portion of the church. Thirdly, they contend for the right of the Church of Utrecht to elect its own bishops, that right having been granted by the Emperor Conrad III. in 1145, and afterwards confirmed by the Pope; but of which they were unjustly deprived in 1706. Yet although differing from the Church of Rome on these points, the members of the Church of Utrecht profess still to remain in the communion of the Church of Rome, because "they hold the same faith, acknowledge the Pope as supreme head of the church, obey him in all things according to the rule of the church, pray for him, defend his rights, and remain in communion with other bishops and churches which have preserved their outward union with the Pope."

The Jansenists of Utrecht have a form of worship identical in all essential points with other Roman Catholic churches; but in some of their churches part of the service is read in the Dutch language, and the utmost zeal is manifested in diffusing among their people the Dutch translation of the Bible by Verschuur. At Amersfoort they have a theological institution for the training of their clergy. The members of this interesting community of Jansenists have, for many years, been gradually decreasing in numbers, and from the doubtful position they occupy, there is little prospect of any change for the better.

JANUARIUS (St.), a Romish saint mentioned in the Breviary under date 19th September. He is represented as a Christian martyr, who, along with others, perished by orders of Timotheus, president of Campania. "Each of the neighbouring cities," says the Breviary, "selected one of these saints as their patron, and took care to bury their bodies. The Neapolitans, by divine instruction, took away the body of Januarius, and at first brought it to Beneventum, then to the monastery of the Virgin; lastly, it was brought to the city of Naples, and placed in the great church, and was distinguished by many miracles. It is particularly to be remembered that it extinguished the globes of fire which broke forth from Vesuvius, which threatened ruin on the places not only near but far off. This also is notable, that his blood, which was preserved by being collected in a glass vial, when brought into the presence of the martyr's body, liquefies and bubbles in a wonderful manner, just as if recently shed, which is also seen to this day."

The liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius is one of the most noted miracles of the Church of Rome. The following account of it is given by a traveller who witnessed it: "I was present in Naples in 1825 at the performance of the reputed miracle of St. Januarius's blood. It was exhibited for three days, and on the last, I think, the blood was reported liquefied, and the bells rang in honour of it. On entering the church, my friends and myself penetrated a mass of many hundreds of the lower orders; and on arriving at the low balustrade, which separates the chapel of Januarius from the church, we were admitted. This chapel, which was richly ornamented, hung with silk, and lighted with many wax candles, was thronged with many well-dressed people. A shrine was brought in with a procession, and from it a silver bust of the natural size produced. This bust, said to contain the saint's head, was placed on the altar, dressed with robes and mitre, and the service began. After a little time the precious blood was brought in. It is contained in a crystal vase of the form of a compressed globe, about four inches in diameter, and the cavity within seemed to be about two. This vase is set in a broad rim, having two large handles, and looks very much like an old-fashioned circular coach-lamp. The (supposed) blood was presented to the head of the saint, and then to the people, the priest holding the vase by its handles, at arms' length, and gently turning it, while an assistant held a taper between the priest's body and the vase. As the flame came immediately behind the cavity, it showed whether the clot of matter on one side liquefied and moved round, or remained adhering to the side of the cavity. When I saw it, it did not move. During the exhibition, the service continued with incense and music. The priest slowly passed along the line of beholders, giving each individual time to ascertain if the liquefaction had taken place. They occupied themselves in cries and prayers; and when some time had elapsed, the lower orders along the balustrade, and those behind them in the church, became very vociferous, crying out aloud (and at last even furiously) on the saint, in tones of entreaty, anger, and despair. After the wailing had continued for some time, the service terminated, and the blood was borne away, the saint unrobed, and carried off in his shrine, and the candles extinguished; but it was long ere the sobs of the women died away, and one old countess, who was near me the whole time, had continued hysterically weeping and shrieking so long, that she was too much exhausted to retire without assistance."

An old Italian author, named Boldetti, thus states the origin of both the procession and the miracle: "A Neapolitan lady being so sick as to keep her bed, having heard of St. Januarius and his associates, determined to seek her cure upon the very spot where these faithful Christians had been executed. Immediately she gets up, full of hope, and takes two vials, and repairs to the place of their martyrdom, which being still wet with the blood of these faithful confessors, she fills her vials therewith. In one she puts all the pure blood she could get, and in the other that which was mixed with the earth and other filth. She had scarce made an end before she found herself restored to a perfect state of health. Some time after, this good lady was informed that the head of the saint whom we are speaking of, was lodged in Naples; and thought herself bound to acquaint her countrymen that she was in possession of the saint's blood, and owed her cure to it. This was a new subject of edification for that pious city; the devout are determined to translate it; the head, therefore, of the saint is taken and carried in pomp in order to fetch the blood. The lady did not wait for this visit. Equally humble and devout, she takes the two vials and runs to meet the head of the martyr. In the first moment of the interview the blood dissolves, the people were convinced beyond the power of doubting, that it was the blood of St. Januarius, and since that time the miracle has never ceased."

JANUS AND JANA, two deities worshipped by the ancient Romans, the former as the Sun, and the latter as the Moon. The worship of Janus is said to have been introduced by Romulus, the founder of the city of Rome, and it soon became one of the most important parts of the old Roman religion. From the name of this god, Numa assigned to the opening month of the year the name of Januarius. A temple also was dedicated to Janus, which was opened in time of war, and closed in time of peace. The image of this god was usually double-faced, and in later times he was regarded as presiding over all entrances and gates, and the beginning of all employments and undertakings of every kind. Hence the Romans at the outset of every enterprise invoked Janus along with Jupiter. On the first day of the year, sacrifices were offered to him by the people, who were dressed in festive garments, and gave presents to one another; priests also sacrificed to him on twelve altars, thus recognizing him as presiding over each of the twelve months; prayers were offered to him at the commencement of every day. The sacrifices offered to Janus consisted of cakes, barley, incense, and wine.

JAPAN (RELIGION OF). The Japanese have always been remarkable for their religious character. They claim to be the offspring of the gods, and produce two different genealogical tables in support of this claim. Those contained in the first table, amounting in number to seven, are said to have reigned during an almost incalculable number of years in Japan. These primitive gods were spiritual substances, and were never clothed in bodies of any kind. They were succeeded, however, by five terrestrial spirits or deified heroes, after whom appeared the Japanese themselves, who boast of being descended from the last in order of the seven primitive gods, through the line of the second race of deified heroes. The DAIRI (which see), or sovereign pontiff of Japan, alleges himself to be the lineal descendant of the eldest son of their illustrious founder, and that he is consequently the true, legitimate sovereign of the Empire of Japan. The first of the five terrestrial spirits signalized himself by many deeds of heroism and valour while he dwelt upon the earth, and his death was also marked by several miracles. He is accordingly held in universal veneration among the Japanese, images and temples being erected to his honour in every part of the country.

There are two principal religious systems in Japan; one native called Sintoism, at the head of which is the Dairi; the other imported from China or Thibet, called Buddsdoism, which is simply Budhism, with some modifications. The religion of Budha was introduced into Japan A. D. 552. It seems to be ADI-BUDHA (which see), or the first Budha, the Supreme Deity and origin of all things, who is worshipped among the Japanese under the name of AMIDAS (which see), and whose priests form the most numerous and influential of the Buddhist orders. Siebold seems to consider them as pure monotheists. At the head of the Buddhist hierarchy is a high-priest called Xaco, resident at Miako. With this dignitary rests the appointment of the Tundies, or superiors of the monasteries in which the Buddhist clergy live. Great revenues are attached to the monasteries, and the Tundies are strictly subject to the civil authorities. They have no direct temporal power, there is no appeal to the secular arm, no civil punishments for heresy, and no religious vows perpetually binding, all being at liberty, so far as the civil law is concerned, to enter or leave the monasteries at pleasure. Besides the regular clergy, there are also wandering monks, who live on alms, pretending to drive away evil spirits, to find lost articles, to discover robbers, to determine the guilt or innocence of accused parties, to predict the future, to cure desperate maladies, and to perform other wonders, which they do chiefly through the medium of a child into whom they pretend to make a spirit enter, able to answer all their questions. Of these mendicant monks the most numerous and influential are the JAMMAEOS (which see), or mountain priests, which belong not to the Budhists or Budsdoists, but to the Sintoists.

When the Portuguese first landed in Japan in the middle of the sixteenth century, they found that although the mass of the people were under the influence of gross superstition, there was a class, chiefly belonging to the upper ranks of society, who regarded all the different religions of the country with secret incredulity or even contempt. These persons who were known in Japan by the name of Siodosiu, and their doctrine by that of Siuto, were in reality CONFUCIANS (which see), or followers of the great Chinese sage or philosopher; but to avoid being charged with a complete disregard of all religion, they outwardly conformed in religious practice to the ancient national system of the Sintoists.

Like other Budhists, the Budsdoists of Japan believe in the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and as a natural consequence, are averse to the use of animal food, and this abstinence is also enjoined by the religion of Sinto, which denounces as impure the act of killing any animal, or being sprinkled with the slightest drop of blood. Animals are not found in great variety in the country, yet from time immemorial the Japanese have possessed the horse, the ox, the buffalo, the dog, and the cat; but none of these were ever used as food. A strange notion has from ancient times been entertained in regard to the fox, which they look upon as a sort of evil deity. When any Japanese is in circumstances of doubt or difficulty, he lays down a plate of rice and beans as a sacrifice to his fox, and if any part of it has disappeared before the next day, he regards it as a favourable omen. The tortoise and the crane are reckoned sacred animals, which are not to be killed nor even injured. The Japanese islands have few real animals, and the natives being much addicted to superstition, have invented a number of imaginary creatures whom they regard with a species of reverence. The dragon, who is also a dreaded monster among the Chinese; the Kirin, a winged quadruped, and the foo, a beautiful bird of paradise, are all accounted peculiarly sacred.

One great feature of the Japanese religion is their attachment to festivals, of which they have five great annual ones, besides three inferior, which are celebrated every month with the utmost hilarity. One of the most important of the festivals is the MATSURI (which see), an annual feast held in honour of the god Suwa, the patron of the city of Nagasaki. It consists of processions, plays, and dances, got up at the expense of ten or eleven streets, who unite every year for this purpose. There are several festivals sacred to Suwa, of which the chief is held on the seventh, eighth, and ninth days of the ninth month.

No country abounds to a greater extent than Japan in places dedicated to religious worship, or objects set apart for religious adoration. Thus Kämpfer remarks:—"Of all the religious buildings to be seen in this country, the Tira, that is, the Buddhist temples, with the adjoining convents, are, doubtless, the most remarkable, as being far superior to all others, by their stately height, curious roofs, and numberless other beautiful ornaments. Such as are built within cities or villages, stand commonly on rising grounds, and in the most conspicuous places. Others, which are without, are built on the ascent of hills and mountains. All are most sweetly seated,—a curious view of the adjacent country, a spring or rivulet of clear water, and the neighbourhood of a wood, with pleasant walks, being necessary for the spots on which these holy structures are to be built.

"All these temples are built of the best cedars and firs, and adorned within with many carved images. In the middle of the temple stands a fine altar, with one or more gilt idols upon it, and a beautiful candlestick, with sweet-scented candles burning before it. The whole temple is so neatly and curiously adorned, that one would fancy himself transported into a Roman Catholic church, did not the monstrous shape of the idols, which are therein worshipped, evince the contrary. The whole empire is full of these temples, and their priests are without number. Only in and about Miako they count three thousand eight hundred and ninety-three temples, and thirty-seven thousand and ninety-three Siukku, or priests, to attend them.

"The sanctity of the Mia, or temples sacred to the gods of old worshipped in the country, requires also that they should be built in some lofty place, or, at least, at some distance from unclean, common grounds. I have elsewhere observed that they are attended only by secular persons. A neat broad walk turns in from the highway towards these temples. At the beginning of the walk is a stately and magnificent gate, built either of stone or of wood, with a square table, about a foot and a half high, on which the name of the god to whom the temple is consecrated is written or engraved in golden characters. If you come to the end of the walk, which is sometimes several hundred paces long, instead of a pompous, magnificent building, you find nothing but a low, mean structure of wood, often all hid amidst trees and bushes, with one single grated window to look into it, and within either all empty, or adorned only with a looking-glass of metal, placed in the middle, and hung about with some bundles of straw, or cut white paper, tied to a long string, in form of fringes, as a mark of the purity and sanctity of the place. The most magnificent gates stand before the temples of Tensio dai sin, of Futzman, and of that Kami, or god, whom particular places choose to worship as their tutelar deity, who takes a more particular care to protect and defend them.

"Other religious objects travellers meet with along the roads, are the Fotoge, or foreign idols, chiefly those of Amida and Disisoo, as also other monstrous images and idols, which we found upon the highways in several places, at the turning in of sideways, near bridges, convents, temples, and other buildings. They are set up partly as an ornament to the place, partly to remind travellers of the devotion and worship due to the gods. For this same purpose, drawings of these idols, printed upon entire or half sheets of paper, are pasted upon the gates of cities and villages, upon wooden posts, near bridges, and in several other places upon the highway, which stand the most exposed to the traveller's view. Travellers, however, are not obliged to fall down before them, or to pay them any other mark of worship and respect than they are otherwise willing to do.

"On the doors and houses of ordinary people (for men of quality seldom suffer to have theirs thus disfigured) there is commonly pasted a sorry picture of one of their Laves, or house gods, printed upon a half sheet of paper. The most common is the black-horned Giron, otherwise called God-su Ten Oo—that is, according to the literal signification of the Chinese characters for this name, the ox-headed prince of heaven—whom they believe to have the power of keeping the family from distempers, and other unlucky accidents, particularly from the small-pox, which proves fatal to great numbers of their children. Others fancy they thrive extremely well, and live happy, under the protection of a countryman of Jeso, whose monstrous, frightful picture they paste upon their doors, being hairy all over his body, and carrying a large sword with both hands, which they believe he makes use of to keep off, and, as it were, to parry, all sorts of distempers and misfortunes endeavouring to get into the house.

"On the fronts of new and pretty houses I have sometimes seen dragons' or devils' heads, painted with a wide open mouth, large teeth and fiery eyes. The Chinese, and other Indian nations—nay, even the Mahomedans in Arabia and Persia—have the same placed over the doors of their houses, by the frightful aspect of this monstrous figure to keep off, as the latter say, the envious from disturbing the peace of families.

"Often, also, they put a branch of the Fanna Skrim-mi or anise-tree over their doors, which is, in like manner, believed to bring good luck into their houses; or else liverwort, which they fancy hath the particular virtue to keep off evil spirits, or some other plants or branches of trees. In villages they often place over their doors their indulgence boxes, which they bring back from their pilgrimage to Isje, thinking, also, by this means to bring happiness and prosperity upon their houses. Others paste long strips of paper to their doors, which the adherents of the several religious sects and convents are presented with by their clergy, for some small gratuity. There are odd, unknown characters, and divers forms of prayers, writ upon these papers, which the superstitious firmly believe to have the infallible virtue of conjuring and keeping off all manner of misfortunes. Many more amulets of the like nature are pasted to their doors, against the plague, distempers, and particular misfortunes. There is, also, one against poverty."

Religious pilgrimages form a prominent requirement of the religions of Japan. Of these the most celebrated is that to ISJE (which see). Pilgrims also frequently visit the thirty-three principal QUAN-WON or CANON (which see), temples which are scattered over the whole country. Travellers in Japan tell us, that as they pass along the roads they meet with pilgrims wearing only a little straw about their waists, who are on their way to visit certain temples in the hope of obtaining deliverance from some fatal distemper which had seized either themselves or some near relative. The roads swarm also with begging monks, and Bikeni or nuns who subsist entirely upon alms. Some mendicants, to attract compassion, are shaved and dressed like Budso priests, with a portion of their sacred writings before them, which they pretend to be busily engaged in reading; others are found sitting near some river or running water performing a Siegaki, that is, a certain ceremony for the relief of departed souls; others sit upon the road all day long upon a small coarse mat, having a flat bell lying before them, which they beat continually with a small wooden hammer, while they repeat in a plaintive singing tone the word Namada, which is contracted from Namu Amidas Budsu, a short form of prayer wherewith they address Amidas as the patron and advocate of departed souls.

The worship of ancestors which so remarkably prevails among the Chinese is not altogether unknown in Japan. Every month on the day of the ancestor's decease for fifty years or more, food, sweetmeats, and fruits are set before the IFAY (which see). The fifteenth day of the seventh Japanese month is a festival devoted to the honour of parents and ancestors. Every Japanese whose parents are still alive accounts this a happy day, and if married, he sends a present to his parents. A repast of vegetables and fruits is set before the Ifays, and in the middle is placed a vase in which perfumes are burnt, and other vases containing flowers. On the following day rice, tea, and other articles of food are served up to the Ifays as to living guests. On the evenings of both the fourteenth and fifteenth days of the month, lanterns suspended from long bamboos are lighted before each grave-stone, and refreshments are also placed there. Before daylight of the sixteenth, the articles placed at the graves are packed into small boats of straw, provided with sails of paper or cloth, which are carried in procession with vocal and instrumental music to the water-side, where they are launched by way of dismissing the souls of the dead, who are supposed now to return to their graves.

When the Dairi or chief priest canonizes any one who has been during life remarkable for his virtues he comes to be ranked among the CAMIS (which see), or protecting spirits whom the Japanese, particularly the Sintoists, worship, offering sacrifices to them, and building Mias or temples to their honour. Deified kings or heroes, indeed, form the principal gods of the Japanese, but the temples which the Sintoists build to them are far inferior to the Budso temples, which are usually situated on some elevated spot surrounded with beautiful groves. Even the temple of Isje, which is held in such honour that it is called Dai-Singu, the temple of the Great God, is a plain wooden erection, covered with straw; and inside no statue or image is seen, but simply a large brazen mirror, which is designed to symbolize the all-seeing and all-knowing God. To this temple every Sintoist must once a-year, or at least once in his life-time, perform a pilgrimage, which is called Saiga. The Sintoism, indeed, of Japanese antiquity is the worship of a people evidently of Mongolian extraction, and well described by Rougemont, as "profane, earthly, epicurean, which desires not to be tormented by the fear of God, which only celebrates joyous festivals, which is characterized by a morality wholly sensual in its nature, which has no belief in hell, but which must be governed by the severest laws." The ideas which these heathens entertain of the future rewards of the righteous and punishments of the wicked, are gross in the extreme. In their view the soul of a good man at death wings its way to a sort of Elysian fields, which are situated beneath the thirty-third heaven, while the soul of a wicked man is refused admittance, and doomed to wander like a vagabond around the abodes of bliss, or, as many of the Japanese believe, to enter into foxes,—animals which are either themselves devils, or the abodes of devils.

When the Budsoists, or the worshippers of Budha, made their appearance in Japan, about the sixth century of our era, Budhism was embraced by a large number of the Sintoists, who endeavoured to compromise the matter, by mingling some of the doctrines and practices of the old religion of their country with that of Budha, which had been imported either from China or Nepaul. It is remarkable that every new region which embraced Budhism gave a different name to the founder of the system. He is Budha in Ceylon, Fo in China, Chakia-Mouri among the Mongolian Tartars, Sommona-Codom among the Nepalese, and Amidas among the Japanese; the last mentioned being not Chakia, however, whom they believe to have been born B.C. 1027, but the Adi-Budha, or first Budha of the Nepalese, who was not a human sage, but the Divine Being.

While Budsdoinism rapidly gained ground among the Sintoists, it met with violent opposition from the Confucians, who had already become a powerful party in Japan. A Buddhist devotee, however, arrived from India, who speedily succeeded in turning the tide of popular favour towards Budsdoinism. This he chiefly accomplished by means of miracles which he professed to perform. One, in particular, wrought a powerful impression upon the people. This was the transportation of an image of Amidas from China into a province of Japan, where it first made its appearance, crowned with rays of light. A temple was immediately erected in honour of this deity, who from that time became the most popular object of worship. Some time after this event, Budsdoinism made great progress in Japan, in consequence of the ardent and unwearied labours of Sotoctai, a devoted missionary of the system.

The Japanese are singularly addicted to the worship of idols. "Their squares and highways," as Picart informs us, "are always honoured with the presence of some idol, which is erected there either with a view to kindle flames of devotion in the souls of travellers, or with an intent only to support and protect the place. There are idols erected likewise near their bridges, and round about their temples, chapels, and convents. The people purchase either the pictures or images of these idols. The former are, for the generality, drawn on a sheet, or half a sheet of paper. They are pasted, like bills or advertisements, upon the gates of their cities, and other public buildings, or on posts at the corner of their bridges and streets. The people, however, are not obliged, as they pass by, to prostrate themselves, or bow the knee before them. They have generally, likewise, an image of their domestic and tutelar gods before the doors of their houses."

All the gods of Japan are represented in a gigantic or monstrous form sitting on the flower of a plant which the Japanese call Tarate. The idols are all gilt, and their heads encircled with rays, or with a crown, a garland, a sort of mitre, or a cap or hat in the Chinese fashion. Animal-worship is practised in Japan, originating, probably, in the notion that the living creatures which they adore are inhabited by the souls of heroes and princes. Apes, in particular, from their likeness to human beings, attract great reverence from the Japanese, who have a large pagoda or temple dedicated exclusively to this species of worship. If the stag is not also an object of adoration, it is at all events held in such veneration, that no one is allowed to attempt to kill it. Should a stag happen to die of wounds in the public streets, the whole of the street where such an event happened would be forthwith demolished, and the effects of its inhabitants seized, sold, and the proceeds deposited in the public treasury. Dogs are also highly valued, and large numbers of these animals are quartered upon the inhabitants, who are obliged by law to nurse them when sick, and to bury them when dead. On the authority of Fröes, a Roman missionary, we are informed that in one part of Japan, at least, the fish found in a certain river are accounted sacred, and it is reckoned sacrilege to kill them.

The most extraordinary temple in Japan is one situated near Miako, which is sometimes termed the Temple of Ten Thousand Idols, and of which we have given an engraving in the present work. This temple is thus described by the Dutch compiler of the embassies to Japan:—"In the middle of the temple there is a gigantic figure of an idol, that has his ears bored, his head bald, and chin shaved, much like a Bramin; over his head, and under the canopy that covers him, hang five or six little bells. On each side of him, that is, on the right and the left side of the throne on which this deity is sitting, there are several statues of armed men, Moors dancing, wizards, magicians, and devils. There are likewise several representations of thunder and the winds. Round about the walls of the temple, on the right hand and on the left, are a thousand idols all resembling Canon. Each idol is crowned, has thirty arms, and seven heads upon his breast. They are all made of solid gold; every individual decoration belonging to them, as also to the temple, is likewise of the same precious metal." Kämpfer's description of it is somewhat different:—"In the middle of the pagoda," says he, "sits a prodigious large idol, which has six-and-forty arms and hands. Sixteen black demi-gods, of gigantic stature, are planted round about him. At some considerable distance there are two rows of other idols, one on the right hand, and the other on the left, which are all gilt, and all standing. Each idol has several arms. It is necessary to remark here, that the multiplicity of arms and hands expresses, or is a symbol of, the power of the idol. Some have a kind of shepherds' crooks in their hands, others garlands, and all of them one implement or another. Their heads are surrounded with rays, and there are seven other figures over them, the middlemost whereof is less than the rest. In this Pantheon there are likewise ten or a dozen rows of other idols, about the common stature of a man, set very close together, and disposed in such a manner that they gradually ascend, in order that all of them may be equally conspicuous, and attract the eyes of the devotees."

Besides the five annual festivals of the Japanese, which are seasons of recreation rather than of devotion, they have also sacred processions, which they term MATSURI (which see), when they carry their gods in shrines constructed for the purpose. From the first visit of Europeans to Japan in the sixteenth century, frequent attempts have been made by the various maritime nations to open up commercial communication with a people so numerous and wealthy as the Japanese. Portugal led the way, and was followed by Holland, England, Spain, and Russia, and finally by the United States, which recently despatched an expedition to Japan, under Commodore Perry. Each, in succession, has failed, and to this day Japan may be considered as shut out from the fellowship of the other nations of the world, with the single exception of a solitary Dutch vessel being allowed annually to visit the port of Nagasaki. Romish missionaries have from time to time attempted to obtain a settlement in Japan, but to no purpose; and no Protestant church has ever been allowed to obtain access to the country for the diffusion among the natives of the knowledge of Divine truth.

JASIDIANS. See YEZIDI

JASHIRO, a name which the Sintoists of Japan use to denote a Mia or temple, with all its appurtenances.

JASSASA (Al), Arab., the Spy, a beast whose appearance the Mohammedans believe will be one sign of the approach of the day of final judgment. "When the sentence shall be ready to fall upon them," says the Koran, "we will cause a beast to come forth unto them out of the earth, which shall speak unto them." This beast, it is believed, will make its appearance in the temple of Mecca, or on Mount Safa, or in the territory of Tayef. It is to be sixty feet high, or, according to some, as high as the clouds. It will appear for three days, showing only a third part of its body. This monster will be composed of different species of animals, having the head of a bull, the eyes of a hog, the ears of an elephant, the horns of a stag, the neck of an ostrich, the breast of a lion, the back of a cat, the tail of a ram, the legs of a camel, the voice of an ass, and the colour of a tiger. This beast will bring along with it the rod of Moses and the seal of Solomon; with the former smiting all believers on the face, and marking them with the word Mumen, or believer; with the latter smiting all unbelievers also on the face, marking them with the word Câfer, or infidel, that every one may be fully known on the day of judgment. This beast, which will speak in Arabic, will, in addition to all this, demonstrate the folly of all religions except the Mussulman.

JAUK, or YAUK, one of the five deified men mentioned in the Koran as having been worshipped by the ancient Arabians. They are supposed to have been Antediluvians, who had been distinguished for their virtues and great qualities. The Arabians represented Jauk under the figure of a horse.

JAVA (RELIGION OF). This island forms one of the largest of the Sunda Islands in the Eastern Archipelago. The population seem to have been of Tartar origin, their ancestors having migrated from that quarter of the Asiatic continent lying between Siam and China. This migration Sir Stamford Raffles supposes to have been of very ancient date, long before the Burman and Siamese nations rose into notice. It is astonishing how extensive a variety of temples and sculptures of great antiquity are to be found everywhere throughout the island; and as it is matter of history that Mohammedanism became the established religion of Java in A. D. 1475, all these ruins, in so far as they partake of a Pagan character, must of course be referred to an earlier period.

From the peculiar appearance of the architectural remains of the temples, and the ancient inscriptions which are discovered on them, the conclusion has been drawn by Raffles and others that they consist of two series, an older and a more recent, the former indicating that the religion of Budha at one time prevailed in Java, and the latter indicating that Buddhism was superseded by the more modern system of Brahmanism or Hinduism, which still retains so firm a hold of the natives, although, for four centuries past, the Moslem faith has been the dominant religion of the country, that they are still devotedly attached to their ancient Pagan institutions. The true condition of matters may be learned by comparing the state of the island of Java with that of the island of Bâli in its neighbourhood. The whole island of Java appears to have been converted to Mohammedanism in the course of the sixteenth century. The ruins of sacred edifices and statues which abound there are all of a Budhist or Hindu type, while the present inhabitants profess the religion of the Koran. In Bâli, on the other hand, not more than one in two hundred of the natives are Mohammedans, and the great body of the people profess the creed of the Hindus, and observe its institutions, although Hinduism has become extinct in the rest of the Indian Archipelago. "On Java," says Sir Stamford Raffles, "this singular and interesting system of religion is classed among the antiquities of the island. Here it is a living source of action, and a universal rule of conduct. The present state of Bâli may be considered, therefore, as a kind of commentary on the ancient condition of the natives of Java. Hinduism has here severed society into castes; it has introduced its divinities; it has extended its ceremonies into most of the transactions of life; it has enjoined or recommended some of its severest sacrifices, such as the burning of a widow on the funeral pile of her husband: but yet the individual retains all the native manliness of his character, and all the fire of the savage state." Mr Crawford, who visited Bâli in 1814, says that the religion of Bâli has been considered as of two descriptions, that of Budha, and that of Brahma. The Buddhists are said to have come first to the country. Of the Brahmans of Sava, or Shiva, nine generations are said to have passed over since their arrival.

One of the most interesting and striking evidences of the fact that Buddhism anciently prevailed in Java, is the temple of Boro Bodo, probably Bara Budha, or the great Budha, situated in the mountainous and romantic territory of Kadon, immediately to the east of Cheribon. It is a square structure of hewn stone, each side 520 English feet long, and 116 feet in height. It is built on the summit of a small hill, and consists of a series of six enclosing walls, crowned by a dome. The outer and inner side of each wall is covered with a profusion of sculpture, including between 300 and 400 images of Budha, from whom the temple may possibly have received its name. At Brambanan, however, in the district of Mataram, there is a most extensive display of ancient architecture, the temples, though built of hewn stone, being small, and clustered in groups, of which the largest is that called the Thousand Temples. It occupies a space 600 feet in length by 550 in breadth, within which are four rows of small buildings, surrounding a large central one. The whole group has four entrances, each facing a cardinal point, and guarded by two gigantic statues, each nine feet high, though in a kneeling attitude, and eleven feet in circuit.

As a further proof that the Javanese were intimately connected in religion with the Hindus, it may be mentioned that the Káwi, or ancient Javanese character, and which is accounted sacred, is nearly allied to, and indeed has a large infusion of, the Sanscrit. Figures of Hindu deities, such as Brahma, Ganesa, Mahadevi, and others, are to be found in abundance.

The religious festivals of the Javanese now correspond with those of the Mohammedans generally; but on the occasion of the funeral of a departed relative, or in honour of his memory, they observe solemnities on the seventh, fortieth, one hundredth, or thousandth day after his decease. Those who intend to observe them assemble on the preceding evening, in order to read some portion of the Koran. Before the guests partake of the meal, the principal person present generally addresses the Almighty in a prayer which alludes to the occasion, and expresses gratitude for the repast.

JEALOUSY (WATER OF). This water, which is described by Moses as the bitter water that causeth the curse, was appointed by the law of Moses to be drunk by an Israelitish woman suspected of infidelity to her husband, but denying her guilt. The mode of preparation and administration of this water is minutely detailed in Num. xi. 5—29. The priest was commanded to write the curses in a book, and having washed those curses into the water, it was thus said to become bitter, or impregnated with the curse. The effect produced upon the suspected woman who was called upon to drink this water of jealousy was dreadful. If guilty, she felt constrained to confess; and the rabbins tell us that a woman who confessed in such circumstances was not put to death, but only divorced without dowry. An ordeal of this kind was well fitted to accomplish the purpose for which it was appointed, and could not possibly injure the innocent.

JEBIS, the god of the sea among the Sindoists of Japan. He is worshipped both by fishermen and merchants, and is usually represented as sitting upon a rock near the sea-shore, with an angling rod or line in one hand and a fish in the other.

JEHOVAH, the incommunicable name of the Supreme Being, denoting his self-existence. It was not revealed before the time of Moses, and hence the declaration made in Exodus vi. 3, "And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them." It is identical with JAH, and is intended to describe the incommunicable essence which the Apostle John expresses in the Apocalypse by a periphrasis, "He that is, and was, and is to come." The Jews usually substitute for the word Jehovah, which they are afraid to pronounce or to write, the word Adonai, or Lord. After the Babylonish Captivity, the Jews left off pronouncing it, and thereby lost its true pronunciation. In our authorised translation the word is generally translated LORD, in capital letters. The Septuagint also renders it the Lord. Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius, inform us that in their time the Jews left the name Jehovah in their copies written in the Samaritan character, instead of the Hebrew or Chaldee, lest strangers should profane and misapply it. The Jews, as Josephus informs us, call this name of God the Tetragrammaton, or the name with four letters, and they believe that if any man knows the true pronunciation of it, he cannot fail to be heard by God. Simon the Just, they allege, was the last who was acquainted with it. They say that the angels are not at liberty to utter the word Jehovah, and that, by virtue of this name, which was inscribed on his rod, Moses performed all his miracles.

The Jewish Cabbalists attach the utmost importance to the word Jehovah, which they allege not only to be the peculiar name of the Divine essence, but also to designate the Aziluthic world, or world of emanation, which contains the ten Sephiroth. The first of the four Hebrew letters of which it consists has a twofold signification, the point of the letter denoting the Supreme crown, which some Cabbalists also call the central point, while the letter itself denotes Wisdom; the second letter, Understanding; the third, which is equivalent to six, implies the next six numerations; and the fourth signifies the tenth and last. Manassah Ben Israel remarks that the four letters may be differently arranged, so as to form twelve different words, all signifying "to be." In this respect, he says, the word Jehovah stands alone, for no other word can be found which will admit of being so transposed, without a change of signification. It is further alleged by the Cabbalists, as we learn from an intelligent writer, that "the seven nations which people the earth have their princes in heaven, who surround the throne of the Eternal, as officers ready to execute his pleasure. They stand around the name Jehovah, and upon the first day of every year petition for a certain portion of blessings to be conferred upon their people during that period. This is expressive of the dependence of these princes for all their knowledge in the art of government on the Fountain and Source of all knowledge, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift. It is further said that all the knowledge and felicity destined for a particular nation was granted to the prince of that nation upon the first day of every year. This circumstance distinguishes the Jews from all the other nations, because the name Jehovah is peculiar to them, and they may, every day of the year, receive such blessings as are needful. To this apply the words of the prayer of Solomon: 'The Lord our God be with us, as he was with our fathers; let him not leave us, nor forsake us. And let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the Lord, be nigh unto the Lord our God day and night.' And David, speaking of other nations, says, 'They shall pray unto God, and he shall not save them.' That is, the nations shall supplicate their princes for additional blessings to those granted unto them upon the first day of the year, but they shall supplicate in vain." "The Cabbalists also teach," says the same writer, "that when God treats with the heathen nations, he assumes all his splendour and majestic greatness; but when he condescends to treat with the Jews, he appears in all his unveiled amiableness, and converses in a familiar manner, or gives full manifestations of the name Jehovah. 'They that know thy name will put their trust in thee.' Accordingly, the wise men say that the name Jehovah is pronounced and written in the temple in a proper manner, but in the provinces it is only expressed by surnames and circumlocutions, obviously teaching the plain truth, that the Jews knew God better than the other nations, and that this name will appear in all its divine and luminous splendour to the saints and angels in the state of full perfection and glory.

"These mysterious Cabbalists have another method of developing the mysteries contained in the name Jehovah. They attribute to each of the letters a specific value, which depends upon their local station from the letter Jod, and form significant combinations of these letters. They form a name of the value of twelve, another of forty-two, and a third of seventy-two, and to each of these they assign a particular angel, invested with particular power to avert calamity and to confer favours. They conclude this part of their system by stating the vast importance of acquiring proper conceptions of the name of God, and the various significations of the same, in order to pray in an acceptable manner, lest man should supplicate for wrath and vengeance when he wished to supplicate for pardon and mercy. And they believe that the highest measure of knowledge and perfection is to know the whole import of the ineffable name of Jehovah."

JEJUMI, figure-treading, a ceremony observed annually among the Japanese, of trampling upon the crucifix, the Virgin Mary, and other saints. It is understood to be observed at Nagasaki down to the present day, and is probably designed to express the abhorrence which this singular people entertain for Christianity, or at least for that form of it which the Jesuits of Rome had several times, though without success, attempted to introduce into the kingdom of Japan. The images used in Kämpfer's time were about a foot long, cast in brass, and kept in a particular box for the purpose. The ceremony took place in the presence of the street officers. Each house was entered by turns, two messengers carrying the box. The images were laid upon the bare floor, and the list of the household being called over, they were required in turn to tread upon them. Young children, not yet able to walk, were held in their mothers' arms, so as to touch the images with their feet. It has been asserted that the Dutch were obliged to engage in this ceremony, but the statement is incorrect.

JEKIRE, an evil spirit among the Japanese, which they expel by exorcising, a ceremony which Kämpfer describes, telling us that "in one of his voyages he met with a vessel full of penitents, who all roared out Namanda as loud as they could stretch their throats, in order to procure relief to their afflicted townsmen, who were visited with a malignant fever. At the same time they had recourse to their grand chaplet, which, in time of public distress, they always say sitting, young and old, promiscuously together in a circle. The chaplet slides apace through the fingers of the devotees, and at every great bead each of them hollows out Namanda, with all the external testimonies of unfeigned sorrow and sincere repentance. If, notwithstanding these their pious endeavours, the contagion spreads farther, the same divine service and humiliation is appointed to be performed in all their pagodas."

JEMMA, the judge of the wicked after death among the Japanese, who beholds in a large looking-glass all the most secret transactions of mankind. If, however, the priests intercede with Amidas for the sinner, and the relations of the deceased are sufficiently liberal in their offerings to the priests, Amidas has sufficient influence with Jemma to procure a mitigation of punishment, or even a complete discharge, so that the sinner may return to the world again before the term allotted for his punishment has fully expired. When they have suffered all that has been appointed for them, the wicked are supposed by the Japanese Budsoists to return into this world, and to animate the bodies of unclean beasts, such as towls, serpents, and such-like animals. The transmigration goes onward, until, in process of time, they return to human bodies, again to pass through another series of changes. There is a temple consecrated to Jemina a short distance from Miako, situated in a very delightful grotto, in which likewise there is a convent. The figure of Jemina, the king of the devils, is monstrous, and on each side of him are two large devils, one acting as his secretary, and registering in a book all the sins of mankind; while the other reads them distinctly, or rather dictates what the secretary is to record. The walls are embellished with frightful pictures of tortures which the wicked are supposed to undergo. This temple is resorted to by crowds of people from all parts, with oblations and money in their hands, to redeem their souls from the punishments inflicted by so formidable a judge.

JERUSALEM (NEW) CHURCH. See SWEDENBORGIAN.

JESSEANS, a name which Epiphanius says was given to the early Christians; either from Jesse, the father of David, or, which is more probable, from the name of the Lord Jesus.

JESUATES. See APOSTOLIC CLERKS.

JESUITS, a religious order of the Romish Church, which was established in the sixteenth century under the name of the Society of Jesus. Its founder was a distinguished Spanish knight, Ignatius Loyola, who was born at Guipuzcoa A. D. 1491. At an early age he was sent as a page to the court of Ferdinand and Isabella, where he acquired all the polish and refinement of manners which such a situation was so well fitted to afford. It was not until he had completed his twenty-ninth year that this man, destined to act so conspicuous a part in the world, first emerged from private into public life. The border provinces between France and Spain had long been a source of keen contention between the two countries. In 1521 Francis I., king of France, had despatched a large army across the borders into Navarre, which, contrary to treaties, was then held by Charles of Austria. The French army having laid waste the province of Guipuzcoa, proceeded to lay siege to Pampeluna, the capital of Navarre. It was on this occasion that we find Loyola in the army of his country bravely defending the beleaguered garrison. Here he was severely wounded, and carried to the head-quarters of the French general, who generously ordered him to be safely conveyed to the paternal mansion near Pampeluna. The wounded man reached home, but, notwithstanding the care and attention bestowed upon him, fatal symptoms began to show themselves. He became gradually worse, and death seemed to be at hand. The physician pronounced the case to be hopeless, and the priest was summoned to perform the last offices of religion, according to the rites of the Church of Rome. This was the eve of Saints Peter and Paul, and at dead of night, as Romish writers tell us, the Prince of the Apostles actually appeared in vision to the dying man, and from that hour his recovery commenced.

A considerable period elapsed before Loyola could leave his sick chamber, and the time was chiefly passed in devoutly perusing those marvellous legends and lives of saints with which Roman Catholic literature abounds. Naturally of an enthusiastic temperament, his mind was thrown into a state of feverish excitement by the wonders which he read, and he vowed, in his zeal, to renounce the world, to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and to devote himself to the service of God and the Virgin. These resolutions were strengthened and confirmed by a vision which he alleged he had seen of the Virgin Mother, with the infant Jesus in her arms. Meantime he gathered strength both of body and mind, and he longed to enter upon that course of self-denying austerities which he had marked out for himself. Holiness, in his view, consisted not in the renovation and moral exaltation of his nature, but in the crucifixion of that nature. His heart was set not so much upon the creation, and growth, and perfection of the new man, as upon the annihilation of the old man. Loyola had proclaimed war against himself, resolving to deny himself to the indulgence of all the affections, and principles, and tendencies of his nature indiscriminately. He set himself nightly to chastise himself with the scourge, thinking, by the torment of the body, to purge away the sin of the soul.

Before he had yet fully recovered his health, Loyola left the paternal home, intending to put in practice the resolution he had formed of making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. But preparatory to entering upon this long journey, he paid his devotions at the celebrated shrine of the Virgin Mary at Montserrat, near Barcelona. On reaching the neighbourhood of Barcelona, he learned that a pestilence was raging in the town, and he judged it prudent, therefore, to take up his residence for a short time at Manresa, about nine miles distant from Barcelona. Here he subsisted by begging from door to door, applied the lash three times every day to his bare shoulders, spent seven hours out of the twenty-four in private devotion, besides thrice attending public prayers at church; and every week he confessed to a priest, and received the sacrament. Soon, however, he began to feel the wretchedness of that destitution and beggary to which he had voluntarily reduced himself. In vain did he practise still more severe austerities and bodily mortifications. His body only became weaker, and his mind more perplexed and distracted. The sins of his past life rose up in array before him, and to his other painful anxieties were added the pangs of an awakened conscience. "A black despair," says Mr. Isaac Taylor, "seized him in the midst of this spiritual wretchedness; and the thought even of self-destruction crossed his mind. At that time he occupied a cell in a convent of the Dominicans, from the window of which he had been impelled to throw himself. He was, however, withheld from this purpose by the Divine mercy; but he resolved, with the hope of vanquishing or of placating the Divine justice, to abstain absolutely from all food, until he should win back the peace and joy that had thus left him. Intermitting no sacred services and no penances, he fasted a day—and two days—and three—and four—nay, an entire week; and he would have persisted in his resolution had not the priest, his confessor, and who had already sounded the depths of his heart, interposed, and straitly commanded him to abandon so presumptuous an endeavour as that of contending with the Almighty; in fact he threatened him with a denial of the communion, should he persist. Alarmed by a threat so terrific, he took food therefore; and, for a time, regained some tranquillity. Yet speedily he relapsed into the same condition of inward distress, and was tempted at once to renounce his ascetic purposes, and to return to the world and to its enjoyments. With this temptation, also, he grappled successfully; and at length, and as if by a convulsive plunge, he extricated himself at once, and for ever, from these dangerous entanglements."

During the year which Loyola spent in Mauresa, he composed his remarkable work, "The Spiritual Exercises," a production which is held in the highest estimation in the Church of Rome as a book of devotion and a guide to religious conduct. In the spring of 1523 he sailed from Barcelona for Italy, and, after a stormy passage of five days, he reached Gaeta, whence he walked to Rome, worn out with fatigue and hunger. After kissing the feet and receiving the benediction of Pope Adrian VI., he proceeded on his journey, and arrived at the Holy City on the 4th of September 1523. He felt that he was now privileged to tread on sacred ground, and earnestly did he wish that he might remain for a lengthened period in this favoured spot, and realize, if possible, his fondest day-dreams—the restoration of the schismatic Greeks to the communion of Rome, and the conversion to Christianity of the followers of Mohammed. But the monks of Jerusalem refused to allow the zealous Spaniard to protract his stay in Palestine, and he was compelled to turn his back, however reluctantly, upon the land of apostles and prophets, and to return without delay to Europe.

On reaching home, Loyola resolved to prepare himself for the sacred office by passing through a regular system of instruction at Barcelona. In early life, he had not even received the first rudiments of education; but, with the most laudable decision of character, he took his place in a class of boys at school, engaging in all their exercises, and even submitting to the usual discipline of the institution. After having made some progress in the acquisition of the Latin language, he quitted the school, and entered the university of Alcalá, which had been founded by the learned Cardinal Ximenes. Here again he was indebted for support wholly to the alms of the charitable. Instead of devoting himself with undivided attention to the pursuit of his college studies, the enthusiastic Loyola burned with a yearning desire for the conversion of careless souls. Both in private and in public, in the streets and in the college halls, he pleaded with men about their immortal interests, and called upon them to subdue the flesh by penances and mortifications of every kind. The hearts of many were touched by the discourses of the zealous student. The snspicious of the holy office at Toledo were excited by what they heard of the doings of Loyola, and for six weeks he was committed to prison; nor was he liberated without the condition being laid down that he should abstain from preaching or teaching others until he had finished his studies. It was impossible for Loyola to submit to such restrictions, and therefore, on being liberated from prison, he set out, with several like-minded companions, for Salamanca, where, meeting with similar treatment as at Alcalá, he determined to repair to Paris, with the view of completing his academic course at the university. In the depth of winter, he travelled on foot, alone, and without a guide. He spent several years in preparing for the priestly office, studying philosophy and the languages at Montague College, and attending a course of theology with the Dominicans. He had now passed six years in fitting himself, by a regular course of training, for public usefulness. Thus equipped, he endeavoured not only to convert the profligate, but those also whom he considered involved in fatal heresy, as having imbibed the opinions of Luther and the Reformation. This great work, he felt persuaded, could not possibly be accomplished by his single unaided efforts. He therefore strove to win over to his opinions some of the most distinguished students then attending the university of Paris. His first convert was Peter Faber, a Savoyard. The celebrated Francis Xavier was the next. James Lainez, Alphonso Salmeron, Nicolas Alphonso, surnamed Bobadilla, Simon Rodriguez d'Arevedo, Claude le Jay, John Codure, and Pasquier Brouet, joined the company which gave origin to the Society of Jesus.

This band of zealous associates gathered round Loyola, animated by his ardent and devoted spirit, and impressed with the firm conviction that they and their leader were called by God to the discharge of a great work. On the 15th of August 1534, being the Festival of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, the company assembled in the church of Montmartre, and there solemnly dedicated themselves to the service of the Saviour, partaking together of the Holy Eucharist, and binding themselves, by a solemn oath, to a profession of poverty, a renunciation of the world, and absolute devotion to the service of God and the good of souls; adding at the same time some other special resolutions,—namely, to attempt a mission to Palestine, or, if frustrated in that design, to throw themselves at the feet of the sovereign pontiff without reservation, stipulation, or condition of any kind, offering to undertake any service which he, the vicar of Christ, should call them to perform. Several of the members of the Society had not yet finished their studies. Three years, therefore, were allowed for this purpose, and it was agreed that they should meet in January 1537, to carry into effect the designs they had formed. That year, accordingly, the companions of Loyola left Paris, and proceeded through France, Germany, and Switzerland into Italy. At Venice they met with their spiritual guide and instructor, who had gone by another route, and arrived before them. It was here that the Society was fully constituted, and its rules drawn up and agreed to. The members distributed themselves among the hospitals of the city, and freely gave their services to the sick and the poor. Their object, however, was still kept in view, to carry out their proposed journey to Palestine. But before setting out for the Holy Land, Loyola despatched his companions to Rome, for the purpose of casting themselves at the feet of Pope Paul III., and obtaining his permission and benediction. They were courteously received by the pontiff, all their wishes were gratified, and they were amply supplied with gold from the Papal treasury. They returned to Venice, and rejoined their master, when both he and they received priest's orders from the nuncio there, and bound themselves anew to the service of God, of the church, and their fellow-men. The next town they visited was Vicenza, where they engaged in preaching the Gospel with such unwearied diligence and devoted earnestness, that the citizens regarded them with the utmost respect and even veneration. Their powerful addresses on the public streets not only drew the attention, but reached the hearts, of their hearers, and many who came to mock remained to pray.

It was while the Fathers were at Vicenza that they laid down the plans of their society. In the commencement of the great work to which they deemed themselves to be called, they decided to make a new proffer of themselves and their services to the Apostolic See. For this purpose Loyola, Faber, and Lainez set out for Rome, leaving the rest of their companions to disperse themselves as missionaries over the northern parts of Italy. While journeying southwards on foot, Loyola was favoured with one of those remarkable visions which he was so often permitted to behold. The Eternal Father appeared to him in a trance, and by his side stood Jesus, bearing a large cross, and uttering these words as he received Loyola from the Father: "I will be favourable to you at Rome." From the date of this vision, it was resolved that the name of the religious order which they had formed should henceforth be the "Society of Jesus." On the arrival of the three associates at Rome in 1537, they were admitted to an audience of the Pope, who readily gave his solemn sanction to their undertaking. They now devoted themselves to public preaching and private dealing with souls. Two of them officiated as professors of theology in the Gymnasium, while Loyola laboured in hospitals, schools, and private houses, besides administering the discipline of the "Spiritual Exercises" to a number of persons of high rank both in church and state. After Loyola and his two companions had laboured thus assiduously for a time, it was resolved to organize the Society, and for this purpose the whole of the Fathers were summoned to Rome from the different towns of Italy where they were diligently prosecuting their missionary work. When they had all assembled, they renewed their vows of poverty, chastity, and unconditional obedience to the Pope, and, after solemn deliberation, fasting, and prayer, they elected Loyola to the responsible office of general of the order. A petition was now presented to Paul III. for a formal recognition of the Society. His Holiness was personally disposed to favour the new order, and more especially as their ministrations were so highly appreciated in all the countries where they were known, that applications reached Rome from all quarters, requesting them to undertake spiritual and even secular offices. John III., the king of Portugal, had long entertained the project of forming a mission in India, and his attention having been directed to the newly-established order, as likely to afford suitable agents for conducting this great work, he asked and obtained two members of the order to engage in this service. One of these was Francis Xavier, who earned for himself the title of the prince of Romish missionaries.

The Pope now decided that the time had arrived for giving his formal sanction and confirmation to the new order. He issued a bull accordingly, dated 27th September 1540, duly constituting the order under the name of the Company of Jesus; and in April of the following year, Ignatius Loyola was installed as General of the Order. At first the Society was limited by the arrangement of the Pope to sixty members; but it was soon found to be necessary to remove this restriction, and vast accessions were yearly made to its numbers. Loyola was not long in discovering that the influence of the body was destined to extend far and wide, not only in all countries, but among all classes of men, from the king to the humblest cottager. Within a few years from its first establishment, houses of the Order were established in many countries, in Spain, Portugal, France, Germany, Italy, Sicily, and even on the remote shores of India. To maintain a constant and close communication with the centre of influence, provincials were appointed in all Romish countries, through whom the General at Rome was made constantly aware of all that concerned the interests of the Church and the Order. The Constitutions of the Society were carefully revised and digested, and preparations were made for establishing Jesuit colleges in different countries for the purposes of general education.

In 1550, Loyola wrote an earnest letter to the senior Fathers of the Society, requesting to be relieved from the generalship which he had held for nine years, and the duties of which he felt himself scarcely able adequately to discharge. All of them, with one exception, refused to accept his resignation, which, accordingly, in deference to the wishes of his colleagues, he withdrew. The Society had spread its intricate ramifications over the whole of the Romish church, but Loyola was the mainspring of the movement; and nowhere did his endeavours to promote the progress of the Order meet with greater opposition than in France. In that country the clergy entertained a deep-rooted jealousy and suspicion of the Jesuits. The faculty of theology in the Sorbonne issued a decree against the Society, but Loyola maintained a prudent silence, and amid all the obstacles which impeded its progress, the new Order silently and secretly diffused its principles among all classes of the people, and in process of time it gained as firm a footing in France as in any other country.

The accumulated labours and anxieties of his office as General of the Jesuits, could not fail in the course of years to weaken the naturally vigorous constitution of Loyola. The members of the Order therefore elected as his coadjutor a Spanish Jesuit named Jerom Nadal, who relieved the General of the business connected with the Society, and left him at liberty to devote himself in the evening of his days to his favourite employment, the care of the sick. He did not long survive, however, his retirement from active duties, but daily declining, he died on the last day of July 1556, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. In 1669 the Jesuits prevailed on Paul V. to admit Ignatius Loyola to the privileges of BEATIFICATION (which see).

The most famous Jesuit next to the founder of the Order was undoubtedly Francis Xavier, who, by his almost incredible labours in foreign countries as a missionary, did as much to advance the fame of Jesuitism abroad, as Loyola by his almost miraculous exertions at home. The apostle of India, as he has frequently been termed, was by birth a Spaniard, and having been selected by Loyola as a suitable person to undertake the work of a foreign missionary, he sailed from Lisbon in April 1541, but did not reach the shores of India until May 1542. First at Goa, and then on the coast of Malabar, he laboured strenuously to turn the heathen from pagan idolatry to the reception of Christianity in the form of Romanism. And his success seems to have been marvellous. He writes home, "that in one month were baptized several thousand idolaters, and that frequently in one day a well-peopled village was individually baptized." Thus, in the view of this Jesuit missionary, baptism seems to have been identical with conversion. The next scene of his labours was Japan, which has always been emphatically a country wholly given to idolatry. Thither he sailed in 1549, and though he resided among the Japanese only two years and four months, he succeeded in winning over many even of the most bigoted worshippers of idols to the profession of an adherence to the Church of Rome. This he contrived to accomplish by compromise, combining heathen traditions with the facts and doctrines of Christianity.

Encouraged by the marked success which had hitherto attended his missionary efforts, Xavier now formed the bold design of attempting the conversion of China. To that country he directed his course with only two companions, in 1552. While on his way thither the vessel in which he sailed was seized and dismantled. Though thus disappointed in his object, he made another attempt to secure a passage to China, but without success. The failure of his favourite scheme preyed upon his mind and affected his bodily health. He languished, sickened, and died in the forty-sixth year of his age.

After the death of Xavier, several Romish missionaries, chiefly of the Dominican order, succeeded in penetrating into China, and indeed that country down to the present time has been a constant field of Romish missions. In all parts both of the Old World and the New, the Jesuits, from the first establishment of the Order, have prosecuted the work of missionaries with a zeal and energy the most exemplary and unwearied. But while thus actively carrying forward their missionary operations in foreign parts, they have always been equally alive to the necessities of those under their immediate inspection; for it is a remarkable fact, that at the very time when Loyola was despatching Xavier on his mission to the East, he was planning the establishment of Jesuit colleges in the different parts of Europe. His biographer, Ribadeneira, speaks of no fewer than fifty-two collegiate establishments on a larger, and twenty-four others on a smaller scale.

The immediate successor of Loyola in the generalship of the Order was Lainez, who commenced a system of policy which changed the whole character of Jesuitism. He had represented the Society at the council of Trent, where in all the deliberations he took high ground on the subject of the Pope's authority, and indeed acted as papal legate. It was quite in keeping with his character, therefore, that, on his accession to the office of General, he should claim to be invested with absolute authority, and to have prisons at his command that he might have it in his power to punish the refractory with temporal penalties. Thus the high-toned spirituality which Loyola had ever sought to connect with Jesuitism, was exchanged for a system of mere human policy. Instead of the discipline of the "Spiritual Exercises," the new General put in force the discipline of the "Constitutions." It was Lainez and not Loyola that first stamped upon the Order that peculiar feature which it has ever since maintained, that of implicit submission to the will of the Superior, and entire surrender of the body, mind, conscience, and indeed the whole man to his undisputed control.

The strict discipline enforced upon the members of the Society by Lainez, was rendered, if possible, still stricter by his successor, Francis Borgia, who, austere himself, demanded the utmost austerity from others. During the ten years which had elapsed since the first establishment of the Order, the Jesuits had thrown off much of that appearance of piety, which, under the training of Loyola, attracted the respect and even admiration of the world. It was the aim of Borgia to arrest them in their course of degeneracy, and to insist upon their observance of the outward proprieties, at least, of a religious order. But with all this anxiety to reform his Order, Borgia is charged, and not without reason, with being one of the principal instigators of the cruel massacre of St. Bartholomew, though he was not spared long enough to witness that dreadful event, having been cut off about three weeks before it took place.

The next General of the Order was Mercurian, by birth a Spaniard, under whose rule Jesuitism added to its unbounded ambition a system of easuistry, which, by means of sophistry and quibbling, would seek to neutralize the plainest laws of the Decalogue. At this period of their history the Jesuits commenced to intermeddle with the political affairs of nations. The first government on which they practised their intrigues was that of Sweden, using all their endeavours to bring it into subjection to the see of Rome. Their efforts, however, were wholly unsuccessful, and Sweden remains a Protestant country to the present day. The popes now began to see more clearly than ever the high value of the Jesuit Order in upholding and increasing the papal authority. Gregory XIII., accordingly, who was the then reigning Pope, contributed largely from the treasures of the church to replenish the coffers of this useful Order. Their institutions of every kind were liberally endowed, and every attempt was made to promote the wealth and influence of the society.

The Jesuits, as we have already remarked, had no small difficulty in obtaining a footing in France, in consequence of the jealousy with which they were viewed by the French clergy. But having once established themselves in the country, they busied themselves in fanning the flame of discord between the Roman Catholics and the Huguenots, and to their interference is mainly due those scenes of barbarous and inhuman cruelty which mark the history of the Protestant church of France. The rise of the Jansenists, in the sixteenth century, following hard upon the Protestant Reformation in Germany, rendered it still more difficult for the Jesuits to hold their ground among the French clergy and people. The Sorbonne had always viewed them with suspicion, and now it demanded their expulsion from the country. Henry IV. passed a decree to this effect in 1594, but it continued in force for only a few years. In 1603 they were recalled, and spread with such rapidity, that in a few years establishments belonging to the Order were to be found in every province, and in almost every town in the kingdom, struggling hard to destroy the liberties of the Gallican church, and to propagate their ultramontane principles among all classes of the people.

It was at this period in the history of the Jesuits, that the disciples of Loyola were confronted with such overwhelming ability and power by the followers of Jansenius. 'The Provincial Letters' of Pascal, one of the keenest and most cutting satires that has ever issued from the press, spread terror and dismay among the ranks of the Jesuits, and for a season their cause was considered as hopeless. But in course of time the pungency of Pascal's wit, and the force of his logic, were alike forgotten, and the Jesuits succeeded in recovering their influence. The reign of Louis XIV. was their golden age. They presided both in the palace and at the council-board, moving the springs of government, and directing the consciences of the rulers.

It is unnecessary, after what has been said in the article JANSENISTS, to do more than simply to allude to the keen contest which ensued between that party and the Jesuits in regard to the work of Father Quesnel. Long and bitter was the controversy, but it terminated in the triumph of the Jesuits, and the consequent flight of the Jansenists into Holland and other Protestant countries. Jesuitism now obtained a complete ascendancy in France, and the natural fruits of the system speedily began to appear. Voltaire and the French Encyclopædists gathered around them a large and influential school of infidels whose principles spread far and wide among the people. To infidelity and irreligion succeeded anarchy and revolution. The Jesuits were expelled in 1764 with the consent of Louis XV. All the governments of Europe soon followed the example of France. They were banished from Spain and Sicily in 1767; from Malta and Parma in 1768; and from Rome by Clement XIV. in 1773.

The rejection of the Jesuits by the Roman Catholic governments, and even by the supreme Pontiff himself, was felt to be a fatal blow aimed at the very existence of the Order. Some of them, discouraged and almost in despair, threw off the name and dress of the Society of Jesus, and attempted to conceal themselves under new appellations, such as those of "Fathers of the Cross," or "Fathers of the Faith;" but the great mass of them scorned to adopt such a subterfuge, and resolved to continue to wear even in public the insignia of Loyola. In one state, the kingdom of Prussia, the Jesuits paid no regard to the papal brief for their suppression. Their conduct in this matter met with the entire approval of the reigning sovereign, Frederic the Great. The consequence was that, shut out from other countries, they fled to Prussia, and soon became numerous there, monasteries being built for their reception, and superiors elected over them. The bishop of Breslau interposed in behalf of the papal see, whose authority was thus attempted to be set at nought, but Frederic threw the shield of his royal protection over the rebellious Jesuits, and ordered that they should remain unmolested in his dominions. In vain did the Pope Pius VI. remonstrate with the Prussian monarch; he refused to yield more than to allow the Jesuits to abandon the dress of their Order, but in all other points he declared it to be his sovereign will that they should remain inviolate. The French infidel school, more especially D'Alembert, was earnest with Frederic to expel the Jesuits, as the other European monarchs had done. But the great Frederic was inexorable, he was resolved to retain a class of men whom he regarded as useful to him in many respects, chiefly on political grounds. His motives, however, were entirely misunderstood by the Jesuits themselves, who, imagining that he approved their religious principles, made a formal application to him to declare himself openly the protector of their Order. This request, however, he politely declined, stating "that it was for the Pope to make whatever reforms he pleased in his own states without the interference of heretics."

The Jesuits, in their state of exile, received the protection also of Catherine II., empress of Russia, who looked upon them as political auxiliaries. On this ground she retained them in White Russia, which was an ancient Polish province, and prohibited the proclamation of the brief of Clement XIV. in all the Russias. Encouraged by the support which they received from Catherine they sent a deputation to Pius VI., who, as he was secretly disposed to favour the Order, gave way to his own personal feelings in the matter, and while he openly maintained the suppression of the Society, nevertheless encouraged their growth in Russia. The nursery of the Jesuits, accordingly, was kept up in White Russia; but after some years they began to display an indiscreet zeal in proselytising, and were in consequence expelled from the kingdom which had so long afforded them an asylum. But happily for them they no longer required an asylum in the north. Pius VII. relieved them from their degradation, and by a bull, dated 7th August 1814, he revoked the brief of Clement XIV., and re-established the Order of Jesuits throughout the world.

From this period, having been restored to the full enjoyment of the papal sanction, the Jesuits made their appearance openly in the Roman Catholic countries of Europe, claiming to be regarded as a valuable and almost indispensable portion of the organization of the Romish church. In France they sought to fill the principal situations in colleges and schools, with the view of training the youth in high ultramontane views. A loud cry arose against them in 1824: and in 1845 they were ordered to leave the country. But without any formal enactment in their favour they have returned in great numbers, and are fast pervading the minds of the clergy and members of the Gallican church with ultramontane principles of the strongest kind.

In Rome, too, the Jesuits have completely recovered the proud position they once held. Pius IX. has confirmed the restoration of the Order. "They enjoy," says Mr. Grinfield, in his historical sketch, entitled 'The Jesuits,' "the complete command of the Roman college, and of most of the collegiate establishments in 'the Eternal City.' They are again active in Spain and Portugal, and have renewed their efforts in Austria, Bavaria, Silesia, and Prussia, in Hanover, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and France. In China and the South Seas, as well as Australia and New Zealand, they are rapidly increasing. In every part of the American provinces they are awakening the alarm of Protestants. In Canada, they have been restored to a large college, and have numerous seminaries in every part of the province. Numbers of them are employed in the education of youth, and they are connected with a large missionary establishment—a branch of the Roman Propaganda. In the East and West Indies, as, indeed, in all English colonies, they are numerous and active. For the English who may travel abroad, they have colleges at Douay, Liege, Valladolid, Lisbon, Brussels, Naples, Paris, Rome, Boulogne, Ratisbon, and in many other places. Over these, some Jesuits are regularly placed."

On 1st January 1854, the total number of the members of the Society of Jesus, not including the affiliated, amounted, according to the report of the general's office at Rome, to 5,000, and it is highly probable that since that time, their number must have become much larger. Ribadaneira says, that, in 1608, the Society numbered 10,581 members.

The members of the Society of Jesus are divided into four classes: 1. The Professed, or those who take the four vows, namely, that of perfect obedience, of voluntary poverty, of perpetual chastity, and of absolute submission to the Pope. 2. The Coadjutors, who are either spiritual or temporal, that is, ecclesiastics or lay brethren. They aid in carrying forward the designs of the Society, but are bound only by the three simple vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity. 3. The Scholars, whose position is to be determined by their individual qualifications. They are bound by the three former vows, but are allowed to take the last with consent of their superiors. They may become either spiritual coadjutors, or simple priests of the Society. 4. The Novices, who are admitted indiscriminately, and are considered only as candidates upon trial. A probation of two years is required before taking the vows of the temporal coadjutors, and of the scholars who are to become spiritual coadjutors. Another probation of a year precedes the vows of the professed.

At the age of fourteen a young man may be proposed for admission into the Order as a Novice; but before he is formally accepted, a minute investigation takes place into his temper, talents, station in society, and prospects in life. Nor is the scrutiny limited to the individual himself; it extends also to his relatives and connections, both near and remote. If the examiners are fully satisfied with the results of their inquiry, he is forthwith admitted into the noviciate; if they are only partially pleased, he is put on further probation; but if they find the youth to be unpromising they dismiss him as unsuitable. Supposing the youth to become a Novice, he is put under a course of special training, with the view of teaching him to yield implicit submission to his superiors, merging his own will wholly in theirs. The duty is inculcated upon him of abandoning his patrimony, and devoting it to the poor or to the church. During the whole period of his noviciate, he is prevented from holding intercourse with his friends or relatives, except under certain conditions, to which he must strictly adhere. His every movement is narrowly watched, and at the confessional he must reveal the inmost secrets of his heart.

Should the young man approve himself as a Novice during a two years' probation, he next becomes a Scholar, and in this capacity he must pass a month in self-examination, confession, and meditation; a month in begging from door to door; he must wait on the sick in some of the hospitals; he must do the duties of a mendicant in the convent; he must employ himself finally in teaching and in preaching. After two years thus spent, he is promoted to the rank of a coadjutor, and in another year to that of a professed brother. The grand aim towards which the whole of this protracted course of training is directed, goes to the entire subjection of the whole man to the will of the superior. "If you would immolate your whole self wholly unto God," says Loyola, "you must offer to him not the bare will merely, but the understanding also; to think just what the superior thinks, and take his judgment for your own, so far as it is possible for a devoted will to bend the understanding. It is impossible to deny that obedience includes not only the doing of what is commanded, and the willing of what is done, but the submission of the judgment also, that whatever is commanded should be thought right and true; for obedience is a holocaust wherein the whole man, without any part reserved whatever, is immolated to his Creator and his Lord by the hands of his ministers.

"The noble simplicity of blind obedience is gone, if in our secret breast we call in question whether that which is commanded be right or wrong. This is what makes it perfect and acceptable to the Lord, that the most excellent and most precious part of man is consecrated to him, and nothing whatsoever of him kept back for himself.

"And let every man be well persuaded that he who lives under obedience ought, under the providence of God, sincerely to be governed and behave exactly as if he were a corpse, which suffers itself to be turned in all directions and dragged every where; or as if he were an old man's staff, to be used where-soever and in whatsoever he wishes who holds it in his hand."

At an early period, so early, indeed, as the meeting of the Council of Trent in 1545, the Jesuits were suspected of tending, in their doctrinal sentiments, towards Pelagianism. Accordingly, the deputies which they sent to the council, Lainez and Salmeron, were watched by the Augustinian party with the greatest jealousy, and although they attempted to conceal their real opinions under a mass of eumbrous erudition, it was plain that they were entirely opposed to the principles of Father Augustin in regard to the vital doctrines of justification by faith, the fallen condition of man, and the insufficiency of good works to merit pardon and salvation. Another point, also, on which the Jesuit deputies gave great offence to the assembled bishops, was the boldness with which they avowed ultramontane principles, not only in regard to the supremacy of the Pope, but in regard to his being the source of all episcopal authority, alleging, as they did, that "the divine hierarchy of the church was concentrated on the head of him to whom they had made a special vow of obedience." The doctrine of the Jesuits on this point is, that the Pope, as head of the church on earth, is infallible; that he is the only visible source of that universal and unlimited power which, in their view, Christ has granted to the church; that all bishops and subordinate rulers derive from him alone the authority and jurisdiction with which they are invested; that he is not bound by any laws of the church, nor by any decrees of councils; that he alone is the supreme legislator of the church; and that it is in the highest degree criminal to oppose or disobey his edicts and commands. Such are the strong views which the Jesuits and ultramontanists generally entertain of the power and authority inherent in the Pope as the vicerent of Christ on earth in the government of the church.

The controversy with the Jansenists, towards the middle and end of the sixteenth century, developed the Pelagian opinions of the Jesuits more fully than even the debates in the council of Trent. The Augustinian theology on the doctrine of grace had been substantially taught in the "Augustinus" of Jansenius, and ably defended by the writers of Port Royal. The Jesuits, however, as they had formerly done in opposition to the Dominicans, so now in opposition to the Jansenists, contended earnestly in favour of the Pelagian views, modified somewhat by the introduction of the scientia media, or perfect prescience of the future, on which the Divine predestination was supposed to proceed. This latter modification of Pelagianism was suggested by the Jesuit Molina, in his celebrated work on the Concord of Free-will with Divine Grace, published in 1558. The Jansenist controversy was carried on with great bitterness for many years, but at length in 1642 the Jesuits succeeded in obtaining from Urban VIII. a bull condemning the work of Jansenius; and in 1653 and 1656 Innocent X. and Alexander VII. issued bulls denouncing as heretical and impious five propositions alleged to be contained in that work. (See JANSENISTS.) At the instigation of the Jesuits, a fierce persecution of the Jansenists took place, which, although suspended for a time under the pontificate of Clement IX., was soon recommenced, and many of the Jansenists fled from France to find an asylum in other parts of Europe. The Jesuits raised another persecution against the rival body in the following century, which ended in the complete depression of their enemies, and their own triumph for a time, but, as we have already seen, the day of retribution at length arrived, and the Jesuits were suppressed in 1773.

The moral doctrines of the Jesuits were perhaps more objectionable than their theological, tending as they did to corrupt the minds and hearts of multitudes. They taught, for example, that it was of no consequence from what motives men obeyed the commandments of God, yet that wicked actions might be justified by good intentions. Pascal, in the 'Provincial Letters,' exposes their system of morals with the most cutting irony, and with exquisite humour. Many of the Romish as well as Protestant writers have been violent in their opposition to Jesuit morality. Some of their pernicious maxims were in fact condemned in 1659 by Pope Alexander VII.; and in 1690 the article relating to Philosophical Sin was condemned, but without effect, by Alexander VIII. Reference has already been made, under the article CASUISTS, to some of their ethical tenets, particularly their doctrine of Probability, which, along with that of Philosophical Sin, has stamped the Jesuits as perverters of the principles of morality. "According to the doctrine of the Jesuits," says Professor Ranke, "it is enough only not to will the commission of a sin as such: the sinner has the more reason to hope for pardon, the less he thought of God in the perpetration of his evil deed, and the more violent was the passion by which he felt himself impelled: custom, and even bad example, inasmuch as they restrict the freedom of the will, avail in excuse. What a narrowing is this of the range of transgression! Surely no one loves sin for its own sake. But, besides this, they admit other grounds of excuse. Duelling, for instance, is by all means forbidden by the Church; nevertheless, the Jesuits are of opinion, that if any one incur the risk of being deemed a coward, or of losing a place, or the favour of his sovereign, by avoiding a duel; in that case he is not to be condemned, if he fight. To take a false oath were in itself a grievous sin: but, say the Jesuits, he who only swears outwardly, without inwardly intending it, is not bound by his oath; for he does not swear, but jests. These doctrines are laid down in books which expressly profess to be moderate. Now that their day is past, who would seek to explore the further perversions of ingenuity to the annihilation of all morality, in which the propounders of these doctrines vied, with literary emulation, in outdoing each other? But it cannot be denied that the most repulsive tenets of individual doctors were rendered very dangerous through another principle of the Jesuits, namely, their doctrine of 'probability.' They maintained that, in certain cases, a man might act upon an opinion, of the truth of which he was not convinced, provided it was vindicated by an author of credit. They not only held it allowable to follow the most indulgent teachers, but they even counselled it. Scruples of conscience were to be despised; nay, the true way to get rid of them, was to follow the easiest opinions, even though their soundness was not very certain. How strongly did all this tend to convert the most inward and secret promptings of conscience into mere outward deed. In the casuistic manuals of the Jesuits all possible contingencies of life are treated of, nearly in the same way as is usual in the systems of civil law, and examined with regard to their degree of veniality: one needs but to open one of these books, and regulate himself in accordance with what he finds there, without any conviction of his own mind, to be sure of absolution from God and the Church. A slight turn of thought unburthened from all guilt whatever. With some degree of decency, the Jesuits themselves occasionally marvelled how easy the yoke of Christ was rendered by their doctrines!" Philosophical sin, that is, sin committed through ignorance or forgetfulness of God, is in the eye of the Jesuits of a very light and trivial nature, and does not deserve the pains of hell.

The Society of Jesuits is a regularly organized body, being governed by a General at Rome, who has four assistants, but who is responsible to none but the Pope alone. He nominates all the functionaries of the Order, and can remove them at pleasure. By means of the confessional, the closest surveillance is maintained over families and individuals, and an arbitrary power is exercised over the consciences and the conduct of men, which it is impossible for the victims to resist.

JESUITS IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND. In the twelfth century, Pope Adrian IV., an Englishman by birth, made a grant of Ireland to Henry II., King of England, on condition that the king should pay him a yearly tribute for each house in Ireland, that the Catholic religion should be restored to its ancient splendour, and the people to a commendable propriety of conduct. In 1174, Henry was acknowledged to be lord paramount of all Ireland. Nothing connected with the Jesuits occurred till the reign of Henry VIII., when the Pope of Rome, Paul III., of Jesuit notoriety, took Ireland under his immediate patronage. The German Reformation, which diffused the principles of Protestantism throughout every other country in Europe, left Ireland untouched. Nay, a rebellion broke out avowedly in defence of the Pope's authority, but the power of the king of England bore down all opposition. Statutes were passed in the Irish parliament abolishing papal authority, and declaring Henry head of the Irish Church, as well as granting him the first-fruits of all ecclesiastical benefices. Partial irreconcilables followed, but they were speedily suppressed. Parliament and the Irish chieftains were all on the side of Henry; their country was raised to the rank of a kingdom, and the English ascendancy, by the admission of Dr. Lingard, the Roman Catholic historian, rested on a firmer basis than it had ever done since the invasion of the island by Henry II.

Such was the state of matters in Ireland, when two Jesuit envoys were despatched thither by Paul III. The persons selected for this mission were Brouet and Salmeron; the one a Frenchman, and the other a Spaniard. They were invested with the powers of papal nuncios, and before leaving Rome, they received special written instructions from Loyola, as to the manner in which they should conduct themselves in fulfilling their difficult and delicate task. Joined by a papal functionary named Zapata, they set out on their expedition in September 1541. On their way they visited Scotland, where they so wrought upon the mind of the reigning monarch, James V., that they withheld him from joining Henry VIII. in his resistance to the Papal power, and his acceptance of the Reformation. From Scotland the Jesuit envoys hastened to Ireland, where, by their bland and plausible manners, they succeeded in gaining the confidence of the Irish people. They reported to Rome that they had scoured the whole island in thirty-four days, and had found the people in the most deplorable state both as to religion and morality. They had resolved, however, not to give way to discouragement, but to try what could be done by means of masses, indulgences, and confessions. It was soon ascertained, of course, that the Jesuits, instead of confining themselves to the exercise of their spiritual duties, were actually attempting to plot against the government; and, in consequence, a price was set upon their heads, and confiscation and the penalty of death were proclaimed against every individual who should harbour them. Finding themselves thus in danger of falling into the hands of Henry VIII., they left Ireland in haste, and, on their way to France, again visited Scotland; but they saw enough to discourage them from prolonging their stay in that country, and, contrary to the express wishes of the Pope, they fled to France, where they had the misfortune to be imprisoned at Lyons as Spanish spies. They had intended, it is said, boldly to appear at the English court, and plead the cause of Romanism, but they judged it better to return to Rome without delay. Thus ended the first expedition of the Jesuits to Ireland.

Notwithstanding the failure of this scheme, the Jesuits watched their opportunity for effecting a settlement in Britain. A suitable occasion seemed to present itself on the death of Edward VI. and the accession of Mary to the English throne, who, being herself a Roman Catholic, wished to undo all that the Reformation had effected, and to restore the old religion to its former position in the country. At this apparently favourable period a proposal was made to Cardinal Pole to establish a branch of the Society of Jesuits in England; but the proposal was unexpectedly declined, the cardinal being by no means friendly to the Jesuits. It was not, indeed, till the death of Mary, and the accession of Elizabeth, that a second Jesuit expedition to Ireland was planned at Rome. The individual selected for this important mission was an Irishman by birth, named David Wolfe. Before setting out, he was invested by Pius IV. with the powers of Apostolic nuncio, and furnished with instructions to proceed to Ireland, for the purpose of taking all possible steps to undermine the authority of Elizabeth in Ireland, and subjecting the Irish Church to the Papal dominion. After five months spent on the journey, Wolfe reached Cork, in the south of Ireland, where he was received, according to his own account, with great joy by the Roman Catholics. At first, he was peculiarly zealous and active in the discharge of his mission, and wrote to Rome the most encouraging accounts of his success; but at length he gradually relaxed in his exertions, and ended by conducting himself so improperly, that it was found necessary to dismiss him from all connection with the Society of Jesus. Thus terminated the second expedition of the Jesuits to Ireland.

The Pope, however, and the Jesuits had strong confidence that, amid all discouragements, they would yet succeed in effecting a lodgment in the Emerald Isle. Only three years, accordingly, had elapsed from the period of Wolfe's unfortunate failure, when three more Jesuits were despatched to Ireland, with an archbishop, to erect colleges and academies—having been invested with full power from the Pope to make use of the ecclesiastical revenues for that object. At the same time an English Jesuit was sent from Rome to his native country, "for the good of his health, and for the consolation and aid of the Catholics." Thomas Chinge, for such was his name, is said to have been successful in converting some of the nobility to the Romish faith, but, in the course of a year, his labours were cut short by death.

While thus watching over the interests of the Romish Church in England and Ireland, Pius IV. did not neglect to seek the promotion of the same cause in Scotland. In 1562, Nicholas Gandan, a Jesuit, was sent to Mary Queen of Scots, for the purpose of comforting her in the midst of her difficulties, and confirming her in her adherence to the faith of Rome. The mission which he had undertaken was one of extreme difficulty. Nowhere had the principles of the Reformation found a more congenial soil than in Scotland. There, accordingly, these principles were no sooner preached, than they found thousands of willing minds and hearts by whom they were understood and appreciated. At the time when Gandan appeared at the court of Mary, the Reformed opinions had been extensively embraced by all classes of the people, and whatever savoured of Rome was repelled with indignation and disgust. Such was the state of feeling in Scotland when the Jesuit Gaudan entered the country in the disguise of a hawk or common pedlar. On learning by a secret messenger the arrival of this emissary from the Pope, the queen contrived to admit him to a private interview; not once only, but on three separate occasions, when she solemnly protested to the Papal nuncio her determination to uphold the Church of Rome to the utmost of her power, and her readiness to suffer in its support, should she be called to do so. The report soon spread that a Jesuit had found access to the palace, and the utmost excitement began to prevail. His steps were tracked; a price was set upon his head; and Gaudan quitted Scotland in the utmost haste, carrying with him, however, several youths belonging to noble families, to be educated in Flanders, that they might return to their native land as apostles of the faith of Rome.

The rapid progress of the Reformation in Scotland awakened no small anxiety at Rome, and an opportunity was eagerly looked for of restoring the Papal supremacy in that country. In 1567, accordingly, when Mary had given notice to the Pope, Pius V., of her marriage with Darnley, his Holiness instantly despatched a Jesuit named Edmund Hay, under the pretence of congratulating her on the happy event, but in reality to counsel with and advise her as to the best mode of subjecting her kingdom to the See of Rome. So anxious was the Pope to effect this re-conquest of Scotland, that he declared, in a letter to the queen, which he sent by the hands of Hay, and which was written in the holograph of his Holiness, that he would sell the last chalice of the church in the cause. And the Jesuit was, moreover, instructed to hold out to Mary the flattering prospect of Elizabeth being yet dethroned by the influence of Rome, and herself being placed on the throne of England. And it is not unlikely that such an expectation was really entertained by the Pope, as we find him in 1570, only three years after this significant message to Mary, issuing a bull of deposition against the queen of England, thus endeavouring to excite her subjects to rebellion. The English Roman Catholics held this bull in as little respect as the Protestants did; but that in other quarters a different result was anticipated, is evident from the fact, that on the person of a Scottish Jesuit, of the name of Creighton, who was apprehended and imprisoned in 1584, was found a paper giving detailed reasons to show the easiness of an invasion of England, and appealing to the general wish and expectation of the English Catholics. The Jesuits had taken an active part in establishing a college at Douay, in French Flanders, for the purpose of training missionaries to be sent into England. William Allen, a zealous English Romanist, was the main instrument in planning, and for many years carrying on, this missionary college. At the instigation of a party in Douay, however, the magistrates dismissed Allen and his associates, who immediately transferred their services to a similar institution at Rheims in France. Another establishment of the same kind was founded at Rome by Gregory XIII. Thus, at the Seminaries, as they were called, of Douay, Rheims, and Rome, were trained the Seminary-priests, many of them Englishmen by birth, who were to propagate the Romish faith in England and Ireland. It was soon discovered, however, that various individuals among the Seminary-priests were using their endeavours to seduce the English subjects from allegiance to the queen, and thus carrying out the design of the bull of Pius V. Several Englishmen of good families entered the Society of the Jesuits. In a single year, 1578, Flanders alone gave the Company twelve select Englishmen, who had been exiles, and their number increased from year to year, until at length Mercurian, a general of the Jesuits, exclaimed, "Now it seems God's will that the Company should march to battle against the heresy of England, since he sends to her such a numerous and valiant host from England." Thither, accordingly, several Jesuits repaired, who, along with the Seminary-priests, attempted to sow the seeds of disloyalty and disaffection among the people. This conduct, of course, could not be tolerated, and the government forthwith issued a proclamation to the following effect: "That whosoever had any children, wards, kinsmen, or other relations in the parts beyond the seas, should, after ten days, give in their names to the ordinary, and within four months call them home again, and when they were returned, should forthwith give notice of the same to the said ordinary. That they should not, directly or indirectly, supply such as refused to return with any money. That no man should entertain in his house or harbour any priests sent forth of the aforesaid seminaries, or Jesuits, or cherish and relieve them. And that whosoever did to the contrary, should be accounted a favourer of rebels and seditious persons, and be proceeded against according to the laws of the land."

About three years before this proclamation was made, the Pope had sent an expedition to invade Ireland. It was headed by a person of the name of Stukely, whom the Pope made his chamberlain, and created him Marquis of Leinster, furnishing him at the same time with both money and men. Stukely set out, and on reaching the Tagus, where he expected to be joined by the king of Spain with a large army, he allowed himself to be persuaded to join in an expedition against the Turks, and perished in the battle of Alcazarquivir. A fleet had been waiting on the coast of Ireland to give Stukely a warm reception, but it was of course recalled. And yet though Stukely was diverted from the first object of his expedition, it was afterwards carried out by an Irish refugee called Fitzmaurice, with a few Irish and English exiles and Spanish soldiers. Dr. Sanders accompanied them as Papal legate, carrying with him a bull which constituted the invasion a regular crusade, with all its privileges. A landing was made near Kerry, but the whole attempt at invasion turned out a total failure, and the invaders and insurgents were treated with the most barbarous cruelty.

The boldness of the Jesuits seemed to increase with every fresh repulse which they received. Scarcely had the news of the disastrous failure of the Irish expedition reached Rome, when they resolved, nothing daunted, to attempt the establishment of a branch of their Society in England, and the persons selected for this enterprize were two resolute and enthusiastic members of the Order, Father Parsons and Father Campion, both of them natives of England. They left Rome in 1580, with strict charges given to them not to interfere in the slightest degree with any political interests in the affairs of England. Parsons, who was a man of fierce, blustering disposition, was appointed head of the expedition, which numbered in all thirteen persons, seven of whom were priests. Passing through the Continental states, this party of Jesuit missionaries had a conference with Beza at Geneva. Parsons, leaving Campion to follow, resolved to enter England before his companions. He passed himself off as a military officer returning from Flanders to England; and the wily Jesuit dressed himself accordingly, besides interlarding his conversation with profane oaths, to render the deception all the more complete. Crossing to Dover, he journeyed on towards London, not without some fear of detection, in consequence of the suspicion prevailing against strangers. Campion followed, in the dress of a pedlar or merchant. On reaching the metropolis, a meeting of the Jesuits and missionary priests was held, at which Parsons presided. As instructed at Rome, he declared, and even solemnly took oath, that, in coming to England, he had no political designs whatever, but solely sought the conversion of the country to Rome, with the co-operation of the secular priests.

Notwithstanding the solemn disavowal of political motives with which the mission of the Jesuits was thus commenced, Parsons and Campion travelled through England under various forms of disguise, filling the minds of Roman Catholics with the most seditious and treasonable principles, urging, in no very obscure or unintelligible language, the necessity of deposing the queen. Intelligence of such proceedings could not fail to reach the government, and, accordingly, inquiries of the most searching nature were set on foot to discover the Jesuits. Severe denunciations were published against all who should harbour them, and against all who quitted the kingdom without the license of the queen; and rewards were offered for the discovery of the offenders. Parsons and Campion now addressed a letter in concert to the privy council, complaining of the general persecution, as well as the suspicions entertained against what they termed the most blessed company of Jesuits, and asserting the loyalty of the Catholics to be greater than that of the Protestants, but especially of the Puritans. Campion challenged the Protestant theologians to a controversy on the subject of the true faith; but the Jesuit's challenge and defiance were disregarded. The Jesuits now felt that the publication of the edict had rendered their position dangerous. Spies were everywhere in search of them, and they were under the necessity, in order to escape detection, of frequently changing their disguises, their names, and places of residence. "My dresses are most numerous," writes Campion, "and various are my fashions; and as for names, I have an abundance." Parsons, by his extraordinary dexterity and scrupulousness, had less difficulty than his colleague in eluding the pursuit of his enemies.

It cannot be denied that the presence of the Jesuits in England, and the revolutionary principles which they were diligently spreading among the people, roused the queen and her ministers to the adoption of severe measures against the English Romanists. Up to this time, they had been readily admitted to court; some occupied situations of high honour and trust; and the Roman Catholic nobility, though excluded from the House of Commons, still sat and voted in the House of Lords. Now, however, that the Jesuits and Seminary-priests were perverting the minds of English Romanists, and alienating them from the government of their country, the most decided steps were adopted by the queen and her ministers to repress the treasonable spirit which began to manifest itself. Laws were passed, subjecting to the penalties of high treason all who possessed or pretended to possess the power of absolving or of withdrawing others from the established religion, or suffered themselves to be so withdrawn. Those who said mass, and those who attended it, were liable to be punished with fine and imprisonment. Another act provided, that to prevent the concealment of priests as tutors and schoolmasters in private families, every person acting in that capacity without the approbation of the ordinary, should be liable to a year's imprisonment, and the person who employed him to a fine of £10 per month. These enactments, severe though they undoubtedly appeared to be, were at first seldom put in execution; but at length the storm of persecution broke out, and the prisons in every country were filled with persons suspected as priests, or harbourers of priests, or transgressors of the enactments. Meanwhile the Jesuits meekly skulked about from place to place, allowing the vengeance of the government to fall not upon themselves, the real culprits, but upon multitudes of unoffending persons, upon whom the suspicion of the authorities happened to rest. "At length, thirteen months after his arrival," to quote from Steinmetz, "Campion was betrayed by a Catholic, and seized by the officers of the crown. He was found in a secret closet at the house of a Catholic gentleman. They mounted him on horseback, tied his legs under the horse, bound his arms behind him, and set a paper on his hat with an inscription in great capitals, inscribed—Campion the Seditious Jesuit. Of course he was racked and tortured—words that do not convey the hideous reality. Imagine a frame of oak, raised three feet from the ground. The prisoner was laid under it, on his back, on the floor. They tied his wrists and ankles to two rollers at the end of the frame: these were moved by levers in opposite directions, until the body rose to a level with the frame. Then the tormentors put questions to the wretched prisoner; and if his answers did not prove satisfactory, they stretched him more and more, till his bones started from their sockets. Then there was the Scavenger's Daughter—a broad hoop of iron, with which they surrounded the body, over the back and under the knees, screwing the hoop closer and closer, until the blood started from the nostrils, even from the hands and feet. They had also iron gauntlets, to compress the wrists, and thus to suspend the prisoner in the air. Lastly, they had what they called 'little ease'—a cell so small, and so constructed, that the prisoner could neither stand in it, walk, sit, nor lie at full length."

Parsons, learning that his colleague was apprehended, and condemned to die, fled to the Continent, knowing well that a similar fate assuredly awaited him if he remained in England. On reaching a place of safety, the restless Jesuit commenced anew to plot for the advancement of the interests of Mother Church. The scheme which he now devised was nothing less than the conversion to the faith of Rome of James VI., king of Scotland, the son of the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots, who was then imprisoned in England. To carry out this project, Parsons sent an embassy to the young king, then in his fifteenth year. This embassy was headed by the Jesuit Creighton, who was completely outwitted by James. The young Scottish monarch, keenly alive to his own interests, sought to turn the whole affair to his own account, pretending to connive at the proposed introduction of Romish missionaries, on condition that his exhausted treasury was replenished by the Roman Catholic powers. Creighton eagerly accepted the royal conditions, and he and Parsons hastened to Paris for the purpose of holding a consultation on the subject with some warm and influential friends of the Romish See. It was agreed that an attempt should be made to rescue Mary from her captivity, and to associate her with her son on the Scottish throne, and that, meanwhile, James should be relieved from his pecuniary embarrassments by a grant from the Pope and the king of Spain. The money matters were easily settled, but the first part of the project was of more difficult accomplishment. A French Jesuit, Samnier, was despatched from Paris to hold a secret consultation with Mary. He entered England in the disguise of an officer, "accounted in a doublet of orange satin, slashed, and exhibiting green silk in the openings.

At his saddle-bow he displayed a pair of pistols, a sword at his side, and a scarf round his neck." The design of this Jesuit embassy was to excite a secret revolt against Elizabeth on the part of some of the Roman Catholic nobles. The plot, however, was discovered, and, by the activity of the government, completely defeated; while the young king of Scotland, instead of becoming a dupe of the Jesuits, was thrown wholly into the hands of the Protestant party.

The failure, however, of this project of the Jesuits did not prevent them from forming another. A secret consultation, accordingly, was again held at Paris, with the view of devising a plan for the liberation of Mary. It was resolved that the Duke of Guise should land with a French army in the south of England, while James, with a Scottish army, was to enter by the north, and those of the English who were favourable to the Stuarts were to be invited to lend their assistance. The plan was communicated to Mary by the French ambassador, and to James by Holt, the English Jesuit. This scheme also failed, and Mary refused to lend her sanction to it. Soon after, the Jesuit Creighton was apprehended, and committed to the Tower, where he disclosed all the particulars of the projected invasion.

Many were the schemes and plots devised against Protestant England by the Jesuits, but, through the vigilance of Elizabeth and her ministers, they were all of them unsuccessful; and the alarm which they excited only led to more stringent and oppressive treatment of the Roman Catholics. The queen was highly offended with the cruelty shown in many cases. Camden tells us that "she commanded the inquisitors to forbear tortures, and the judges to refrain from putting to death." She commuted the sentence of death into transportation in the case of seventy Romish priests, one of whom was Jasper Haywood, son of the first Jesuit that ever set foot on English ground.

The Jesuits made use of Mary Queen of Scots as a convenient tool for stirring up from time to time fresh conspiracies against the Protestant throne of England. One of the most active of their auxiliaries in these plots was Philip II. of Spain, and there is too good reason to believe that Mary, probably in her natural anxiety for deliverance from her protracted captivity, was cognizant of, if she did not participate in, these plots of the Jesuits. At all events these crafty priests were her advisers and ghostly confessors down to the time of her execution, which took place in 1587. The death of the unhappy queen of Scots, produced a deep impression on the minds of the adherents of Rome throughout the whole of Europe, and Philip II. of Spain, in particular, hastened to carry out his long-contemplated descent upon England with the glorious Armada. Pope Sixtus V. gave his warm approval of the scheme, and created the Jesuit Allen a Cardinal, for the purpose of accompanying the expedition in the character of papal legate, with a commission to reconcile England to the communion of Rome, and to confirm the conquest to the Spanish crown should the expedition prove successful. This enormous fleet consisted of 135 ships of war, manned by 8,000 sailors, and carrying 19,000 soldiers, and high were the hopes of the Jesuits when this mighty armament set sail for the coasts of England. Allen carried with him an "Admonition to the nobility and people of England," which he had got printed at Antwerp, and which was intended to be extensively distributed among the people on the arrival of the Armada. This document, the authorship of which has usually been assigned to the Jesuit Parsons, was filled with the most scurrilous and abusive language against Elizabeth, and called upon her subjects to rise in rebellion and hurl her from the throne. But the Jesuits were utterly mistaken as to the real state of feeling in England, even among the Roman Catholics, who were at this very time visited with the most bitter persecution. No sooner did the news arrive of the project of Philip with his invincible Armada, than both Catholics and Protestants alike flew to arms, resolved to defend their country against the Spanish invader. All warlike preparation, however, was unnecessary. A tempest arose, and in one night the Armada with her mighty legions was swallowed up by the boiling flood. Thus terminated the boasted enterprize of Philip, planned by the Jesuits, and sanctioned by the Pope. From that date Spain has sunk into the position of a second or a third rate power in Europe.

Father Parsons seems to have now despaired of crushing Protestant England by any machinations carried on within the country; and being himself located on the Continent, he directed all his efforts to rouse the Roman Catholic governments to attack Elizabeth, and deprive her of her crown. With this view he published in 1591 his answer to the edict of the queen against the Jesuits. The book was multiplied in various parts of the Continent, and a new edition appeared at Rome in 1593. This production was well fitted to excite feelings of hatred against Elizabeth, both among her own subjects and among foreigners, and it is not surprising, therefore, that the public mind was agitated at this time by rumours of plots against the life of the queen. The foreign seminaries, which supplied missionary priests to England, were mainly under the control of Jesuits, who thus incessantly moved the springs which were to regulate the thoughts and feelings and conduct of the English Romanists. Parsons and Allen, in seeking to restore the Roman Catholic religion to its former position of influence and authority in England, considered the best means of effecting this to be the placing of a Roman Catholic monarch on the throne. These two Jesuit leaders looked to the daughter of the king of Spain as a suitable person, and to recommend her to the English nation, Parsons published in 1594 his "Conference about the next succession." We learn from Dr. Lingard that this tract excited an extraordinary sensation both in England and on the Continent. Parsons was in fact the accredited agent of Spain, employed expressly by Philip to support the pretensions of the Infanta to the English throne. With the exception of Croighton, who was decidedly favourable to the claims of James VI. of Scotland, the Jesuits were unanimously supporters of the daughter of the king of Spain, for whose benefit they promoted the second Spanish invasion, which was equally disastrous with the first, and, what is remarkable, from precisely the same cause. In 1598 we find an attempt made by Squires and the Jesuit Walpole to poison Elizabeth, which, though it providentially failed, showed all too plainly that the opinions which Parsons so diligently spread on the subject of regicide, had been readily imbibed by some members of the so-called Society of Jesus.

The rebellion which had for several years been raging in Ireland, headed by the daring O'Neil, was well known to have been planned and organized by the Jesuits, more especially by their general, Aquaviva. In 1599, Spain furnished a supply of money and ammunition for the insurgents, with a promise of men. And the Pope also, to show his entire approbation of the insurrection, sent O'Neil a consecrated plume and a bull, granting him and his adherents the same indulgences as had been granted to the Crusaders who had fought for the recovery of the Holy Land. The Irish rebellion, however, was suppressed, and the Spanish fleet, which had been sent to aid the insurgents, was compelled to return home, to announce to the ambitious monarch their complete and inglorious defeat. But Parsons, and those who favoured the Spanish pretensions, though foiled in all the attempts they had hitherto made to effect their purpose, were still determined to persevere. Another invasion was planned in 1661, and adopted by Philip III. of Spain; but it was suddenly frustrated by the death of Elizabeth, and the unanimous acknowledgment of James VI. of Scotland as her successor. A short time before her death, the queen and her ministers had come to the knowledge of the projected invasion, and of its being favoured and encouraged by Garnet, the English provincial of the Jesuits. One of the last acts, accordingly, of the reign of Elizabeth was to issue a proclamation banishing the Jesuits from the realm, not only because they refused to acknowledge and obey the queen, but entered into conspiracies of all kinds against her person, and into alliances with enemies of the kingdom, in order to effect her downfall.

To the mortification of Parsons and his friends, notwithstanding all the efforts they had made to set aside the Scottish succession, James was proclaimed king of England with the joyful shouts and acclamations of the people. It was now evident that the Jesuits had wholly miscalculated the extent of their influence; they had fondly expected that the death of Elizabeth would be the signal for a civil war in England; but no accession could be more peaceful than that of the Scottish monarch to the throne of England. As soon as tidings of the event reached Parsons, he lost no time in writing a letter to a party in the English court, with a view to its being shown to the new king, in which he attempted, in the most crafty and deceitful manner, to show that he and the company to which he belonged had been in favour of the Scottish king. The original of this precious document is in the library of the British Museum. Sanguine hopes were entertained that James, now that he had succeeded to the English throne, would modify, if he did not entirely repeal, the laws which Elizabeth had passed against Jesuits and priests. But only a few months sufficed to dispel the delusive hopes of the Romanists. The restrictive enactments of which they complained were not only confirmed by James, but ordered to be put in rigorous execution. The Romish missionaries were banished from the kingdom, and the penalties for recusancy, besides being continued, were made to extend backward throughout the time which had elapsed since the new king arrived in London. Such unexpected severity was felt deeply by the Roman Catholics in England. Many families found themselves suddenly plunged into a state of extreme destitution, in consequence of the heavy fines to which they were subjected. One enactment after another passed of the most oppressive, exacting, and even persecuting character. All magistrates and judges were commanded, on pain of royal displeasure, to execute the laws against Roman Catholics, both priests and laymen, with the most stern and uncompromising rigour. The consequences were most disastrous. The rich were reduced to poverty, the poor were thrust into prisons, the goods of multitudes were confiscated, some were banished, and others were publicly executed.

In such circumstances as these the desperate conspiracy was planned which is usually known by the name of the Gunpowder Plot. The scheme was one of fearful revenge, being nothing less than to blow up the House of Lords with gunpowder at the opening of Parliament; and thus to destroy, at one blow, the King, the Lords, and the Commons. For more than a year the plan was secretly in process of concoction, and meanwhile government were putting in force measures of redoubled severity against the adherents of the Church of Rome. The fatal day drew near, but providentially some person or other, who was privy to the plot, disclosed it, thus preventing the execution of one of the most atrocious conspiracies which the history of any country records. The conspirators, eight in number, were apprehended, tried, and executed, while among the accomplices in the preparation, it was discovered that three noted Jesuits, Garnet, Gerard, and Greenway, were implicated, while every one of the conspirators belonged to the Jesuit faction. Gerard and Greenway contrived to elude detection, and escaped to the continent. Garnet forwarded a strong protestation of his innocence to the council, and though for a week he attempted to secrete himself, his hiding-place was discovered, and after frequent examinations, in which he equivocated in the most disgraceful manner, he was tried, convicted of complicity in the conspiracy, to the extent at least of guilty knowledge and concealment thereof, and in consequence he was publicly executed. Many have been the efforts made by Romish writers to exculpate Garnet from all concern in, or even knowledge of, the Gunpowder Plot, but his own admissions on his trial, as well as the evidence adduced on the part of the crown, brought home the charge to the wretched Jesuit priest and provincial so clearly, as, in the view of every impartial person, to put the fact of his implication in the conspiracy beyond the reach of doubt. To display the innocence, however, of this member of the Society of Jesus, miracles were alleged to have attended his execution. One, in particular, produced great excitement for a time among the more ignorant and superstitious of the English Romanists. An English student belonging to the Jesuits alleged, that he was standing by whilst the executioner was quartering the dead body of Garnet, when a straw, spotted with blood, came, he knew not how, into his hand. Subsequently, a man's face was seen depicted on the straw, and on examination it was pronounced the genuine picture of Garnet most perfectly displayed in the single drop of blood. It affords a melancholy view of the low state of intelligence in England at the time, that such a story should have not only been currently reported, but extensively believed by Romanists both at home and abroad.

The discovery of a conspiracy so horrible as the Gunpowder Plot, and the fact which was fully brought out, that it was originated by Romish Jesuits, only exasperated the king and the government still more against the English Roman Catholics, who, though innocent as a body of all connection with the nefarious transaction, were, nevertheless, visited with still more cruel treatment than they had hitherto experienced. Enactments of the most stringent description were passed against them, and to test their allegiance an oath was framed which was to be taken by every Romanist of the age of eighteen and upwards, and in which the temporal authority of the Pope was plainly and explicitly denied. A contest now ensued among the Roman Catholic leaders as to the legality of taking this oath. A number of the clergy and laity readily admitted its legality, and took it without hesitation. When a copy of the oath, however, was received at Rome, the Pope issued two apostolic letters addressed to the English Romanists, condemning the oath as unlawful. The appearance of this papal decision threw the body into great perplexity. Bellarmine, Parsons, and other Jesuits on the continent were the chief opponents of the test; but the English clergy were quite divided in opinion on the subject. All the Roman Catholic peers, with the exception of Lord Teynham, took the oath in the House of Lords; and out of the whole body of English Romanists, there were only 1,914 recusants, of whom the great majority belonged to the humbler classes.

At the earnest request of Henry IV. of France, the Pope, Paul V., sent a secret envoy to England with letters to King James, urging the adoption of milder measures than those which had been recently resorted to by the legislature. James received the envoy with apparent kindness, gave him the usual gratuity, but sent him away with no definite answer to the Pope's letters. The slight thus put upon his holiness made him all the more ready to listen to the persuasions of the English Jesuits in Flanders, who despatched a deputation to Rome, calling for some speedy and energetic measures against the English king. The Pope, yielding to the pressure from without, issued a brief, forbidding the English Romanists to attend Protestant churches, and declaring the oath to be unlawful, and to contain many things contrary to faith and salvation. James, on learning that this papal document had reached England, and feeling assured that it was a contrivance of the Jesuits, resolved to act with the utmost decision; and forthwith, to show his indignation at this interference of the Pope with the internal government of the country, he ordered the oath to be administered to all Roman Catholics indiscriminately. The persecution now raged with renewed fury, which the Jesuits endeavoured to allay by the offer of a sum of money.

It was not a little annoying to the Pope to learn that his late brief had been, to a great extent, disregarded by the English Romanists, many of them having taken the oath in spite of the papal prohibition. Another brief, accordingly, was issued confirmatory of the former, but before it reached England, Blackwell, the archpriest of the Romanists, was in prison, having been deposed from his office at the instance of Bellarmine and Parsons, for taking the Oath of Allegiance, and also by a public letter recommending his people to follow his example.

King James, always partial to theological controversy, now entered the field against the Romish Jesuits on the subject of the temporal power of the Pope, and published a tract entitled 'An Apologie for the Oath of Allegiance.' A war of pamphlets now ensued; divines, both Romish and Protestant, published their sentiments on this much disputed point; and during the greater part of the seventeenth century the question was agitated on both sides with the most bitter keenness. James was resolved to enforce the oath in face of all opposition, and three Romish priests who refused to take it were condemned to the gallows. The Romanists were divided among themselves in the midst of all the sufferings which they were called to endure. Dissensions from within and oppression from without rendered the situation of many of them, peculiarly painful. The penalties for recusancy were enforced with increasing severity, and in 1610 all Roman Catholics were ordered to quit London within a month, and all priests and Jesuits were commanded to leave the kingdom within the same period.

But if Romanists in England were punished, on the one hand, by the Protestant government for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, they were punished, on the other, if they took the oath, by the Pope, under the influence of the Jesuits. In this strange position eight clergymen, prisoners in Newgate, appealed to the Pope, imploring him, by the blood of the martyrs, and by the bowels of their Redeemer, to take pity on them in their affliction, and to specify those parts of the oath which rendered it unlawful to be taken. To this appeal, affecting though it was, his Holiness made no reply. Nor did Parsons and the Jesuits content themselves with harsh and cold-blooded neglect of their fellow-Romanists in England in the time of sore persecution; they resisted also every attempt on the part of others to instruct and comfort them. The Benedictine monks of Spain had resolved to establish a mission in England, but the Jesuits offered the most determined opposition to the scheme, and it was not until the cardinal-archbishop of Toledo pronounced the allegations of the Jesuits on the subject of the proposed mission to be false, and the design itself to be worthy of all encouragement, that the Jesuits allowed the plan of the mission to be carried into execution.

All the seminaries for the training of missionaries to England, with the single exception of the college at Douay, were under the direction of the Jesuits; and even Douay itself was gradually subjected to their control, through the crafty management of Father Parsons. The missionaries now poured into England from these colleges were of the most illiterate description, being prepared by only a few weeks' or months' training to enter on the duties of the mission. Accordingly, we learn that, in the course of the four years ending at Christmas 1608, no fewer than forty-one missionaries were despatched to England from Douay alone. Thus, to the other evils of the period, in so far as Romanists were concerned, was added an ignorant, degraded, and, in many cases, immoral clergy. The idea began now to be started of the necessity of episcopal oversight, in order to remedy the evils which had crept into the system. Two deputies had been despatched to Rome in 1606, to endeavour to procure a bishop from the Holy See. Their evil genius, however, the notorious Parsons, continued still to haunt them, and, at his instigation, the petition was rejected, and the hopes of the English Romanists disappointed. The clergy made another application to the Pope for the appointment of a bishop over them, but Parsons again foiled them, and prevailed upon the Pope to decree that, "until every member of the clergy should concur not only in petitioning for an episcopal superior, but also in recommending the particular individual to be preferred to that dignity, no proposal on the subject would be entertained." Such a decision from the sovereign pontiff was sufficiently discouraging to the English Romanists. Nevertheless, they resolved to send another deputation to Rome, to consult the Pope on the whole state of their affairs. The envoys were favoured with an interview with the Pope, the result of which was, that they obtained a confirmation of the prohibition against the interference of the Jesuits in the government of the archpriest. Parsons was not a little mortified at the partial success of the envoys, but he set himself with the utmost energy to counteract their efforts, first, by endeavouring to procure their recall, and, when that failed, by so slandering their character as to destroy their influence with the Pope. This cunning and unprincipled Jesuit pretended to be their confidential adviser and friend, and yet, all the while, he was sedulously employed in secretly frustrating every appeal which they made to the supreme pontiff.

Early in the following year, 1610, Robert Parsons was cut off by a sudden death, and thus a final termination was put to the wicked schemes of one of the basest and most unscrupulous men that ever belonged to the Society of the Jesuits. His life seemed to be one continued series of acts of duplicity, treachery, and atrocious wickedness. To this man, and his intriguing machinations, are to be traced almost all the calamities which, for many a long year, visited the Roman Catholics of England. He was their mortal enemy, though he professed to be their sworn and devoted friend. "Father Parsons," says one of themselves, "was the principal author, the incensor, and the mover of all our garboils both at home and abroad." The death of such a man might, therefore, have been considered as likely to bring relief to the English Romanists; but, unfortunately, the spirit to which he had given rise still survived. For ten years longer, the clergy continued to urge, with unremitting earnestness, the appointment of a bishop, but the Jesuits as vigorously opposed them. At length, in 1620, the Pope declared his willingness to accede to their request. The Jesuits, thus foiled at Rome in their opposition to the measure, endeavoured to prevent it from being put in execution by awakening, through secret influence, the fears and jealousies of King James; and in this they were so successful, that he solemnly declared that a Roman Catholic bishop should never be admitted into the country. The king, however, soon discovered that he had been duped by the Jesuits, and learning that only the spiritual inspection of the clergy was desired, he withdrew his opposition, and Dr. William Bishop was forthwith appointed Vicar-Apostolic of England and Scotland, but nominally Bishop of Chaldeon in partibus infidelium.

One grand object which the Jesuits have incessantly kept in view, from the period of the first institution of their Order, has been the aggrandisement of the Society, and the establishment of their influence in every part of Christendom. But to no country have their ambitious designs been more sedulously directed than to England. They have attempted to operate upon it by all possible means, both direct and indirect. We have found them, during the reign of James I., resorting to a thousand different plans to accomplish their designs; and while their plans were uniformly frustrated by the vigilance of the king and his ministers, they were secretly, but diligently, raising up, by means of the English College at Rome, of which they had acquired the complete control, a band of young men thoroughly trained up in the principles of the Order, and from whose labours as missionaries in England they expected a vast accession to the influence of the Jesuits in that country. Hence it happened, that of forty-seven persons who left the English College at Rome during the seven years preceding 1623, no fewer than thirty-three entered the Order of the Jesuits. So completely, indeed, did that English seminary become a prey of the Jesuits, that the Pope found it necessary to interfere, and to lay it down as a strict regulation that, for the future, no student educated on the foundation was to enter any religious order or company without special license from his Holiness; and, besides, each scholar, on his admission, was to take an oath to that effect, and to be ready, at the command of the protector or the propaganda, to take orders and return to England on the mission.

The English Roman Catholics experienced no little annoyance, in the early part of the seventeenth century, by the institution of a new Order of religious ladies, with the assistance of the Jesuit Roger Lee. These nuns were to live in community, but without any obligation of being shut up in a nunnery. They were bound to take upon themselves the instruction of young ladies, and to ramble over the country, nay, even to the Turks and infidels, to seek the conversion of souls to the Romish faith. The Jesuits, we are informed, mainly supported their cause, and took great pains to obtain them an establishment. These English Jesuitesses, as they were often called, caused so much scandal to the Romish mission, that the English clergy memorialized the Pope on the subject, urging upon his Holiness that the Jesuits were expressly forbidden, by their rules, to meddle or mix in the government of women, and that, notwithstanding this regulation, the Jesuitesses were in the habit of making use of the Jesuits alone in all their concerns in England and abroad, so that they seemed to think it a crime to permit any other priest to hear the secrets of their conscience in confession. In spite of all opposition, these English nuns besieged the Pope with petitions for the confirmation of the Order; but, in 1630, Pope Urban VIII., instead of confirming, wholly suppressed the sisterhood.

After the banishment of the Jesuits from England in 1604, we hear little more of them until the reign of James II., who aimed at the establishment of the Romish Church in his dominions. Jesuit schools were opened; the Jesuit Petre was raised to the honour of a privy councillor; the Pope was urged by the king to make the Jesuit a bishop, but declined to grant the royal request. The Revolution of 1688, however, and the conferment of the throne of England on the Prince of Orange, changed the whole aspect of affairs, and threw the Jesuits once more into the shade. From that period till the date of the suppression of the Order by Ganganelli, Pope Clement XIV., in 1773, the history of the Jesuits in England is little more than a blank. The Order still survived the Papal deed of suppression, and while the successor of Clement XIV. connived at their continued existence, they found an asylum in Prussia, and were permitted to open a novitiate in Russia. But none of the foreign Jesuits appear to have sought shelter in either Great Britain or Ireland. The English members of the body continued to prosecute their mission as before. Nay, it is affirmed that at the very time when the suppression took place, the English government secretly patronised the Jesuits for state purposes.

The restoration of the Order, as we have already seen (see JESUITS), was the act of Pope Pius VII., with the design, as is believed, of upholding ultramontaniam in France. The bull of revival and restoration was passed in 1814, and soon after, the Jesuits were found in great numbers in all the Continental countries: but their late expulsion from Switzerland, their banishment from Bavaria, Austria, Naples, and even, through the decision of Pope Pius IX., from Rome itself, drove many members of the Order to take refuge in England, along with their general, Roothaan. Through the liberality of Mr. Thomas Weld, a wealthy Roman Catholic gentleman, the Jesuit refugees were presented with the domain of Stonyhurst. Steinmetz gives the following account of this seminary belonging to the English Jesuits: "The college of Stonyhurst must receive, on an average, at least £6,000 per annum from pupils—the number being about 120, at forty guineas per annum, for boys under twelve years of age; for those above that age, fifty guineas; and for students in philosophy, one hundred guineas. Besides this, the college possesses and farms some thousand acres of good land, over which one of the fathers presides as procurator. The Jesuits are highly esteemed in the neighbourhood: their handsome church is thronged on Sundays and festivals; and on stated occasions they distribute portions of meat to the poor, besides supporting a small school for their children. Hence they have influence in those parts, as any member of Parliament will find to his cost, should he not make friends with the Jesuits.

"The English Fathers have no less than thirty-three establishments, or colleges, residences, and missions in England. Of course Stonyhurst is the principal establishment, where the Provincial of England resides. The college, in 1845, contained twenty priests, twenty-six novices and scholastics, and fourteen lay-brothers.

"Of the 806 missionary priests in Great Britain, including bishops, the Jesuits alone can say how many are enlisted under the banner of Ignatius, though, doubtless, this knowledge is shared by the 'Vicars-Apostolic' of the various districts in which they are privileged to move unmolested. The Jesuits are muffled in England; it is difficult to distinguish them in the names of the Catholic lists annually published. They have established a classical and commercial academy at Mount St. Mary's, near Chesterfield; and the prospectus of the establishment, after describing the suit of clothes that the pupils are to bring, simply informs the world that 'the college is conducted by gentlemen connected with the college of Stonyhurst.' These 'gentlemen' are generally sent out in pairs by the provincial, according to the constitutions, and thus may charm by variety; for the quantity of work on hand in the various Jesuit missions in England is by no means so evident as the speculation for more, by this constitutional provision. The secular priests are doubled and tripled by the necessities of the mission; the Jesuits are doubled, tripled, and quadrupled, by the requirements of the constitutions and the prospects before them." The Romanist English colleges are six in number;—Stonyhurst, near Whitley, Lancashire; St. Lawrence's, Ampleford, York; St. Gregory's, Downside, Bath; St. Edward's, Everton, near Liverpool; College of the Immaculate Conception, near Loughborough; St. Mary's, near Chesterfield. These are understood to be chiefly, if not entirely, under the care of Jesuits.

The vice-province of Ireland numbered sixty-three Jesuits in 1841, and seventy-three in 1844. They possess in Ireland the colleges of Conglowes, Tolla-beg, and two seminaries in Dublin. The Irish Romanists have been much diminished in numbers by famine, pestilence, and, above all, extensive emigration to America, Australia, and other foreign countries. The Jesuits carry on their work with as much secrecy as possible, endeavouring to advance the interests of Rome, and especially of their own Order, among all classes of the people. JESUS, a name given by Divine appointment to the second person of the Blessed Trinity, as the Saviour, which is the import of the Greek word. That a special importance was attached to this appellation of our Lord, is evident from the circumstance that he was so named by the angel before his birth, for we find it recorded that the angel said unto Mary, "Fear not; for thou hast found favour with God. And behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus." And the angel who appeared to Joseph in a dream gave the same announcement, with the interpretation of the name, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." The reason was thus unfolded why the Son of God was about to assume human nature into union with the divine—that he might be Jehovah the Saviour. Jesus was by no means an unfrequent name among the ancient Jews. The first person to whom we find it applied in the Old Testament was Joshua, the son of Nun, whose office it was, by Divine appointment, to conduct the Israelites across the Jordan into the land of promise. In anticipation, no doubt, of his selection for this peculiar office, he bore originally the appellation of Oshea, or Hoshea, the Saviour; but in Num. xiii., we find it stated that Moses, before sending out spies to examine the promised land, changed the name of one of them, by making a very important addition to it, which brought the type into a complete identity in name with the great Antitype. Thus it is said, v. 16, "And Moses called Oshea the son of Nun Jehoshua;" the first designation signifying Saviour, and the second, Jehovah the Saviour. The Holy Ghost thus taught that, while Joshua should be the deliverer of the people, it was not by his own arm that he should accomplish their deliverance, but by the arm of Jehovah. And in the interpretation given by the angel of the name Jesus, as applied to the Redeemer, it is said "for he;" in the original the pronoun is emphatic; "he himself shall save his people from their sins." He, then, is the very Jehovah implied in the name given to him as to the typical Joshua. And that he is indeed Jehovah, we learn from the language which the evangelist Matthew employs, immediately after describing the appearance of the angel to Joseph: "Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us." These words obviously convey the idea that the Emmanuel, God with us, mentioned by Isaiah, is the same with Jehovah-Jesus our Saviour. The Son of God may be considered as Jesus the Saviour in a threefold aspect—as making known the way of salvation, as purchasing salvation for his people, and as bestowing it upon them when purchased.

JEWS (ANCIENT). The name of Jews was usually given to the Hebrews, especially after the period of the Babylonish captivity, when the nation was chiefly limited to the line of the patriarch Judah, the ten tribes having been almost entirely absorbed in other nations, and thus having disappeared from the page of history. The Jewish people are the most ancient, the most remarkable and interesting of all the nations of the earth. Though for nearly eighteen hundred years they have nowhere been found existing in a national capacity, but mingled among the people of all countries, yet they have continued separate and distinct, so that they can be readily recognized by certain peculiar characteristics. This cannot be affirmed of any other people on the face of the earth. Amid the various changes and revolutions which have occurred in the course of the world's history, even the proudest nations of antiquity have become so completely merged in more modern nations, which have sprung out of them, that it is impossible to trace the course of their history with the slightest approach to distinctness. But here is a nation, which, notwithstanding the numberless vicissitudes it has undergone, has from its origin to the present hour continued a separate people, whose career is capable of being distinctly traced. It is the only nation, besides, which can with certainty point to the family, and even the precise individual, from whom they originated. They claim to be descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—a claim which is established by the pen of inspiration, and has never for a moment been doubted. And to put their descent beyond the reach of question, they bear about with them a standing memorial of it in the ordinance of circumcision.

From its very origin, the nation of Israel, as it is called, in more ancient times, was separated from other nations for a special and most important purpose, that from them might spring the Saviour of the world. And to bring about this great result, a special providence evidently watched over them. The promise given to Abraham in regard to this nation, which was to descend from him, was renewed to Isaac and to Jacob. The family of Jacob, by the overruling providence of God, obtained a residence in Egypt, until they became a great nation. After dwelling in Egypt upwards of four centuries, they were delivered by the instrumentality of Moses, and being conducted in their forty years' journey through the wilderness by the special guidance of their covenant-God, they were landed safely in Canaan under the care of Joshua. We are informed in the Sacred Scriptures, that 430 years elapsed from the call of Abraham to the deliverance from Egypt, and during the first 215, the Israelites had increased to only 70, or as Stephen the martyr, following the Septuagint, asserts, 75 souls, but during the latter half of the same period, they had multiplied to more than 600,000 fighting men, or including the aged, the women, and the children, to probably upwards of 2,000,000.

There appears to have been a succession of twelve kings during the time the Israelites were residing in Egypt, and it is not a little remarkable that an ancient historian mentions the ninth king of this series to have been the head of a new dynasty or race of kings. A revolution had happened in the country. A new family had ascended the throne, and as might have been expected in the case of an entire change of government, it is said of the Pharaoh who then reigned, that "he knew not Joseph." Not that he was wholly ignorant of the wise and wonderful policy by which Joseph had consolidated the power of the Egyptian monarchs, but the meaning of the expression seems to be, that he held in no esteem the name and the services of so eminent a benefactor to his country. Joseph having been the servant of a different family from that which now ruled, all his wise and well-laid schemes for the advancement of the country's welfare were viewed with an evil eye by the stranger who had intruded himself into the throne of the Pharaohs. He knew not Joseph, nor did he regard with any favour the nation to which Joseph belonged, but summoning an assembly of the Egyptian people, he laid before them the danger which, in his view, threatened the country from the enormous increase of the Israelites. The new monarch began to tremble for the stability of his throne. The Israelites had gone down to Egypt, and risen there to a high degree of prosperity under a different race of kings from that which now reigned. The most fertile part of the country had been assigned to them, and the wealth and influence which they had acquired were such as might well excite the jealousy and the fears of an usurper. But the language in which the king speaks of their numbers and power shows the extent of his own fears, rather than the real state of the Israelitish people. "Behold the people," says he, "of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we." Such language was evidently exaggerated, but he dreaded lest by their numbers and their energy they should bring about a counter-revolution and deprive him of his kingdom. They had hitherto been a peaceful and inoffensive race of shepherds, who reckoned themselves mere temporary sojourners in a strange land, and therefore, they were not likely to interfere in the political arrangements of the country. But the policy of the monarch evidently was to find an excuse for oppressing a people, whose religion he hated, whose prosperity he envied, and whose wealth he coveted. Besides, it is not at all unlikely, from various incidental remarks which occur in the Old Testament history, that the Israelites were at this period beginning to be reconciled to, and actually to imitate, the idolatry of the Egyptians. Thus it is stated in Josh. xxiv. 14, "Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth: and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and serve ye the Lord." In these circumstances it is not surprising that they were subjected to severe trials, and in all probability the Egyptian monarch was made an instrument in the hand of God to chastise his erring people.

The obvious design of the king of Egypt in oppressing the Israelites was to afflict and impoverish them, to break down their spirits, and to check their rapid increase. Accordingly, they were now reduced to a state of slavery, as complete as the Fel-lahs of modern Egypt, and they were declared to be the absolute property of the crown. The whole of the male population were doomed to toil at public works under severe Egyptian taskmasters, who are represented on the Egyptian monuments, armed with long whips, and driving bands of Hebrew slaves like cattle in the fields. They were compelled to dig clay from the banks of the Nile, to make bricks, and to build cities walled and fortified for the safe keeping of the royal stores. The Egyptian king and his people, however, were completely disappointed in their attempts to weaken and dispirit the Israelites, and thus to prevent their increase. In the midst of the cruel oppression to which they were exposed, they continued daily to grow in numbers, and their enemies, inwardly grieved at the advancing prosperity of this wonderful people, resolved to adopt still more relentless modes of oppression. "They made them to serve with rigour, and made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar or in clay, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field," or in all kinds of agricultural labour. Such means, however, of preventing the increase of the Israelites were completely defeated; and the Egyptian tyrant finding himself unsuccessful in his first scheme of open violence, resorts to a secret stratagem by which he hoped to accomplish his unhallowed purpose. He issued a cruel order that every Hebrew male child should be thrown into the Nile. This barbarous and inhuman edict extended to the Hebrew families indiscriminately, and it is painful to think what deeds of horror must have been perpetrated in execution of the royal mandate. Many a mother's heart must have been torn with deepest anguish when her helpless babe was ruthlessly snatched from her arms, and without mercy consigned to the waters of the sacred river. To what extent the bloody statute was executed, or how long it was in force, we are not informed; but during the currency of its operation, Moses, the deliverer of Israel, was born. He was the son of Amram and Jochebed, and it would appear that some extraordinary impression rested on the minds of his parents as to the future greatness of their child. It is said, "his mother saw him that he was a goodly child;" and the word which the martyr Stephen uses in describing him is a very strong one, "he was fair to God, or divinely fair." The apostle, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, calls him "a proper child," being the same word as is employed by Stephen, meaning "a fair child." Josephus also speaks in highly coloured language of the beauty of Moses. There can be no doubt, therefore, that there had been something peculiarly attractive in the outward appearance of the child which operated powerfully in leading his parents to use all efforts for the preservation of his life. The prevailing motive, however, which actuated the godly parents of Moses, was faith in the Divine promises. Some have supposed that they were favoured with an express revelation from heaven in reference to the preservation of their son. But it is quite unnecessary to make any such supposition, the promises in which they believed being, in all probability, those which referred to the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. A very general expectation existed among the Hebrews, about the period of the birth of Moses, that the termination of their bondage was drawing near, and his parents, in all probability, indulged the fond hope that their child, from his peculiar appearance, was destined to be the future deliverer of their countrymen. Hence they resolved to conceal the child, and "were not afraid of the king's commandment." Thus for three months they contrived to evade the cruel edict, but knowing that any plan of concealment could only be temporary, they at length came to the resolution, guided, no doubt, by heavenly wisdom, to cast their child upon the overruling Providence and ever watchful care of their covenant God. They formed an ark of bulrushes, in which they placed the child, and having secured the frail bark by daubing it within with slime, and without with pitch, they prepared to commit it to the waters of the sacred river. The joyful festival of the Nile was drawing near. Towards the beginning of July the expectations of the inhabitants of Egypt are turned towards the river in the anxious hope that it will rise to a sufficient height to overflow its banks and fertilize the country. The gradual rise of the river is eagerly watched and carefully measured, and when it has reached a certain height, a jubilee is held throughout the land. Egyptians of all ranks and classes repair in companies with music and dancing to the banks of the river and bathe in its waters—a practice which was in ancient times invariably attended with various idolatrous rites and ceremonies. It was on some such occasion that the parents of Moses deposited the ark, in which lay the infant Moses, among the flags or thick reeds which abound on the banks of Egypt's precious river. Among those who came to bathe in the river at this joyful season was the daughter of the king, who providentially rescued the child, and thus Moses was reared amid all the refinements and luxuries of a palace. He was educated also in the wisdom and knowledge of the Egyptians, and thus fitted for the arduous, important, and responsible office which in course of time he was destined to fill.

The time was rapidly approaching when the Lord was to visit his people and rescue them from Egyptian bondage. He remembered the covenant which he had made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and mercifully interposed to accomplish for them a glorious deliverance. By ten successive displays of judgment he made known his power in the sight of Pharaoh and his people, and brought out the Israelites from the land of bondage with their whole substance, not one hoof being left behind. During the forty years which elapsed between their deliverance by the hand of Moses, and their safe entrance into Canaan, they experienced many signal interpositions of the Divine Providence in their behalf. But of all the events which compose the history of this important period, the most remarkable, without doubt, was the giving of the law from Mount Sinai directly from the mouth of God, and its inscription afterwards by the finger of God on two tables of stone. Israel was thus constituted the depository of the Divine law, and Moses invested with the high honour of being the lawgiver. In connection with the exalted privilege thus bestowed upon God's favoured people and their distinguished leader, may be mentioned another remarkable arrangement of Providence in the erection of the Tabernacle, and the establishment of the numerous institutions of the ceremonial law, all of which were obviously designed to constitute a distinct line of separation between the nation of Israel and the other nations of the earth, besides preparing them for the coming of the expected Messiah, by keeping constantly before their minds the great truth that without shedding of blood there is no remission.

Once established in the Promised Land, the Israelites were marked out from all the other nations of the earth by a rigid adherence to the worship of the one living and true God. The land of Israel, it has been well said, was at that time the only lucid spot, for darkness covered the earth and gross darkness the people. In this respect the Israelites long continued to maintain the most exemplary character, manifesting the utmost abhorrence of idolatry in all its forms. The sacred historian, accordingly, has placed on record the pleasing statement, that "Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, and who had known all the works of the Lord that he had done for Israel." Under the Judges, however, they maintained more familiar intercourse with the remnant of the idolatrous nations that was left among them, and were thus led to turn aside to the worship of false gods. The consequence was, that they were frequently exposed to the Divine chastisements through the instrumentality of the neighbouring nations, by whom they were again and again oppressed and brought low; but no sooner did they repent and seek to return to the Lord than they were straightway delivered. For a time they were under the charge of the prophet Samuel, during which they acknowledged no king but God. But when, in his old age, Samuel committed the management of the national affairs to his sons, the people became extensively dissatisfied, and entreated that a king should be appointed to rule over them as in the other nations round about them. With the conduct of Israel in this matter God was much displeased, regarding their desire for a king as in fact amounting to a rejection of God as their king. He granted their petition, but in anger, that they might be convinced by their own experience of the folly as well as sinfulness of their request. Under the government of Saul they had ample reason to repent of the choice they had made.

A new and a brighter era in the history of Israel now commenced. Under the reigns of David and Solomon the nation attained a higher degree of prosperity than it has ever reached either before or since. Not only did they triumph over their enemies, and enjoy outward peace and security, but they were signally blessed with a great revival of religion throughout the land. David was the sweet psalmist of Israel, and both he and Solomon wrote some of the most precious portions of Holy Scripture. The reign of the latter monarch was marked by a most important event, the building and dedication of the Jewish temple. In the following reign, that of Rehoboam, the kingdom was rent into two parts, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin adhering to Rehoboam, the son and legitimate successor of Solomon; and the other ten tribes erecting a new and independent kingdom under Jeroboam, who headed a rebellion against the lawful monarch. To prevent his subjects from returning to Judah, Jeroboam set up idols at the two extremities of the country, Dan and Beersheba, thus commencing his reign with an act of rebellion against the God of Israel. A kingdom thus founded in the worship of dumb idols was not likely to prosper. Accordingly, in the long catalogue of its kings, not one is to be found who feared the Lord and sought faithfully to serve him. Yet the Lord had still a remnant even in this apostate kingdom. Even in the house of Jeroboam there was a young Abijah, in whom there was some good thing towards the Lord God of Israel. Of the people there were seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal. The prophets Elijah and Elisha were sent to warn them of coming judgments, but they set at nought all their warnings, and in the reign of Hoshea, Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, invaded the country, took Samaria, the capital of the kingdom, and carried the great body of the people into captivity.

The kingdom of Judah survived that of Israel some years; and although their line of kings is disfigured by the names of many who encouraged idolatry and iniquity, yet there were some, as for example, Jehoshaphat, Josiah, and Hezekiah, who sought to reform abuses, and to establish the worship of the true God throughout the land. Under such exemplary princes there was no doubt a temporary revival of religion, but in a short time the people relapsed into idolatry; so that, after repeated warnings by the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, invaded Judah in the reign of Zedekiah, took Jerusalem, and carried the king, the nobles, and the great body of the people captives to Babylon, where for seventy long years they hung their harps upon the willows, and wept when they remembered Zion.

On their return from Babylon, the Jews rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem amid much opposition from the Samaritans, and a remarkable revival of religion took place, as we learn from the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. About this time, by Divine appointment, arrangements were made, under the direction of Ezra, for the more extended diffusion among the people of a knowledge of the Scriptures. For this purpose the Levites were distributed through the country, and employed themselves in reading and expounding the Word of God on the Sabbath-days. It is supposed, too, that, about this time, synagogues were erected for public worship; and the Scriptures were collected in one volume to be kept by the priests as a precious deposit. Yet, notwithstanding the religious advantages which were thus increasingly bestowed upon them, we learn from Malachi, the last of the Old Testament prophets, that a time of great degeneracy had come upon them, and his closing prophecy is wholly dedicated to reproofs for their wickedness, exhortations to repent of their sins, and warnings of coming judgments. Nearly four hundred years elapsed between the time of Malachi and the coming of Christ, during which the voice of prophecy was no longer heard, and the Jews passed through a lengthened period of darkness, and oppression, and sore persecution at the hand of their enemies. So severe and protracted, indeed, were the trials to which they were at this time exposed, that had they not been watched over by a special Providence they would certainly have been exterminated from the earth. This was remarkably exemplified at an earlier period, in the memorable deliverance which was wrought for them by the instrumentality of Mordecai and Queen Esther; and another signal instance of the Divine interposition in behalf of the Jews occurred about fifty years after the days of Malachi. Alexander the Great, in prosecuting his ambitious conquests in Asia, advanced with a numerous army to lay siege to Jerusalem. The Jews had no forces sufficiently large to defend themselves against so formidable an enemy. In this extremity they committed themselves to the care of Jehovah, Israel's God, and the high priest, arrayed in his priestly robes, and attended by a large company of priests dressed in white, set out from Jerusalem to meet Alexander at the head of his army. As the procession drew near the warrior dismounted, and prostrating himself before the high priest, declared that before he left Macedon he saw in a dream a person dressed like the high priest, who had encouraged him to come over and assist in the conquest of Persia. Immediately Alexander gave up all thoughts of besieging Jerusalem, and accompanying the priests in peaceful procession into the city, he offered up sacrifices according to the law through the ministrations of the high priest. Alexander's attention was then called to a remarkable passage in the prophecy of Daniel, where it is foretold that a prince of Grecia should overturn the kingdom of Persia. This the Macedonian conqueror rightly interpreted, as referring to himself, and ever after cherished a great respect for the Jewish people. The reign of Alexander was of short duration, extending to little more than six years; and having no son to succeed him, four of his principal officers divided his dominions among themselves. In this division Seleucus obtained Babylon and Syria. The successor of Seleucus was Antiochus Epiphanes, who entertained a bitter hatred of the Jews. He took the city of Jerusalem, massacred thousands of the inhabitants, and taking away great numbers of them as captives, compelled them by torture to renounce their own religion, and worship the heathen gods. Many of the Jews, however, submitted to torture, and even to death, rather than disclaim the worship of the true God. In these trying circumstances God was pleased to raise up for them a deliverer in the person of Judas Maccabeus, through whose instrumentality Judea became an independent kingdom, the temple was purged from idols, and the worship of the true God restored. So firm a standing did the Jews thus obtain in their own country, that neighbouring nations sought their alliance. Even the Romans, who were at that time rising in national greatness, formed a league with the Jews. In this state of independence, with the high priest as their civil as well as spiritual ruler, the Jews continued for about a century, when they once more became the tributaries of a foreign nation. By the victorious arms of Pompey, a Roman general, the city of Jerusalem was captured, and the Jews compelled to submit to the Roman yoke. This event happened about B. C. 63. Herod, usually styled the Great, the last king of Judea, was a foreigner, being an Idumean by birth, and was permitted by the Romans to exercise royal authority over the Jews. It was this prince who ruled in Judea when our blessed Lord was born, and at that time he displayed his barbarous cruelty and inhumanity in the massacre of the children at Bethlehem. At the death of Herod, which happened soon after, Judea became a province of the Roman empire, thus fulfilling the prophetic declaration of Jacob, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and to him shall the gathering of the people be."

On the death of Herod, Palestine was divided amongst his three surviving sons—Archelaus, Antipas, and Philip. Archelaus was appointed ethnarch, or governor of Judea, Idumea, and Samaria, which formed the largest part of the province. Antipas was named tetrarch of Galilee, and Philip tetrarch of Trachonitis. Archelaus was deposed by the Roman Emperor Augustus, in consequence of repeated complaints from his subjects, and a Roman governor appointed in his room, subordinate to the prefect of Syria. Various governors of the same description succeeded, and among these Pontius Pilate was the first who took up his residence in Jerusalem, all the rest having dwelt in Casarea. "The condition of the Jews," says Dr. Welsh, "under the Roman governors was miserable in the extreme. The extortions of the publicans, whose office it was to collect the revenue, were excessive; and the whole of their proceedings was vexatious and oppressive. It was vain to hope for redress from the governors, whose avarice and injustice were proverbially great. The very fact of paying tribute to a heathen government was felt to be an intolerable grievance. And the Roman soldiers, quartered over the whole country, though they prevented a general insurrection, yet, by their very presence, and by the ensigns of their authority, exasperated the minds of the Jewish people, and led to many tumults, and seditions, and murders. A numerous party existed in Judea, whose religious prejudices were opposed to the idea of paying taxes to a foreign power, and who cherished the vain hope of restoring the Jewish kingdom. Attempts were made by different individuals, and particularly by Judas the Gaulonite, to instigate the Jews to a general revolt, which were repressed as they arose. But the fanatical principles were widely spread, and led to excesses to which, in no small degree, may be ascribed the final destruction of Jerusalem. The party was distinguished by the name of Zealots."

The clouds, betokening a storm of insurrection against the Roman authority, were evidently gathering in the time of Pilate, and they were nearly bursting forth under Caligula, who endeavoured to compel the Jews to profane the temple by placing his statue in it. It was under Gessius Florus, however, that the Jews broke out into open rebellion; and, under Nero, those wars arose between Rome and Judea which terminated, A. D. 70, in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. Josephus tells us that the Roman general, standing on the ruins of the demolished city, exclaimed in triumph, "It is, in truth, a god who has given us the victory, and driven the Jews from a position from which no human power could ever have dislodged them." The same Jewish historian relates that the enormous number of 1,100,000 men perished during this fatal war. An immense number of prisoners, men, women, and children, were either sold into slavery, crucified, or thrown to wild beasts.

Three days before the close of the memorable year on which Jerusalem and its temple were destroyed by the hands of the Romans, the Emperor Vespasian and his son Titus entered Rome in triumph, clothed in purple, and crowned with laurel, and, amid the acclamations of a delighted people, they made their way to the Temple of Victory. Among the proud trophies which were borne along in the procession were the sacred vessels of the Jewish temple, the golden table, the seven-branched candlestick of gold, and the book of the law of Moses. A temple was dedicated to the goddess of peace, in honour of this joyful day, and a medal was struck representing Judea as a weeping female resting her head on her hand at the foot of a palm-tree, while the fierce Roman soldier stands by unmoved. The marble arch of Titus still remains to us at Rome, having survived the desolations of eighteen centuries, and exhibiting a faithful representation, among other objects, of the holy vessels of the temple. "Even to this day," says Dr. Da Costa, himself a converted Israelite, "the Jews in every country of their exile and dispersion have continued to observe the 9th day of the month Ab in memorial of both the first and second destruction of their city and sanctuary. Next to the great day of atonement, it is the most strictly kept of their fasts. Even the day before, the pious Israelite takes nothing beyond what absolute necessity requires: he seats himself on the ground, either at home or in the synagogue, by the dim light of a small candle, and the evening service commences with the 138th Psalm:—'By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept.' Mourful and penitential psalms are chanted in succession throughout the day, especially the Lamentations of Jeremiah, of which so many striking features, once fulfilled in the taking of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, were still more signally accomplished in its destruction by the Romans."

Thus closed the history of the ancient Jews, one of the most eventful, interesting, and instructive which the records of the world's history anywhere contains.

JEWS (MODERN). The period of transition, we conceive, from the history of the ancient to that of the modern Jews is the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans A.D. 70, and the consequent dispersion of the Jews. Nothing worthy of notice occurred in the history of this remarkable people for nearly forty years after the destruction of their city. The ruins of Jerusalem were occupied by a Roman garrison, to prevent any attempt being made to rebuild it; but, though excluded from the holy city, large communities of Jews were gradually formed in different parts of the country. And even in Jerusalem itself, the towers of Hippicus, Phasaël, and Mariamme, the only three which remained standing out of the ninety towers which formerly guarded its walls, became again strongholds of the Jews.

At the end of half a century after the destruction of Jerusalem, we find the whole of Judea in a state of rebellion. The leader of this revolt was a false Messiah called Barcochab, attended by his companion or prophet Alkiba. In the reign of the Emperor Trajan, the Jews began to give fresh signs of a determination to resist the authority of the Romans, particularly those Jews who resided on the coast of the Mediterranean, in Cyprus, Egypt, and Cyrene. The insurrection spread to the banks of the Euphrates, when Trajan hastened to Antioch, with the view of checking its progress, but, being seized with sudden illness, he died on his way to Rome. Adrian, who succeeded him, quelled the disturbances among the Jews of Asia and of Egypt; but in the latter years of his reign a fresh revolt of the Jews took place in Palestine. This event was no doubt hastened on by the injudicious conduct of Adrian himself, who passed a decree that Jerusalem should be made a Roman colony under the name of Ælia Capitolina, and that circumcision, the distinctive Jewish rite, should be prohibited. The smouldering flame of discontent among the Jews now burst into a furious conflagration. Thousands flocked to Bethlhoron from all parts, and hailed Barcocheba as their Prince and Messiah of the house of David. Thus constituted the leader of a numerous host, the impostor advanced into Syria, persecuted the Christians, and took possession of Jerusalem, where he changed the form of the Samaritan coins, adding his own name to them, with the title of Nasi or Prince. The contest continued for nearly four years, and at length the Romans were successful; and about A.D. 134, Judea was again made desolate, about half a million having fallen by the sword in the course of the war, besides those who perished by fire, famine, and sickness. Those who escaped were reduced to slavery by thousands. The remnant was transported into Egypt, and Palestine was left almost without an inhabitant. The Jews were now prohibited from entering Jerusalem, or even looking upon it from a distance; and the city now called Ælia was inhabited only by Gentiles, or such Christians as renounced the Jewish ceremonies.

Jerusalem being now a Roman town, and no longer the metropolis of the Jewish religion, Tiberias was fixed upon as the head-quarters of the Jews, and there they first drew up the Mishna or oral law. Christianity had now taken the place of Judaism in the chief places of the Holy Land. Ælia Capitolina became the seat of a Christian bishop, who, in course of time, received the appellation of the Bishop of Jerusalem. Helena, the mother of Constantine, founded Christian churches at Bethlehem and on the Mount of Olives, besides thirty other churches which the same Empress is said to have erected in different parts of Palestine. In the reign of Julian the Apostate, the city of Jerusalem was again brought into notice, in connection with a strange proposal which this heathen Emperor made to the Jews, that they should join him in the impious attempt to belie the prophecies of Scripture by rebuilding the Temple. Ammianus Marcellinus, a historian of the period, informs us, that to accomplish this great work Jews assembled from all quarters in Jerusalem, and in festival garments, with richly ornamented tools, commenced digging the foundations of the new sanctuary; but while thus employed, balls of fire suddenly issued from beneath the ground, accompanied with an earthquake and violent hurricanes of wind, which compelled them to desist from the prosecution of their work; and the death of Julian in A.D. 410 put an end to all thoughts of resuming it. Under the long series of Christian Emperors who succeeded Julian, Jerusalem became the scene of innumerable pilgrimages, and centuries after, the possession of the sepulchre of Christ and of the other holy places by the Mohammedans, gave rise to the CRUSADES (which see).

In the year A. D. 636, Jerusalem passed into the hands of the followers of the false prophet, and Omar founded a mosque on Mount Moriah. Charlemagne, however, Emperor of the West, received from the Caliph, Al-Raschid, the keys of the Holy Sepulchre; but no long time elapsed when they were resumed by the Mohammedan powers of Asia, against whom for centuries the Crusaders fought with desperate valour, though with varied success, commencing their expedition usually with a massacre of the Jews, and when they succeeded in taking Jerusalem, they uniformly signaled their triumph by the murder of all the Jews who might happen to be resident in the city. In 1516, the Holy City was once more retaken by the Ottomans under Selim I., and from that time to the present it has continued to form a part of the Pashalic of Damascus. "Truly imposing," says Da Costa, "is the aspect which the city now presents! Its buildings, its ruins, and its memorials, connected with so many people, periods, and hallowed associations! The mosque of Omar now stands where once was raised the temple of Solomon. David's tomb remains, beside a convent of Minorites. The site of Herod's Palace and the traditional abode of Pontius Pilate are still pointed out, while we must not entirely overlook the residence of the Protestant Bishop of Jerusalem, and the English Church, in which its own services are read in the Hebrew tongue. The Mahometans, Christians, and Jews have each their separate quarter; here, as elsewhere, the most despised and miserable belongs to the Jews. Yes! even in the city of their kings, the children of the kingdom are cast into outer darkness."

It is remarkable that the Jews have continued to preserve their national character, though they have lost their city and their temple, and so completely have they been scattered and peeled, that they have not a country they can call their own. They carry about with them the outward sign of their descent from Abraham, which no tyrannical prohibition, no cruel persecution, has ever prevailed upon them to forego. Constituted of old the custodiers of the sacred oracles, they have scrupulously maintained their adherence to the Hebrew Scriptures, and though by Rabbinical comments and glosses they have, in too many instances, perverted the meaning, they have ever entertained the most scrupulous regard to the integrity of the text. No sooner had they been driven from Jerusalem, than the great council of the Israelitish Rabbins was established at Tiberias in Galilee. Thence issued the two great storehouses of Rabbinical lore, first the Mishna, and afterwards the Talmud, being, as the Jews allege, the oral law, received by Moses from the mouth of God, during the forty days which he spent on Mount Sinai. This oral law was transmitted by Moses to Joshua, and conveyed down from generation to generation. A complete collection of all the oral or traditional commandments was made about A. D. 190, by Rabbi Judah the Holy. It is composed of six treatises, called the Mishna, which has received many additions and commentaries from the later Rabbins, under the name of the Gemara. The Mishna or text of the oral law, combined with the Gemara or commentaries, form together the Talmuds, the more ancient of which is the Jerusalem Talmud, completed in Palestine towards the end of the third century; while the later is the Babylonian Talmud, compiled in the schools of Babylon and Persia, in the commencement of the seventh century. Thus the religion of the modern Jews became, like that of the Pharisees in the time of our Lord, a combination of the written with the oral law, both being regarded as of equal authority. The Sadducees who resisted the combination disappeared as a separate sect after the destruction of Jerusalem; and with the exception of the small sect of the CARAITES (which see), the Jews to this day, those of them at least who have not embraced infidelity, are rigid adherents of the Talmud. In addition to the Talmud, however, there are two other works of Jewish tradition, the one called the Masora, and the other the Cabbala, both of which are regarded by the modern Jews as of great importance in establishing the meaning of the Old Testament writings.

The history of the modern Jews, or those of the Dispersion, may be handled under a twofold division, that of the Asiatic or Eastern, and that of the European or Western Jews. The question as to the "Captivity of the East," as it is termed by the Rabbins, has given rise to much fruitless discussion. The two classes of Jews now to be considered have been almost uniformly for many centuries the victims of incessant oppression and injustice at the hands of the people among whom they have been scattered.

From the reign of Adrian to that of Constantine, the Jews enjoyed a season not merely of rest from persecution, but of actual prosperity. In many cases they were treated with the utmost favour by the heathen Emperors as an offset to the Christians, who were of course hated alike by the Jews and the heathens. During the ten persecutions of the Christians in the Roman Empire, the Jews looked on with complacency, and even triumph, at the barbarous cruelties inflicted on the followers of the Nazarene; and it afforded them no small satisfaction to see the hated Christians taking shelter in the catacombs from the fury of the heathen, while their synagogues were flourishing throughout every part of the land of Edom, and their schools at Jamnia and Tiberias were rising in influence and authority every day.

With the establishment of Christianity under Constantine, however, a remarkable change took place in the condition of the Jews. Formerly, their intense hatred of Christianity was a passport with the Roman emperors to places of trust and authority, but now that the emperors had themselves become Christian, the Jews became a condemned and persecuted sect. The elevation of Julian the Apostate to the imperial throne gave them some slight hope of the restoration of brighter days, but the death of Julian, after a short reign, disappointed all their expectations. The Christian emperors who succeeded afforded the Jews entire toleration to observe their ceremonies, their feasts, and their Sabbaths, secured to them their property, their slaves, and their lands, but at the same time called upon the Christians to hold no intercourse with them, and to be on their guard against the doctrines of the synagogue. In the fifth century, the Jews throughout the Roman Empire, both in its eastern and western divisions, were not only deprived of toleration, but exposed to injurious and cruel treatment. But in the reign of Justin, and that of Justinian, Jewish oppression received the sanction of law. Justin passed an edict A. D. 523, prohibiting all Jews, Samaritans, and Pagans, from holding office in the State; while Justinian in his Code, as well as in his Novels, excluded the Jews from all civil rights, and any attempt at proselytism was declared a capital crime. The result of such oppressive enactments was a series of successive insurrections on the part of the Jews, which disturbed Justinian throughout his whole reign. The most violent of these outbreaks was caused at Constantinople by the sight of the holy vessels which had been carried by Titus from Jerusalem to Rome, and had found their way to the capital of the Greek Empire. To quell this tumult, which was of a very serious description, Justinian sent the holy vessels from Constantinople to Jerusalem, and, from whatever cause, they have never been heard of since that time.

The Jews, soon after the dispersion, and the consequent destruction of their whole ecclesiastical polity, longed for the restoration of some degree of order and government. This led to the institution of the Jewish patriarchs, the first of whom was Simeon, the third, who lived in the reign of Adrian. In his family the line of patriarchs continued until the fifth century, when they began so to pervert their office, that a law was passed by the Emperor Theodosius to restrict their power; and this proving ineffectual, the patriarchal dignity, in A. D. 429, was wholly abolished, and thus, as Da Costa remarks, "the link was broken which connected the different synagogues of the Eastern Empire." About this time an extensive emigration of learned Jews, devoted to the study of the Talmud, took place from Palestine and the Byzantine Empire to Babylonia and Persia—a circumstance which led to the compilation of the Babylonian Talmud.

The rise of the Mohammedan power in Asia in the seventh century led to the severe oppression and degradation of the Jews in the East. Previous to that period, the Jews in Arabia seem to have been numerous, powerful, and free. It is even asserted that there existed at one time in that peninsula a Jewish kingdom under Jewish kings; and even so late as the sixth century, a Jewish king reigned in Arabia. When Mohammed first commenced his mission as a prophet, he seems to have met with some countenance from the Arabian Jews, who may possibly have supposed him to be the Messiah. But, in the course of a few years, they began to entertain unfavourable views of the prophet, and from that time he looked upon them with the most bitter hatred, stigmatizing them as "unbelievers," and "murderers of the prophets," and applying to them similar opprobrious epithets. Accordingly, there has existed a strong feeling of enmity down to the present day between the Mussulman and the Jew. And yet it is impossible to read the pages of the Koran without being struck with the close connection which may be traced between its doctrines and those of modern Judaism, as developed in the Talmud and the Jewish traditions.

After the capture and destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the Jews emigrated in great numbers to the coasts of the Red Sea, so that cities and even entire districts belonged to them. They waged war and negotiated treaties with their neighbours, and were fast rising into political importance in Arabia; but from the seventh century, when Mohammed promulgated his religion, they gradually sunk in influence and power; and though considerable numbers of them are still found in that country, they are held in great contempt among the Mohammedans. Colonies of Jews have long existed in the most remote parts of the interior of Asia and on the coast of Malabar. There is also a peculiar race of Jews in the neighbourhood of Bombay, who call themselves BENI-ISRAEL (which see), but claim no relationship with the rest of the Jews in Eastern countries; and while they strictly adhere to the chief portions of the Jewish ritual, they have also mingled Hindu superstitions with their religious observances. These Beni-Israel Dr. Wilson of Bombay considers to be probably descendants of the Ten Tribes. The Chinese Jews are numerous, and are supposed to have originally settled in the Celestial Empire between the time of Ezra and the destruction of the second temple. This is confirmed by the fact, that they hold Ezra in as great veneration as Moses, and appear to be quite ignorant of the Pharisaical traditions of the Talmud. They are called by the Chinese "the people that cut out the sinew;" and a great number of them seem to have exchanged Judaism for the religion of the Koran.

The Jews have almost always in Europe been a despised, oppressed, and persecuted people. Thus, by the Council of Vannes, A. D. 465, Christians were forbidden to eat with Jews. Some years later, the Council of Orleans prohibited marriage between Jews and Christians. The Council of Beziers, A. D. 1246, refused permission to consult a Jewish physician. For centuries there existed in France a public officer called the "Protector of the Jews," who was chosen from among the nobles of the land, and who, in some cases, instead of being the friend, was the bitter enemy of the very people whom he was appointed to defend. In the south of France, trade was for a long period chiefly in the hands of the Jews, yet they were, all the while, regarded as the outcasts of society. At Toulouse, so late as the thirteenth century, a Jew was compelled to receive in Easter week every year a blow on the face before the doors of the principal church. At Beziers, the bishop yearly, on Palm Sunday, exhorted the people to avenge the death of the Saviour upon the Jews of the place; and after the year 1160, exemption from this insult was purchased by the payment of an annual sum of money. It is a strange circumstance, however, that in no part of France did Hebrew learning flourish more than in the south. Montpellier, Marseilles, Narbonne, Beziers, and other towns, were celebrated for their synagogues and academies, as well as for their Rabbinical writers, commentators, and grammarians. The Jews have never been found in great numbers in Norway, Sweden, and Denmark; but in all the other countries of Europe, they have existed amid much discouragement and persecution down to the present day.

The Jews who were banished from Spain in A. D. 1492, and from Portugal in A. D. 1497, are known by the name of Sephardim, or Spaniards, and maintain their identity as a separate class of Jews among their own brethren in all parts of the world. They look upon themselves as a higher order of Israelites. One peculiar point of distinction which marks them out from other Jews, is their daily use of the old Spanish language, which is handed down from generation to generation, and with which they are so familiar, that their own Scriptures are better known to them in the old Spanish version than in the original Hebrew. Down to the commencement of the present century, the Sephardim used both the Spanish and the Hebrew tongues in the daily intercourse of life, in their private correspondence, and even in the public worship of the synagogue, excepting what was included in the Liturgy. The Sephardim look back upon the history of their ancestors during the fourteen centuries of their residence as exiles in the Spanish peninsula with the most romantic interest. "This remarkable people," says Mr. Prescott, "who seem to have preserved their unity of character unbroken amid the thousand fragments into which they have been scattered, attained perhaps to greater consideration in Spain than in any other part of Europe. Under the Visigothic Empire the Jews multiplied exceedingly in the country, and were permitted to acquire considerable power and wealth. After the Saracenic invasion, which the Jews, perhaps with reason, are accused of having facilitated, they resided in the conquered cities, and were permitted to mingle with the Arabs on nearly equal terms. Their common Oriental origin produced a similarity of tastes, to a certain extent not unfavourable to such a coalition. At any rate, the early Spanish Arabs were characterized by a spirit of toleration towards both Jews and Christians—the people of the book,' as they were called—which has scarcely been found among later Moslems. The Jews, accordingly, under these favourable auspices, not only accumulated wealth with their usual diligence, but gradually rose to the highest civil dignity, and made great advances in various departments of letters. The schools of Cordova, Toledo, Barcelona, and Granada, were crowded with numerous disciples, who emulated the Arabians in keeping alive the flame of learning during the deep darkness of the middle ages. Whatever may be thought of their success in speculative philosophy, they cannot reasonably be denied to have contributed largely to practical and experimental science. They were diligent travellers in all parts of the known world, compiling itineraries which have proved of extensive use in later times, and bringing home hoards of foreign specimens and Oriental drugs that furnished important contributions to the domestic pharmacopœia. In the practice of medicine, indeed, they became so expert, as in a manner to monopolize that profession. They made great proficiency in mathematics, and particularly in astronomy; while, in the cultivation of elegant letters, they revived the ancient glories of the Hebrew muse. This was indeed the golden age of modern Jewish literature. The ancient Castilians of the same period, very different from their Gothic ancestors, seem to have conceded to the Israelites somewhat of the feelings of respect which were extorted from them by the superior civilization of the Spanish Arabs. We find eminent Jews residing in the courts of the Christian princes, directing their studies, attending them as physicians, or, more frequently, administering their finances."

The Jews seem to have had a settlement in Spain long before the destruction of the second temple. It is remarkable that this portion of the dispersed of Judah allege that they are descendants of the house of David. Not that they are able to produce any document whereby to establish this claim, for the Israelites, since their dispersion, have not continued their genealogical tables; but their high pretension to be sprung from David is wholly founded on tradition. For many centuries, the Jews carried on the whole traffic of the kingdom of Spain; and members of their body were usually chosen to occupy places of trust and honour at court. As in the East the Jews were governed by the Resh Glutha, or Prince of the Captivity (see ARCHMALOTARCH), so in the Spanish peninsula they were ruled by an Israelite called the Rabbino mayor, who was appointed by the king. This magistrate, who took cognizance of all Jewish affairs, had under him a vice-rabbino mayor, a chancellor, a secretary, and several other officers while two different orders of rabbins, or judges, acted under him in the towns and districts of the kingdom. But the honour in which the Jews were held by the king and the higher orders both in church and state, did not make them altogether free from oppression and persecution. On the contrary, the free burghers, the inferior clergy, and especially the common people, were their inveterate enemies. From time to time the most severe enactments were passed against them, and they were subjected to persecution of every kind.

Nowhere has Hebrew learning been more extensively cultivated than among the Jews of the Peninsula. In early times, and even during the rule of the Saracens, their youth were trained in the famous schools of Babylon and Persia; but at an after period, an entirely new and independent school of Hebrew theology was established in Spain. The circumstances which led to the removal of the seat of modern Jewish science from the East to the West are thus detailed by Da Costa:—"Four learned Israelites of Pumbeditha were in a ship, which was captured by a Moorish pirate from Spain, A. D. 948. One of them, named Rabbi Moses, after having seen his wife cast herself into the sea, to escape the ferocity of the captain, was, with his son, carried prisoner to Cordova. The Israelitish inhabitants of that town soon effected their deliverance by means of a ransom. After remaining some time unnoticed, a learned discussion in the synagogue became the means of raising Rabbi Moses high in the esteem of all, and renewing the interest his fate had before excited. He was soon chosen head of that synagogue and judge of the Jews; and becoming known, while holding this office, to Rabbi Chasdai Ben Isaac, the great protector of his nation, at the court of Miramolin, he obtained in marriage for his son a daughter of the powerful house of Peliag, thus laying a prosperous foundation both for his own descendants and for the Jewish schools of Spain. When the Persian school of the Geonim came to an end in the eleventh century, in the person of Rabbi Hai Bar Rab Scherira, the schools of the Spanish Rabbanim took its place, as the centre of Jewish civilization and learning. Soon Toledo and Seville, then Saragossa, Lisbon, and a great number of other cities, shared in the glory of Cordova. At Toledo alone, the number of students in Hebrew theology is said to have sometimes amounted to twelve thousand; the number is no doubt exaggerated, but the exaggeration itself proves the high idea that was formed of the extent to which the study of Hebrew literature was carried on in the ancient capital of Castile."

Thus the reputed founder of the new school of Hebrew literature at Cordova was Rabbi Moses of Pumbeditha; but the first age or generation of the Spanish Rabbanim did not begin with him, or even with his son, but with Rabbi Samuel Hallevi, surnamed Hanragid, or the Prince, who is considered as the first Rabbino Mayor, or Prince of the Captivity in Spain, A. D. 1027. From that date till the end of the fifteenth century, nine generations of Rabbanim are reckoned, each deriving its name from a head of the synagogue, or some distinguished student of the age.

The most distinguished of all the Spanish Rabbanim were Aben Ezra and Maimonides, both of them gifted with remarkable abilities, learning, and wealth. The first of them, Aben Ezra, usually surnamed Hachacham, the wise, was born at Toledo in the beginning of the twelfth century. He is best known as a commentator on the Old Testament, his labours in this department having been valued not only by Jews, but also by many Christians. Maimonides was a native of Cordova, having been born there in A. D. 1139. He was a voluminous and a versatile writer, his works, which amount to more than thirty in number, being on a great variety of different subjects. The most remarkable of his writings is his Morah Nevochim, or Guide to the Doubtful, a work in which he interprets, with great clearness, the Law and the Talmud. The great aim of Moses Maimonides, in the twelfth century, was, like that of Moses Mendelssohn in the eighteenth century, to find a basis for the principles of traditional Judaism in philosophy rather than in revelation. No sooner were the views of this remarkable man given to the world in the Morah Nevochim, than a cry of heresy was raised both against the book and its author. The synagogues of Spain were now divided into two parties, the one favouring, and the other opposing, the views of Maimonides. His admirers, however, obtained the decided superiority both in numbers and influence; and though Rabbinitism still continued to exercise dominion over the synagogue, the discussions occasioned by the writings of Maimonides tended, in no small degree, to deliver the minds of many Jews from the trammels of traditional authority. Accordingly, about a century after, we find the Rabbins of Spain complaining of the progress of infidelity caused by the influence of Greek philosophy.

The Sephardim or Spanish Jews have not only produced able writers on theological subjects, but also distinguished poets, astronomers, and mathematicians. Amid the honours which they gained, however, in the walks of literature and science, often was the sword of intolerant persecution unsheathed, and the records of the Inquisition in Spain tell us of multitudes of victims belonging to the despised Jews no less than to the Christian heretics. At length, in A. D. 1492, after the reduction of the last Moslem kingdom in the Peninsula, an edict was promulgated for the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, four months being allowed them to prepare for their departure. In vain did they offer immense sums of money to be allowed to remain; they were transported by ships to the coast of Africa. Many of them endured such extremity of suffering that they returned to Spain and renounced the faith of their fathers. Others found an asylum in Portugal, where, in consideration of the payment of a high capitation tax, they were invested with various privileges, being allowed to celebrate their feasts, practice their ceremonies, and continue the full exercise of their religious worship. A Rabbinical school was formed at Lisbon, which soon rose to considerable distinction, and during the five years which elapsed between the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, and their banishment from Portugal, this school became the centre-point of Jewish literature and science. The most distinguished of the Portuguese Jews was Abarbanel, whose fame, as a theological writer, is still cherished among the Jews. In 1497, an edict was published banishing the Jews from Portugal, as they had a few years before been banished from Spain; and from this date the Sephardim were scattered over every quarter of the globe, still, however, preserving their identity separate and apart from all the other races of the Jewish nation. In America, in Africa, in Asia, and many countries of Europe, they found refuge, and enjoyed toleration and peace. But the country which has afforded them the warmest hospitality, since the close of the sixteenth century, has been the Protestant republic of the Low Countries.

The first settlement of the Jews at Amsterdam was made in A. D. 1594, and in the course of four years they erected a synagogue. Ten years after, the increase of the Jewish population led to the formation of a second, and in A. D. 1618 of a third synagogue. In 1639 the three synagogues were united to form one single community of Spanish and Portuguese Jews, which founded, in 1675, a handsome synagogue for the whole body. About the same time the German and Polish Jews had established their synagogues in the capital of Holland. Though excluded from public offices, and also from all guilds or companies, except those of the physicians and brokers, the Israelites were secured in the full possession of liberty of conscience, the free exercise of their religion, the practice of their own laws and traditions, and even, with few exceptions, the observance of their national customs. Among the Jews in Holland there have been various authors and learned men, one of the most noted of whom was Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel, who wrote several exegetical and dogmatical works, besides several books relating to the Jewish Liturgy, the worship of the synagogue and Rabbinical ordinances. Contemporary with this learned author was another man of a strongly speculative turn of mind, Uriel da Costa, who threw off at once all belief in the Divine authority of the Old Testament, and in the traditions of the Rabbins. The appearance of this bold infidel in the synagogue of Amsterdam, and the open avowal of his dangerous doctrines, led to a keen struggle between the modern sect of the Pharisees and that of the Sadducees. In a work which he published explanatory of his opinions, Uriel declared his rejection of all tradition, and his denial of the resurrection of the dead and the life to come. The chief magistrate of Amsterdam deemed it his duty to take cognizance of the matter, and, accordingly, the author was arrested, and the affair was compromised by the payment of 300 florins, and the confiscation of the books. From this time Uriel da Costa became both in opinion and practice an open Deist; but at length, weary of a struggle in which he stood alone, he sought and obtained reconciliation with the synagogue. Again he avowed his deistical opinions, and for seven years he was cast off by his brethren. A second time he sought reconciliation to the synagogue, which was only granted after the infliction upon the unhappy man of the well-known forty stripes save one; and a few days after submitting to this degradation, he put an end to his existence, having previously written his autobiography, which was afterwards published by Limborch.

Another individual of great note among the Jews in Holland was Benedict Spinoza, who, in his theological writings, taught a system of complete Pantheism, not by substituting the whole universe in place of the living God, but by attributing real existence to God alone, and admitting of no other existence, material or immaterial, unless as a modification of that one only Being. This amiable but erring philosopher was a native of Amsterdam, having been born in that city in A. D. 1632. His peculiar opinions were chiefly founded on the writings of Des Cartes (see IDEALISTS), which exercised a remarkable influence on the thinkers of his age. The views which Spinoza had been led to form were completely at variance with those of his fellow-Israelites, and as a natural result he began to neglect the public services of the synagogue, and to dispute with the Rabbins on religious subjects. At length his opinions drew down upon him the censure of his brethren, and he was not only expelled from the synagogue, but he found it necessary, in order to save his life, to fly from Amsterdam, and, after wandering from one place to another, he settled at the Hague. Here he lived in seclusion, but maintaining an extensive correspondence with learned men both in Holland and elsewhere. In the course of a few years he was cut off by consumption.

Next to Amsterdam, nowhere have the Jews been more prosperous than at the Hague. In that city many of the finest houses have been built and inhabited by Jews, and their synagogue is in one of the best quarters of the town. Members both of the German and Portuguese synagogues in Holland were frequently preferred to fill confidential posts in matters of diplomacy; and such has been the respect uniformly shown to the Jews in that country, that till the reign of William V. inclusive, no stadtholder of Holland had ever failed to pay at least one formal visit to each of the great synagogues of Amsterdam.

During the eighteenth century, the Jews in Holland, and indeed throughout the Continent generally, partook of the degeneracy in religion which so extensively prevailed. The infidel literature and philosophy of France exercised a most pernicious influence over both Jews and Gentiles in every country of Europe: while Voltaire and his followers intensely hated the Jews, because the very existence of that people constituted an incontestable proof of the historical truth both of the Old and New Testaments.

The Jews appear to have found an entrance into Russia during the reign of Peter the Great, but they were banished from the country in 1745, for having maintained a correspondence with the exiles of Siberia. They have always, however, kept their ground in Poland as well as in the Ukraine, both of which belong to the government of the Czar. The Polish Jews are looked upon by their brethren in other countries as a superior race, both in intellect and learning. "Nowhere else," says Da Costa, referring to Poland, "do we find in so great a degree, among the dispersed nation, a life of so much social activity combined with a remarkable bent towards religion and contemplative philosophy; nowhere else so wide a separation between science and theology, and, at the same time, such great capacity for scientific knowledge; nowhere else such deep national debasement, resulting from ages of ignoble occupation and servile subjection, with a character so highly respectable, both in its moral qualities and domestic relations: in a word, nowhere do so many remains of ancient nobility, and, at the same time, of the most wretched degeneracy, appear even in the expression of countenance and stature of body. These singular and original characteristics of the Polish Jew are to be found, not only in the mystic theosophy which usually distinguishes their schools and their theologians, but even in the existence of Caraites amidst these synagogues, in other respects buried, if we may so express it, in the study of the Talmud." In the synagogues of Poland, the Jewish sect of the SABBATHAISTS (which see), found many supporters; and in the same synagogues the CHASIDIM (which see), had their origin in 1740.

An Anti-Talmudic sect sprung up among the Polish Jews, originated in 1760 by Jacob Frank. This new Jewish sect completely cast off the Talmud, and adopted the Cabbalistic book of Zohar as the basis of its confession of faith, and hence they assumed to themselves the name of ZOHARITES (which see). They plainly declared their belief in the doctrine of the Trinity. At first the followers of Frank were looked upon as belonging to the Christian rather than to the Jewish faith, and they were persecuted by the synagogue for their Christian dogmas. In a short time, however, they were persecuted, on the contrary, by the Roman Catholic church, on account of their Jewish Cabbalistic views. In these critical circumstances, exposed to the hostility both of Christians and Jews, many of the Zoharites emigrated to Turkey, where they were treated with the utmost harshness and cruelty by the populace. Frank, with whom the sect originated, entertained many sentiments approaching to Christianity, and he considered that he had received a mission to unite together all religions, sects, and confessions. His followers no longer form a separate denomination, but numbers of them still exist in Poland, belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, though distinguished by certain remains of Judaism, and some of them secretly retaining a firm belief in the religion of the synagogue. They are said to have taken a share in the Polish insurrection in 1830, and it has even been asserted that the chief of the Frankists was a member of the Diet of Poland, and afterwards obliged to take refuge as a political exile in France.

But while the Jews in the southern and eastern parts of Europe were agitated by the prevalence among them of Cabbalistic opinions, a movement of a different kind was commencing in the north-western parts and in Germany. While Jacob Frank was actively propagating his peculiar views in Poland, Moses Mendelssohn was inculcating on the Jews in Prussia a system of opinions composed of a heterogeneous mixture of the teachings of Plato and of Maimonides. This remarkable man was born in 1729, at Dersace, of poor parents. In early life he exhibited many tokens of possessing an energetic and inquiring mind. The writings of Maimonides, and especially the Moreh Nevochim, were his favourite subjects of study. His own philosophical writings soon gained for him a high reputation both among Christians and Jews. His chief anxiety was to reform the religion of the Jews, while he maintained an outward respect for the forms of Rabbinical Judaism. On one point he expressed himself very strongly—in reference to the authority of the synagogue. He would not allow the synagogue or any other religious community to impose any restriction whatever on the rights of thinking and teaching. Through the influence of Mendelssohn, all respect for the Talmud began to disappear among the German Jews, and a large party was formed avowing themselves Anti-Talmudists. This eminent Jewish philosopher died in 1786, but the impress which he had made upon the religion and literature of the Hebrew nation continued to be felt long after his decease. Three intimate friends, who long survived him, and who actively propagated his opinions, were Hartwig Wessely, Isaac Euchel, and David Friedlander.

The year 1789 proved the commencement of a new era in the history of the modern Jews. With the French Revolution a system of political theories and opinions arose which agitated all the nations of Europe. Nor were the dispersed of Israel unaffected by the wide-spread spirit of change. Throwing off their own ancient nationality, they directed all their efforts from this period to be reckoned fellow-countrymen with the Christian nations. Taking advantage of the great political outburst in France, the Jews called loudly for the application in their case of the principles of liberty, fraternity, and equality. Their demand was acknowledged to be just, and in 1791 complete equality was proclaimed for all Jews, without exception and distinction, who would accept the rights and fulfil the duties of French citizens. The rights which the Revolution had thus obtained for the Jews were confirmed by Napoleon Bonaparte. In consequence, however, of the prevalence of usury among the Jewish population in the provinces of the Rhine, an Imperial edict was published in 1808, imposing on every Jewish creditor who should go to law against a debtor the obligation to procure a certificate of good character, attested by the local authorities, declaring that the said creditor was not in the habit of taking usury, or pursuing any disgraceful traffic. This severe decree was limited in its continuance to ten years; but before the expiry of that period it was revoked, in consequence of the restoration of the Bourbon family. In Rhenish Bavaria and Rhenish Prussia it was continued and strictly enforced after the ten years had come to a close.

Napoleon I., in his anxiety to promote the welfare of the Jews scattered throughout his dominions, convoked at Paris a large assembly or sanhedrim of Israelites. This council, which consisted of 110 members, met on the 28th of July 1806. It was constituted by order of the Emperor, and three Imperial commissioners were introduced during the sittings, with twelve questions, which the sanhedrim were requested to answer for the satisfaction of Napoleon and the government. These questions, which chiefly referred to the Jewish laws concerning marriage and usury, were after mature deliberation answered by the assembly to the following effect, as related by Da Costa: "That the Jew, though by the law of Moses he had permission to take several wives, was not allowed to make use of this liberty in the West, an obligation to take only one wife having been imposed upon them in the year 1030, by an Assembly, over which Rabbi Gerson, of Worms, presided,—that no kind of divorce was allowed among the Jews, except what was authorized by the law of the country, and pronounced judicially,—that the Jews recognised not only Frenchmen, but all men as their brethren, without making any difference between the Jew and him who was not a Jew, from whom they differed not as a nation, but by their religion only. With respect to France, the Jew, who had there been rescued from oppression, and allowed an equality of social rights, looked upon that country as more especially his own, of which he had already given manifest proof on the field of battle:—that since the revolution no kind of jurisdiction in France or Italy could control that of the Rabbins;—that the Jewish law forbade all taking of usury, either from strangers or their own brethren; that the commandment to lend to his Israelitish brother, without interest, was a precept of charity, which by no means detracted from the justice, or the necessity of a lawful interest in matters of commerce; finally, that the Jewish religion declared, without any distinction of persons, that usury was disgraceful and infamous; but that the use of interest in mercantile affairs, without reference to religion or country, was legal,—to lend, without interest, out of pure charity towards all men, was praiseworthy."

The Imperial government declared their entire satisfaction with the replies of the sanhedrim, and another assembly of the same kind was convoked by the Emperor in 1807, to which Jews from other countries, and especially from Holland, were invited, with the view of giving to the principles of the first sanhedrim the force of law among the Jews in all countries. The second meeting, called the great Sanhedrim, to which was intrusted the formation of a plan of organization for all the synagogues throughout the Empire, met the following year. The principles laid down by the sanhedrim were strongly opposed by the Jews of other countries, particularly those of Germany and Holland. But the social and political equality which the Jews enjoyed in France, led to their settlement in great numbers in that country; so that in the course of two years after the assembling of the sanhedrim, the Jewish population resident within the boundaries of the French Empire amounted to 80,000 souls, of whom 1,232 were landed proprietors, exclusive of the owners of houses in towns.

The Jews in France, from the date of their emancipation by Napoleon I., have under every successive government been eligible to the highest offices, both civil and military, and so well have they acquitted themselves in every office which they have occupied, that in 1830 the Minister of Public Worship, M. Mérilhou, gave the strongest official testimony in their favour. The extent, however, to which the social equality of the Jews in France has been carried, has not only tended to destroy the national spirit which has generally characterized the Jewish people, but has introduced among them that spirit of religious indifference, and even infidelity, which is rapidly diffusing itself among Continental Jews generally.

The Revolution introduced into the Netherlands from France in 1795, gradually led to the emancipation of the Jews in that country also. But while a few hailed the new institutions, the great mass continued devotedly attached to the house of Orange, and keenly opposed to the revolutionary spirit of the age. The difference of opinion which thus existed among the Jews on political matters, brought about at length a schism in the synagogue. Those who had imbibed the new ideas assembled separately for religious worship, and founded a synagogue named Adath Jeshurun, which continued apart from the ancient synagogue of the Netherlands till the reign of William I. Soon after the revolution in Holland in 1795, Jews began to be admitted to the municipality and the tribunal of Amsterdam, and even to the National Assembly at the Hague. These privileges were continued first under Louis Napoleon, and then under the house of Orange, as well as under the different constitutions of 1813, 1815, 1840, and 1848. At this day, accordingly, Jews in Holland are not unfrequently found holding municipal offices in towns, and places of trust and influence under the Crown. In Belgium also, the Jews enjoy entire liberty, and are eligible to all situations of a secular kind, on the same footing with the members of other religious bodies.

In Germany the Jews had a long struggle for emancipation. No doubt the French Revolution, and the influence of the French Imperial government under Napoleon I., were favourable to the Jews in various parts of Germany. But it was not until the reign of King Frederick William III. that the Jews became entitled to rank as Prussian citizens. This was secured to them by an edict published on the 11th of March 1812, which, while it granted the right of citizenship, encumbered it with so many exceptions and provisional regulations, that it was rendered almost nugatory. These restrictions, however, were removed in the year 1848, when the revolutionary spirit spread over almost every country of Europe.

In Roman Catholic countries various remarkable changes have been effected in the relation of the Jews to the governments. The reigning Pope, Pius IX., at an early period of his Pontificate, set an example of liberality by his regulations in favour of the Jewish subjects of the church. The Ghetto of the Jews at Rome was solemnly opened on the evening of the 17th of April 1847. It had been customary for four elders of the synagogue annually to approach the Pope with an humble supplication that he would grant the Jews permission as a nation to reside in Rome. This degrading custom, Pius IX. abolished, and granted a complete and unrestricted toleration.

Throughout every part of the world Jews are to be found. "There is not a country," says Dr. Keith, "on the face of the earth, where the Jews are unknown. They are found alike in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. They are citizens of the world without a country. Neither mountains, nor rivers, nor deserts, nor oceans, which are the boundaries of other nations, have terminated their wanderings. They abound in Poland, in Holland, in Russia, and in Turkey. In Germany, Spain, Italy, France, and Britain, they are more thinly scattered. In Persia, China, and India, on the east and on the west of the Ganges, they are few in number among the heathen. They have trod the snows of Siberia, and the sand of the burning desert; and the European traveller hears of their existence in regions which he cannot reach, even in the very interior of Africa, south of Timbuctou. From Moscow to Lisbon, from Japan to Britain, from Borneo to Archangel, from Hindostan to Honduras, no inhabitant of any nation upon the earth would be known in all the intervening regions, but a Jew alone."

Properly speaking, the modern Jews have no symbol or profession of faith, but allege the Word of God contained in the Old Testament to be the standard of their belief and practice. Maimonides, however, reduced the doctrines of Judaism to a limited number of fundamental principles, which are usually known by the name of the Thirteen Articles, and are regarded by the Jews as exhibiting a view of their peculiar system. These articles which form the creed of the modern Jews are as follows:—

"I. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) is the Creator and Governor of all creatures, that he alone has made, does make, and will make all things.

"II. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) is only one, in unity to which there is no resemblance, and that he alone has been, is, and will be our God.

"III. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) is not corporeal, nor to be comprehended by an understanding capable of comprehending what is corporeal; and that there is nothing like him in the universe.

"IV. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) is the First and the Last.

"V. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) is the only object of adoration, and that no other being whatever ought to be worshipped.

"VI. I believe with a perfect faith, that all the words of the prophets are true.

"VII. I believe with a perfect faith, that the prophecies of Moses our master (may he rest in peace) are true; and that he is the father of all the wise men, as well of those who went before him, as of those who have succeeded him.

"VIII. I believe with a perfect faith, that the whole law which we have in our hands at this day, was delivered by Moses our master, (may he rest in peace).

"IX. I believe with a perfect faith, that this law will never be changed, and that no other law will ever be given by the Creator. (blessed be his name).

"X. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) knows all the actions of men, and all their thoughts, as it is said; 'He fashioneth all the hearts of them, and understandeth all their works.'

"XI. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (blessed be his name) rewards those who observe his commands, and punishes those who transgress them.

"XII. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Messiah will come, and though he delays, nevertheless I will always expect him till he come.

"XIII. I believe with a perfect faith, that the dead will be restored to life, when it shall be so ordained by the decree of the Creator; blessed be his name, and exalted be his remembrance for ever and ever."

The articles of Maimonides have been approved and sanctioned by almost all the Rabbis for the last five hundred years. They have been publicly adopted as the creed of the synagogue, and have been inserted in the prayer books as fundamental points, which all Jews are expected to believe, and are required to repeat every day. The precepts of the Jewish religion are considered as amounting to 613, of which the affirmative are 248, and the negative 365. "In the ten commandments," says a writer on this subject, "there are 613 letters, and each letter stands for one command; and in the whole law of Moses there are 613 commandments; and such was the power of these two tables, that it contained the complete law of Moses. Thus far it is proved that a perfect God gave a perfect law." The negative precepts are obligatory on every Israelite at all times; but of the affirmative, some are optional, some are restricted to certain seasons, and others to certain offices; some can only be performed in Palestine, and others are limited to the regulation of such ceremonies and services as have been discontinued since the destruction of the temple. The obligations imposed on Jewish females by the affirmative precepts are very few. The Rabbis hold that before marriage a woman has nothing to do with religion, and is not required to observe any of the commandments; and after marriage, she has only to observe three: (1.) the purifications of women; (2.) to bless the Sabbath bread—that is, to take a small piece of dough, repeat a prayer over it, and throw it into the fire; and (3.) to light the candles on the eve of any Sabbath, or of any festival, and repeat a prayer whilst doing it.

Every Jewish father is bound to instruct his sons in the knowledge of the law, but not his daughters, and women are not required to learn the law themselves, neither are they obliged to teach it to their children. The process of education followed in the case of Jewish children is thus described by Dr. McCaul in his 'Judaism and the Jews':—"At four or five years of age, the Jewish child begins to learn the Aleph Beth. As soon as he can read the Hebrew text with points, the work of translation commences. There is no learning of grammar. The Melammed teaches the translation at once. He pronounces the Hebrew word, and tells the meaning, and repeats a given portion in this way until the child knows it. Thus, without grammar or lexicon, without any reference to roots or conjugations, the Jewish children learn the language of their forefathers; and it is surprising to see the progress which they make in the course of a year. When the child can translate tolerably, he then begins the Pentateuch again, with the 'Commentary' of R. Solomon Jarchi. The style of this commentator is concise, and often obscure. But the oral instruction clears away the difficulties. The Melammed repeats the words, giving the sense as before, and the child repeats after him until he has learned his task, which is for a week—either the whole weekly portion of the law, or a part of it, according to his abilities. When he has mastered Rashi, he begins the Talmud. At first, the oral method is used as before; but very soon the child is left to shift for himself; and usually, at ten years of age, he is able to make out the sense by the help of Jarchi's 'Commentary.' At thirteen he becomes a bar mitzvah, the son of the commandment, and is then responsible for his own sins, which, up to that time, the father has borne; and is expected to expound some difficult passage of the Talmud publicly in the synagogue. Of course all Jewish children do not pursue these studies so far as the Talmud and its commentaries. The mass of the people are very poor, and many are therefore obliged to rest satisfied with a knowledge of the Pentateuch. Others stop at Rashi's 'Commentary.' Others exhibit no taste for learning. But still, after deducting all these classes, a greater proportion of Jewish children receive a learned education than amongst Christians. Poor youths of promise find a seminary and books in the Beth Hammedrash, or house of instruction, which exists in every large congregation, where the Rabbi presides and superintends the studies. They are supported by voluntary contribution, and wander about from one celebrated Rabbi to another in order to complete their studies; and, it must be added, everywhere find a home and a supply of the necessities of life. One of the most pleasing traits in the Jewish character is the hospitality with which they treat all strangers of their nation, but particularly wandering students."

A strange idea prevails among the modern Jews, that if a child cannot repeat the Kodesh in the synagogue, the soul of the deceased parent remains in purgatory. The greatest reproach, besides, that can be cast upon a Rabbinical Jew is, that he neglects the education of his children, more especially the male children, on whom double attention is bestowed. So little account is taken of females among the Jews, that a thanksgiving is inserted in all the prayer-books, and forms a part of the daily devotions of every male member of the synagogue: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God! King of the universe! who hast not made me a woman!"

From the dispersion to the latter end of the last century, Rabbinism prevailed universally amongst the Jews, with the exception of the small sect of the CARAITES (which see). The distinguishing feature of the Rabbinical system is, that it asserts the transmission of an oral or traditional law of equal authority with the written law of God, at the same time that it resolves tradition into the present opinions of the existing church. In consequence of the introduction of Rabbinical glosses, the great doctrines of Scripture are completely perverted. Thus the fundamental tenet of original sin is denied by the Jews; and Maimonides boldly affirms that the idea of man being born with an inherent principle of sin or holiness, is as inconceivable as his being born an adept in any art or science. On the other hand, the Talmudists, and other Jewish writers, frequently speak of an evil principle, which they represent as the internal cause of all the sins that men commit. Some Rabbis speak of two principles in man, the one evil, the other good; the former born with him, the latter implanted at the age of thirteen.

The modern Jews are without priest, altar, or sacrifice, and, in their view, the only atonement is sincere repentance, and the only ground of acceptance is a perfect conformity to the law of Moses. This is the doctrine set forth by Maimonides, but the general doctrine of the synagogue appears to be, that there are other substitutes as well as repentance, such as the sufferings and supererogatory merits of reputed saints and martyrs. The doctrine of divine influence is taught by some Rabbis, but not by others; and the self-determining power of the human will to good or evil is clearly asserted in a maxim laid down in the Talmud, that everything is in the power of God except the fear of God. The notion is very generally entertained among modern Jews, that the ceremonial observances gone through annually on the Great Day of Atonement serve as an expiation for all the sins of the preceding year. Some Rabbis inculcate that repentance ought to be accompanied with bodily mortification and penance; and it is very generally believed that the bodily pains which they suffer are expiations for sins. The doctrine of the metempsychosis, or that one human soul animates several bodies in succession, is adopted by many Jewish writers.

It is maintained by the Jews that, after death, those who have been righteous in this life are happy, and ascend immediately into the holy place; but in the case of a wicked man, all his sins which stand near him go before him to his grave, and trample upon his body. The angel Duma likewise rises, attended by those who are appointed for the beating of the dead—a process which is called CHIBBUT HAKKEFER (which see), and is performed in the grave. Seven judgments are undergone by the wicked, which are thus described by a Rabbinical writer:—"The first is when the soul departs from the body. The second is when his works go before him, and exclaim against him. The third is when the body is laid in the grave. The fourth is Chibbut Hakkefer—that is, the beating in the grave. The fifth is the judgment of the worms. When his body has lain in the grave three days, he is ripped open, his entrails come out; and his bowels, with the sordes in them, are taken and dashed in his face, with this address, Take what thou hast given to thy stomach, of that which thou didst daily eat and drink, and of which, in all thy daily feastings, thou distributedst nothing to the poor and needy; as it is said, 'I will spread upon your faces the dung of your solemn feasts.' Mal. ii. 3. After the three days, a man receives judgment on his eyes, his hands, and his feet, which have committed iniquities, till the thirtieth day; and in all these thirty days the soul and body are judged together. Wherefore the soul during this time remains here upon earth, and is not suffered to go to the place to which it belongs. The sixth is the judgment of Hell. The seventh is, that his soul wanders, and is driven about the world, finding no rest anywhere till the days of her punishment are ended. These are the seven judgments inflicted upon men; and these are what are signified in the threatening, 'Then will I walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins.' Lev. xxvi. 28." The Jews, we have said, hold the doctrine of transmigration, some passing into human bodies, others into beasts, others into vegetables, and others still into stones.

It would occupy too much space to enumerate the idle and frivolous ceremonies enjoined by the Rabbis in dressing and undressing, washing and wiping the face and hands, and other actions of daily life. To instance one, which is mentioned by Buxtorf: "A Jew ought to put on the right shoe first, and then the left; but the left shoe is to be tied first, and the right afterwards. If the shoes have no latchets or strings, the left shoe must be put on first. In undressing, the left shoe, whether with or without latchets or strings, is in all cases to be taken off first." But passing to matters of more importance, those which concern the public worship of the Jews, we remark that a congregation, according to the decisions of the Rabbis, requires at least ten men who have passed the thirteenth year of their age; and if this number is found in any locality, they may procure a SYNAGOGUE (which see); or, as it is often termed, a little sanctuary.

Various forms of prayer are prescribed to be used in the synagogue as well as in private devotion. The prayers are appointed to be said all of them in Hebrew, and the most important of them are called Shemoneh Esreh, or the eighteen prayers, to which another has been added, directed against heretics and apostates, thus making the number of prayers nineteen, though they are still called by the original name. In addition to these prayers, the daily service consists of the reading of three portions of Scripture, an exercise which is termed Kiriath Shema, or reading of the Shema, which is the commencing word of the first of these three portions in the Hebrew Bible. All except women, servants, and little children, are enjoined to read these passages twice every day. The Shema and the nineteen prayers are never to be omitted at the stated seasons of devotion. There are also numerous short prayers and benedictions which every Jew is expected to repeat daily. The members of the synagogue are required to repeat, at least, a hundred benedictions every day. The liturgies adopted by the Jews vary, in some few particulars, in different countries, but in the main body of the prayers they all agree. It is customary to chant the prayers rather than read them.

Among the modern Jews the ancient mode of computing the day, from sunset on one evening to sunset on the following evening, is still retained. Their Sabbath commences at sunset on Friday, and terminates at sunset on Saturday. Nothing ought to be undertaken on a Friday, unless it can be finished before the evening. In the afternoon of that day they wash and clean themselves, trim their hair, and pare their nails. They begin with the left hand, but deem it improper to cut the nails on two adjoining fingers in succession. As to the parings of the nails, the Talmud declares, "He that throws them on the ground is an impious man; he that buries them is a just man; he that throws them into the fire is a pious and perfect man."

The writings of the Rabbis contain numerous regulations concerning meats and drinks. For example, the Jews are not permitted to taste the flesh of any four-footed animals but those which both chew the cud and part the hoof; as sheep, oxen, and goats. They are forbidden to eat rabbits, hares, or swine. They are allowed to eat no fish but such as have both scales and fins, no birds of prey, nor any reptile. They are prohibited from eating the blood of any beast or bird, and also from eating of any creature that dies of itself. Mr. Allen, in his 'Modern Judaism,' thus describes the mode in which animals designed to be eaten by Jews are slaughtered: "Cattle, for their use, are required to be slaughtered by a Jew, duly qualified and specially appointed for that purpose. After an animal is killed, he examines whether the inward parts are perfectly sound. If he find the least blemish of any kind, the whole carcase is rejected as unfit for Jewish tables. If it be found in the state required, he affixes to it a leaden seal, on one side of which is the word Casher, which signifies right, and on the other the day of the week in Hebrew characters. At every Christian butcher's, who sells meat to the Jews, there is a Jew stationed, who is appointed by the rulers of the synagogue to superintend it. When the carcase is cut up, he is also to seal the respective pieces.

"Of those beasts which are allowed, they are not to eat the hind quarters unless the sinew of the thigh is taken out, which is a troublesome and expensive operation, requiring a person duly qualified and specially appointed for that particular purpose; and therefore it is rarely done.

"Previously to boiling any meat, they are required to let it lie half an hour in water and an hour in salt, and then to rinse off the salt with clean water. This is designed to draw out any remaining blood."

From the prohibition in the Law of Moses against seething a kid in his mother's milk, the Jews infer that they must not eat meat and butter together. Hence the vessels used for meat must not be employed for things consisting either wholly or part of milk, and for eating and dressing vessels they are obliged to use different utensils. They purchase their kitchen utensils perfectly new, lest they may previously have been in the possession of Gentiles, and may have been used for forbidden meats.

JEWES (MODERN) IN AMERICA. Jews from the Spanish Peninsula appear to have settled in America shortly after its discovery by Columbus. In the end of the fifteenth century they were found in Brazil under the name of New Christians. They obtained considerable accessions to their numbers in that country by the arrival of emigrants from France. At length Brazil was conquered by the arms of Holland, and forthwith considerable bodies of Dutch Jews crossed the Atlantic, accompanied by two Rabbins, and founded a Jewish colony in Brazil. Soon after their settlement in the country, they rose to great prosperity and influence under the fostering care of the Dutch government, which encouraged them by the entire toleration of their religion, while the Jews, in their turn, rendered essential service to the State, by defending the country against the Spaniards and Portuguese. But in 1654 the Dutch lost possession of Brazil, that part of South America having again become a colony of Portugal; and in consequence the Jews were under the necessity of seeking a settlement elsewhere. A considerable portion of them established themselves in another part of the New World, the Dutch West Indian Company having, in 1659, afforded them a place of residence at Cayenne. Their number was speedily increased by the arrival of several families of Portuguese Jews from Lisbon. The progress of the colony, however, was hindered by a war, first with Portugal, and then with France, which in 1664 took the country, and scattered the Jews who had settled there.

A more prosperous and lasting settlement was effected by Portuguese Jews at Surinam. This colony was planted by Lord Willoughby in the time of Charles II., the charter being dated in 1662, and at the invitation of its founder the colony was joined by a number of industrious, and even distinguished, Israelites, who had left Cayenne. The Jews were here placed on a footing of entire equality with the English, while they were left at perfect liberty in all matters of religion. In a few years the colony passed from the hands of the English into those of the Dutch, and a considerable number of Jewish families at this period went along with the English to form a colony at Jamaica. Many Jews, however, preferred to remain under Dutch protection at Surinam, where several individuals belonging to Hebrew families distinguished themselves, first in defence of the colony in 1689 against the French, and afterwards, both in that and the succeeding century, against the Indians and Negroes. The prosperity of the synagogue at Surinam, however, was considerably diminished by internal disputes, which arose among the Jews themselves. They were afterwards joined by some German Jews, but the decayed condition of the colony, for many years past, has not a little retarded the progress of the Jewish population. Another settlement of Jews has long existed at Curaçoa, which, though originally a Spanish colony, has for a very long period been in the hands of the Dutch. It was not till the eighteenth century, however, that they possessed a synagogue, which, in a short time, was followed by a second. The Jewish population of the colony is now reduced to less than 1,000 souls.

Jews are found in every portion of the United States of North America. Probably the first Jewish settlement was formed at New Amsterdam, when it was under the Dutch government about 1660. But the number of the Israelites seems to have increased more slowly than in any other part of the world, as we find that till 1827 only one Jewish synagogue was required in the city of New York. Since that period five other congregations have been formed, and all their places of worship are often crowded. The number of Jews in the city of New York was calculated a few years ago to amount to 10,000; but Jewish emigrants arrive so rapidly from all parts of the Old World, that their number, in all probability, much exceeds the calculation now referred to. In the United States, the Jews were lately computed at 60,000 males, from thirteen years and upwards. The whole Jewish population of the United States, including women and children, may, therefore, be said to reach 150,000. In a few of the synagogues in North America, the service is conducted in the English language, but these are rare exceptions, the Hebrew being almost universally the language used in public worship. The Jews enjoy perfect liberty in the United States, and in consequence they are often found in places of trust, and their names may be seen on the rolls of both the upper and lower houses of Congress.

JEWS (MODERN) IN BRITAIN. Jews appear to have settled in England so far back as the time of the Saxon Heptarchy. Accordingly, a reference to them occurs in an ecclesiastical canon of Egbert, archbishop of York, in A.D. 740, which prohibited Christians from taking any part in the Jewish festivals. By the laws of Edward the Confessor, the Jews are declared to be the property of the king. When William the Conqueror came over from Normandy to England, many Jews accompanied him: and they are mentioned in the time of William Rufus, the second king of the Norman line, as being possessed, in various instances, of great wealth, living in splendid mansions in London and other towns, and having whole streets named after them.

In the twelfth century, the Jews were treated with great cruelty and inhumanity in England. They were banished from the kingdom in the reign of Henry II. At the coronation of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, they were prohibited under heavy penalties from appearing in the streets, and some having ventured to disobey the royal order were discovered by the populace, and rudely assaulted. Both in London and the provinces the utmost indignities and insults were heaped upon the poor despised children of Abraham. It was at length resolved to make a general massacre of the entire Jewish population in England. They offered to ransom their lives with money,—a privilege which was denied them, so that being rendered desperate, many of them slew their wives and children, declaring that it was better to die courageously for the Law than to fall into the hands of Christians. They then committed their property to the flames, and madly slew one another.

The same system of policy, in reference to the Jews, was pursued by John, the brother and successor of Richard. At the commencement of his reign, A.D. 1199, he bestowed upon them all the privileges they could desire; but these plausible enactments were only intended to conceal his real designs. He seized upon the treasures of the Jews, and compelled them, by the most cruel tortures, to pour their wealth into the royal coffers. His son Henry III. followed in the footsteps of his father, persecuting the Jews in reality, while passing decrees in their favour. Worn out at length by the ill-treatment which they had endured during several reigns, the Jews earnestly petitioned to be allowed to leave the country. This, however, was not granted, and their sufferings were protracted for some years longer, when in 1290 Edward I. banished them from the kingdom. The Jews now, with their families and all the property which they had been able to rescue from the hands of their spoilers, quitted the country to the number of about 16,000. Many of the exiled Hebrews threw themselves into the sea in despair, and others with difficulty reached the Continent in a state of extreme destitution.

For three centuries and a-half the Jews were prohibited from setting foot on the shores of England, although the other European powers, both Protestant and Romish, gave them free access to their different countries. Oliver Cromwell, however, who, on religious grounds, was not unfavourable to the Jews, became deeply convinced of the impolicy of excluding this industrious and enterprising nation from all connection with the English people. Probably aware of the good inclinations of the Protector towards them, the Jews on the Continent despatched Manasseh ben Israel on a mission to the English court, with a request to be allowed to reside and freely to exercise their religion in any part of England, Scotland, and Ireland. On receiving this petition, Cromwell summoned a meeting of clergy, lawyers, and merchants, to state their views on the subject. The Protector himself on this occasion pleaded eloquently on behalf of the Jews, urging on Scriptural as well as other grounds, the high expediency of re-admitting the Jews into England. But the majority of the meeting, particularly the clergy and merchants, declared themselves wholly opposed to the proposal, and thus the question was meanwhile deferred. Without any formal enactment in their favour, however, the Jews were tolerated in Great Britain, though not as English subjects, or as forming a Jewish synagogue. In the reign of Charles II. the Jews obtained leave to erect a synagogue in London, and to exercise their religion with unrestricted freedom. And it is a somewhat remarkable fact, taken in connection with this tolerant enactment, that the negotiations for the marriage of Charles with the Infanta, Catherine of Portugal, were carried on by General Monk, through the medium of a Portuguese Jew; and the Infanta was accompanied to England by two brothers, who both of them openly professed the religion of Moses. From that time the Portuguese synagogue in London began to flourish, its numbers being increased by the emigration of distinguished Jewish families from Spain and Portugal, but especially from the Netherlands. These families have lived and prospered in London, particularly since the reign of King William in the end of the seventeenth century.

The Jews, from the period of the Revolution of 1688, when numbers came over with the Prince of Orange from Holland, have ever proved themselves loyal and obedient subjects of the English government, readily aiding in every emergency, both in person and with their capital; and in the rebellion of 1745, they gave ample proof of their fidelity to the reigning Protestant dynasty. Accordingly, the government, appreciating the exemplary conduct of the Jews, brought a bill into Parliament in 1753, "granting to all Jews, who had resided in Great Britain or Ireland for the space of three years, the rights of English citizenship, with the exception of patronage and admission to Parliament." The bill passed, though violently opposed both in the House and in the country; but such was the excitement produced by the success of the measure, and so many were the earnest petitions for its repeal, that the Parliament was at length compelled to yield to the wishes of the people, and to accede to a proposal introduced by ministers with that view. The Jews themselves had expressed no great anxiety for such a law in their favour, fearing, as they did, that when thus placed on a footing with the Christians, some of the Israelites might be induced to renounce the religion of their fathers.

From the period of the first Revolution in France, a liberal and tolerant spirit has made great progress in England, and efforts have, from time to time, been made towards the absolute emancipation of the Jews. The ancient laws relative to Israel have not been formally repealed, but they have been allowed silently to fall into desuetude. They possess the right of voting, and are eligible for the office of magistrates in towns. A Jew has been Lord Mayor of London, and another has been sheriff of the city. In the face of the law, which excludes Jews from Parliament, Baron Lionel Rothschild, an Israelite, has been elected again and again as one of the members to represent the city of London in Parliament. This striking popular demonstration, in favour of the Jews, has led to the introduction of a bill into the House of Commons, with the sanction of the government, to change the form of the oath which is administered to members on taking their seats. A clause which occurs in the oath contains the words, "on the faith of a Christian," which, of course, cannot be conscientiously used by a Jew, and must, as long as they are retained, form an effectual barrier to the entrance of a Jew into the House of Commons. Almost every session, for some years past, a bill for the modification of the oath, by the exclusion, in the case of the Jews, of the obnoxious clause, has been passed by the House of Commons, and rejected by a majority in the House of Lords. In the course of the present year (1858), however, the lords have yielded, and the Jews are now eligible as members of Parliament, and allowed to occupy the highest offices in the government. Many conversions from Judaism to Christianity have taken place of late years in Great Britain, and some converted Jews are at this hour exercising their gifts as Christian ministers in connection with the Church of England.

JINAS, saints among the JAINS (which see) in India. A saint is called a Jina, as being the victor over all human passions and infirmities. He is supposed to be possessed of thirty-six superhuman attributes, four classes of which regard the person of a Jina, such as the beauty of his form, the fragrance of his body, the white colour of his blood, the curling of his hair, its non-increase, and the beard and nails, his exemption from all natural impurities, from hunger and thirst, from infirmity and decay—properties which are considered to be born with him. He can collect around him millions of human beings, gods, men, and animals, in a comparatively small space; his voice is audible to a great distance, and his language is intelligible to animals, men, and gods. The back of his head is encircled with a halo of light, brighter than the sun, and for an immense interval around him wherever he moves, there is neither sickness nor enmity, storm nor dearth, plague nor war. Eleven attributes of this kind are ascribed to him. The remaining nineteen are of celestial origin, as the raining of flowers and perfumes, the sound of heavenly drums, and the menial offices rendered by Indra and the gods.

The Jinas, twenty-four in number, though similar in their general character and attributes, are distinguished from each other in colour, stature, and longevity. Two of them are red, two white, two blue, two black, the rest are of a golden hue, or a yellowish brown. In regard to stature and length of life, they undergo a gradual decrease from Rishabha the first Jina, who was five hundred poles in stature, and lived 8,400,000 great years, to Mahavira, the twenty-fourth Jina, who had degenerated to the size of man, and was not more than forty years on earth. It is not improbable, as Professor H. H. Wilson suggests, that these Jain legends, as to their Jinas or saints, are drawn from the legendary tales as to the series of the ancient Budhas.

JINS, an intermediate race, according to the Mohammedans, between angels and men. They believe them to be made of fire, but with grosser bodies than the angels. The Jius are said to propagate their kind, and, though long-lived, not to be immortal. These beings are supposed to have inhabited the earth previous to the creation of Adam, under a succession of sovereigns. Mohammed professed to be sent as a preacher to them as well as to men; and in the chapter of the Koran which bears their name, he introduces them as uttering these words: "There are some among us who are upright, and there are some among us who are otherwise; we are of different ways, and we verily thought that we could by no means frustrate God in the earth, neither could we escape him by flight: therefore, when we heard the direction, we believed therein. There are Moslems among us, and others who swerve from righteousness."

JISU, a god among the Japanese, whose office it is to convey souls to the infernal regions.

JOACHIMITES, the followers of the famous Joachim, abbot first of Corace, then of Floris in Calabria, in the twelfth century. This remarkable man was supposed by the common people to be divinely inspired, and equal to the ancient prophets. His predictions, which were numerous, were most of them included in a work which bore the name of 'The Everlasting Gospel.' This strange treatise consisted of three books, and was full of enigmatic and ambiguous predictions. An Introduction to this book was written by some obscure monk, who professed to explain its prophecies, applying them to the Franciscans. Both the university of Paris and Pope Alexander IV. condemned the Introduction, and ordered it to be burned. This latter production, which belongs to the middle of the thirteenth century, has been ascribed to John of Parma, general of the Franciscans; or more probably to a Franciscan monk named Gerhard, who adhered to the party of the Spirituals, and is known to have favoured the opinions of the abbot Joachim. 'The Everlasting Gospel' describes in strong language the growing corruption of the church, and Pachelis holds a prominent place in the picture. The Popes in general come in for a large share of reproach, on account of the Crusades, by which Joachim alleges they had exhausted the nations and resources of Christendom among barbarous tribes, under the specious pretence of carrying to them salvation and the cross. "Grief over the corruption of the church," says Neander, "longing desire for better times, profound Christian feeling, a meditative mind, and a glowing imagination, such are the peculiar characteristics of his spirit and of his writings. His ideas were presented for the most part in the form of comments and meditations on the New Testament; but the language of the Bible furnished him only with such hints as might turn up for the matter which he laid into them by his allegorizing mode of interpretation; although the types which he supposed he found presented in the Scriptures, reacted in giving shape to his intuitions. As his writings and ideas found great acceptance in this age among those who were dissatisfied with the present, and who were longing after a different condition of the church; and the Franciscans, who might easily fancy they discovered, even in that which is certainly genuine, in Joachim's writings, a prophecy referring to their order, so a strong temptation arose to the forging of works under his name, or the interpolating those which really proceeded from him. The loose connection of the matter in his works, made it easy to insert passages from other hands; and this character of the style renders a critical sifting of them difficult."

The title of Joachim's book, 'The Everlasting Gospel,' is borrowed from Rev. xiv. 6, and by this expression he understood, following the view of Origen, a new spiritual apprehension of Christianity, as opposed to the sensuous Romish point of view, and answering to the age of the Holy Spirit. A great excitement was produced by the publication in 1254 of the 'Introductory to the Everlasting Gospel,' which claimed all the prophecies of Joachim, as referring to the Franciscan order, and alleged that St. Francis was that apocalyptic angel whom John saw dying in the midst of heaven. Joachim had taught that two imperfect ages or dispensations were past, those of the Father and of the Son; and that a third more perfect was at hand, that of the Holy Spirit. The 'Introductory' of Gerhard, however, alleged that the gospel of Christ would be abrogated in the year 1260, and the new and eternal gospel would take its place, and that the ministers by whom this new dispensation would be introduced were to be itinerant barefooted friars. The commentary thus grafted upon the writings of Joachim by a Franciscan monk, excited the utmost indignation against the mendicant monks, and the University of Paris complained so loudly against the 'Introductory,' that by order of the Pope it was publicly burnt.

JOGIS. See YOGIS.

JOHANNITES, a sect which arose in Constantinople in the beginning of the fifth century, deriving their name from John Chrysostom, the validity of whose deposition they refused to acknowledge. On Sundays and festival days they held their private meetings, which were conducted by clergymen who thought like themselves, and from these alone they would receive the sacraments. So keenly did they feel in regard to the deposition of their bishop, that sanguinary tumults ensued. This schism spread more widely in the church, and many bishops and clergymen joined the party. They were encouraged by the Roman church, which constantly maintained the innocence of Chrysostom. Atticus, the second successor of the deposed, being of a conciliatory spirit, introduced the name of Chrysostom into the church prayers offered in behalf of bishops who had died in the orthodox faith. Through the influence of the same benevolent prelate, a universal amnesty was obtained for all the adherents of Chrysostom among the clergy. Thus a still more extensive schism was obviated; but a small party of Johannites still continued to hold their ground at Constantinople. The first who succeeded in putting an end to the schism in that city was the patriarch Proclus, who prevailed upon the emperor Theodosius II. in A. D. 438, to allow the remains of Chrysostom to be brought back to Constantinople, and to be buried there with solemn pomp; and having thus gratified the remnant of the Johannites, he persuaded them to connect themselves once more with the dominant church.

JOHN (ST.), CHRISTIANS OF. See MENDEANS.

JOHN (ST.) BAPTIST'S DAY, a Christian festival, which is traced back to the fifth century. It was instituted in commemoration of the nativity of John the Baptist; the only nativity besides that of our Lord celebrated in the church, but allowed on account of its special connection with the birth of the Saviour. It is held on the 24th of June. In A. D. 506 it was received among the great feasts like Easter, Christmas, and other festivals; and was celebrated with equal solemnity, and in much the same manner.

JOHN (ST.) BAPTIST'S MARTYRDOM, a festival celebrated in the Greek church on the 29th of August.

JOHN (ST.) EVANGELIST'S DAY, a Christian festival celebrated in commemoration of John the beloved disciple. It is observed on the 27th of December. In the Greek church, the 26th of September is consecrated to the Assumption of the Body of St. John the Evangelist. The same church has also a festival in honour of this evangelist, which is celebrated on the 8th of May.

JOHNSONIANS, the followers of Mr. John Johnson, who was for many years a Baptist minister in Liverpool, in the eighteenth century. His peculiar sentiments may be thus briefly stated. He held that faith is not a duty which God requires of man, but a grace which it is impossible to convert into a duty, and which cannot be required of any created being. The want of faith, therefore, in his view, was not a sin, but a mere vacuity or nonentity. The principle of faith then was regarded by Mr. Johnson as a work not wrought by man, but the operation of God, and hence it is not the soul of man which believes, but the principle of grace within him. He maintained that the holiness of the first man Adam was inferior to that of the angels, much more to that of the saints, who are raised above the angels in glory. He regarded it as not the duty of the ministers of the gospel to preach the law, or to inculcate moral duties upon their people, seeing they are appointed not to preach the law, but the gospel. Still further, Mr. Johnson held that the blessings of spiritual grace and eternal life being secured in Christ prior to the fall, were never lost, and consequently could not be restored. This excellent Baptist minister entertained high supra-lapsarian notions on the subject of the Divine decrees, and he admitted the universality of the death of Christ. On the doctrine of the Trinity, his followers seem to have embraced the INDWELLING SCHEME (which see), with Calvinistic views of justification and the atonement.

In the last Census, that of 1851, no congregations of this body are reported as now existing in England. It does not appear that the Johnsonians ever had a footing in either Scotland or Ireland.

JORDAN (BATHING IN THE), an annual ceremony observed by the Syrian Christians, as well as by Greeks, Nestorians, Copts, and many others, who plunge naked into the river at the supposed spot where the miraculous passage of the Israelites was effected, and where also our blessed Lord was baptized. It is performed at Easter by pilgrims who have come from all parts, and encountered the utmost privations and difficulties, in order to purify themselves in the sacred waters. Not unfrequently the number of pilgrims on such occasions amounts to several thousand people of both sexes and all nations. "Once a-year," says Mr. Stanley, in his 'Sinai and Palestine,' "on the Monday in Passion Week, the desolation of the plain of Jericho is broken by the descent from the Judæan hills of five, six, or eight thousand pilgrims, who are now, from all parts of the Byzantine Empire, gathered within the walls of Jerusalem. The Turkish governor is with them, an escort of Turkish soldiers accompanies them, to protect them down the desert hills against the robbers, who, from the days of the good Samaritan downwards, have infested the solitary pass. On a bare space beside the tangled thickets of the modern Jericho—distinguished by the square tower, now the castle of its chief, and called by pilgrims 'the House of Zaccheus'—the vast encampment is spread out, recalling the image of the tents which Israel here first pitched by Gilgal. Two hours before dawn, the rude Eastern kettle-drum rouses the sleeping multitude. It is to move onwards to the Jordan, so as to accomplish the object before the great heat of the lower valley becomes intolerable. Over the intervening desert the wide crowd advances in almost perfect silence. Above is the bright Paschal moon—before them moves a bright flare of torches—on each side huge watch-fires break the darkness of the night, and act as beacons for the successive descents of the road. The sun breaks over the eastern hills as the head of the cavalcade reaches the brink of the Jordan. Then it is, for the first time, that the European traveller sees the sacred river, rushing through its thicket of tamarisk, willow, and agnus-castus, with rapid eddies, and of a turbid yellow colour, like the Tiber at Rome, and about as broad—sixty or eighty feet. The chief features of the scene are the white cliffs and green thickets on each bank, though at this spot they break away on the western side, so as to leave an open space for the descent of the pilgrims. Beautiful as the scene is, it is impossible not to feel a momentary disappointment at the conviction, produced by the first glance, that it cannot be the spot either of the passage of Joshua or of the baptism of John. The high eastern banks (not to mention the other considerations named before) preclude both events. But in a few moments the great body of pilgrims, now distinctly visible in the breaking day, appear on the ridge of the last terrace. None, or hardly any, are on foot. Horse, mule, ass, and camel, in promiscuous confusion, bearing whole families on their backs—a father, mother, and three children perhaps on a single camel—occupy the vacant spaces between and above the jungle in all directions.

"If the traveller expects a wild burst of enthusiasm, such as that of the Greeks when they caught the first glimpse of the sea, or the German armies at the sight of the Rhine, he will be disappointed. Nothing is more remarkable in the whole pilgrimage to the Jordan, from first to last, than the absence of any such displays. Nowhere is more clearly seen that deliberative business-like aspect of their devotion so well described in Eothen, unrelieved by any expression of emotion, unless, perhaps, a slight tinge of merriment. They dismount, and set to work to perform their bath: most on the open space, some farther up amongst the thickets: some plunging in naked—most, however, with white dresses, which they bring with them, and which, having been so used, are kept for their winding-sheets. Most of the bathers keep within the shelter of the bank, where the water is about four feet in depth, though with a bottom of very deep mud. The Coptic pilgrims are curiously distinguished from the rest by the boldness with which they dart into the main current, striking the water after their fashion alternately with their two arms, and playing with the eddies, which hurry them down and across, as if they were in the cataracts of the Nile; crashing through the thick boughs of the jungle which, on the eastern bank of the stream, intercepts their progress, and then re-crossing the river higher up, where they can wade, assisted by long poles which they have cut from the opposite thickets. It is remarkable, considering the mixed assemblage of men and women in such a scene, there is so little appearance of levity and indecorum. A primitive domestic character pervades in a singular form the whole scene. The families which have come on their single mule or camel now bathe together with the utmost gravity, the father receiving from the mother the infant, which has been brought to receive the one immersion which will suffice for the rest of its life, and thus, by a curious economy of resources, save it from the expense and danger of a future pilgrimage in after years. In about two hours the shores are cleared; with the same quiet they remount their camels and horses; and before the noonday heat has set in, are again encamped on the upper plain of Jericho. At the dead of night, the drum again wakes them for their homeward march. The torches again go before; behind follows the vast multitude, mounted, passing in profound silence over that silent plain—so silent, that but for the tinkling of the drum, its departure would hardly be perceptible. The troops stay on the ground to the end, to guard the rear, and when the last roll of the drum announces that the last soldier is gone, the whole plain returns to its perfect solitude."

From the time when our Lord was baptized in the Jordan, this river has always had a peculiar sacred interest attached to it. Hence, as we learn from the writer whom we have just quoted, "In the mosaics of the earliest churches at Rome and Ravenna, before Christian and Pagan art were yet divided, the Jordan appears a river-god, pouring his streams out of his urn." It was the earliest wish of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, and has been the wish of multitudes since his time, to be baptized in the waters of the Jordan; and for this purpose not Romanists and Greeks only, but many Protestants also, have carried off and carefully preserved water taken from the sacred river.

JORMUNGAND, the Midgard serpent of the Scandinavian mythology, begotten by Loki. The Prose Edda relates that Thor fished for this serpent, and caught him. (See HYMIR.) Thor gains great renown for killing the Midgard serpent; but at the same time, recoiling nine paces, falls dead upon the spot, suffocated with the floods of venom which the dying serpent vomits forth upon him. See SCANDINAVIANS (RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT).

JOTUNHEIM (Giants' home), the region of the giants in the old Scandinavian cosmogony.

JOY OF THE LAW (FESTIVAL OF THE), a name given to the ninth day of the Feast of Tabernacles among the Modern Jews. "On this day," says Mr. Allen, "three manuscripts of the Pentateuch are taken out of the ark, and carried by the Chassan and two other persons round the altar. Then they are laid upon the desk, and three portions are read by three different persons, one portion from each manuscript. The first of these portions is the last section, or thirty-third and thirty-fourth chapters of Deuteronomy; for this is the day on which the annual reading of the law is concluded. But as soon as this course is finished, it is immediately recommenced. The second portion now read consists of the first chapter, and first three verses of the second chapter, of Genesis. 'The reason of which,' it is said, 'is to show that man should be continually employed in reading and studying the Word of God.'

"On this day those offices of the synagogue which are annual are put up to public auction for the year ensuing, and assigned to the best bidder. The whole of these nine days is a season of great joy and festivity, and the last is the most joyful and festive of all."

JUBILATION (THE GIFT OF), a privilege alleged by theurgic mysticism to be granted to eminent Romish saints, whereby they are enabled in their last moments to sing a triumphant death-song. Thus Maria of Oignys, when on the point of death, sang, we are told, without remission, for three days and nights, her ecstasie swan-song.

JUBILEE, a season of festival and restitution among the ancient Jews, which followed seven Sabbath years, thus occurring every fiftieth year. The name is supposed by Calmet to be derived from a Hebrew word hobil, which means to restore; because lands which had been alienated were restored to their original owners. The Septuagint translates the word yobil by remission, and Josephus by liberty. The Scriptural warrant for the observance of the jubilee by the Jews is contained in Lev. xxv. 8—13, and runs as follows: "And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years: and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you: and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family. A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you: ye shall not sow, neither reap that which growth of itself in it, nor gather the grapes in it of thy vine undressed. For it is the jubilee: it shall be holy unto you: ye shall eat the increase thereof out of the field. In the year of this jubilee ye shall return every man unto his possession." The return of the year of jubilee was announced by sound of trumpet on the tenth day of the month Tisri, answering to our October. The first jubilee occurred on the sixty fourth year after the Israelites entered into the land of Canaan. From that period seventeen jubilees were reckoned until the Babylonish captivity, which fell out in the end of a Sabbatical year, and the thirty-sixth year of the jubilee. After the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the rebuilding of the Temple, the jubilee festival seems never to have been observed.

It has been much disputed among the Jews whether the fiftieth or the forty-ninth year was the year of jubilee. Maimonides maintained the former, while many eminent Rabbis have declared in favour of the latter. There were two special advantages which arose from the year of jubilee,—the manumission of servants, and the restoration of families to their ancient possessions. Servants were not absolutely freed from bondage until the tenth day of Tisri, which, as we have seen, commenced the year of jubilee; but for nine days before, they spent their time in festivities and amusements of every kind, and wore garlands upon their heads in token of joy for their approaching liberty. But the most remarkable privilege which the jubilee brought along with it, was the restoration of houses and lands to their original owners. The Jews, it is well known, were remarkably strict in preserving their genealogies, that each family might be able to establish its right to the inheritance of its ancestors; and thus, although an estate might change hands a hundred times, it of necessity returned every fiftieth year to its original owner. In purchasing an estate, accordingly, the practice among the Jews was to consider how many years had passed since the last jubilee, and then to purchase the profits of the remaining years till the next. No man was allowed to sell his house or his field till the time of jubilee, unless constrained by poverty to do so; and even after he had sold it, the purchaser must surrender the estate should the original owner, before the year of Jubilee, be in such circumstances that he can redeem it. Nay, even a near relative could redeem the land for the benefit of the original proprietor. Hebrew servants sold to strangers or into the family of proselytes, had the privilege of redemption either by themselves or their relatives. Josephus informs us that in the later periods of the Jewish history there was a general cancelling of debts at the return of jubilee. The political advantages of such an arrangement as that of the jubilee are obvious. The Hebrew government was thus made to rest on an equal agrarian law. It made provision, as Dr. Graves remarks, in his 'Lectures on the Pentateuch,' for the support of 600,000 yeomanry, with from six to twenty-five acres of land each, which they held independent of all temporal superiors, and which they might not alienate, but on condition of their reverting to the families which originally possessed them, every fiftieth year.

JUBILEE (ROMISH), a ceremony celebrated by the Church of Rome at stated periods, with great pomp and splendid preparations. It was first instituted by Pope Boniface VIII., at the close of the thirteenth century. In the year 1299, a notion was extensively propagated among the inhabitants of Rome, that those who should, in the course of the following year, visit the church of St. Peter's, would obtain the pardon of all their sins, and the same privilege would be enjoyed on every hundredth year. In conformity with this popular expectation and belief, he sent an epistle throughout Christendom, which contained the assertion that a jubilee of indulgences was sanctioned by the ancient ecclesiastical law, and therefore he decreed that, on every hundredth year, all who should confess and lament their sins, and devoutly visit St. Peter's church at Rome, should receive a plenary indulgence; or, in other words, a complete remission of all sins, past, present, and to come. An indulgence of this kind had hitherto been limited to the Crusaders. The consequence was, that multitudes crowded to Rome from all parts on the year of jubilee, and it was estimated that 2,000,000 people visited Rome in the course of the year 1300. Mr Gibbon, in his 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' thus describes the state of matters on that occasion:—"The welcome sound," says he, "was propagated throughout Christendom, and at first from the nearest provinces of Italy, and at length from the remote kingdoms of Hungary and Britain, the highways were thronged with a swarm of pilgrims, who sought to expiate their sins in a journey, however costly and laborious, which was exempt from the perils of military service. All exceptions of rank or sex, of age or infirmity, were forgotten in the common transport; and in the streets and churches many were trampled to death by the eagerness of devotion. The calculation of their numbers could not be easy or accurate, and they have probably been magnified by a dexterous clergy, well apprised of the contagious effect of example; yet we are assured by a judicious historian, who assisted at the ceremony, that Rome was never replenished with less than two hundred thousand strangers; and another spectator has fixed at two millions the total concourse of the year. A trifling oblation from each individual would accumulate a royal treasure; and two priests stood day and night with rakes in their hands, to collect, without counting, the heaps of gold and silver that were poured on the altars."

The experiment far exceeded the expectation of either the Pope or the people, and the treasury was so amply replenished by the contributions of the pilgrims, that a century was naturally thought too distant an interval to secure so obvious an advantage for the Church. Clement VI., therefore, repeated the jubilee in A. D. 1350; and Urban VI., in A. D. 1389, reduced the interval to thirty-three years, the supposed length of time to which the life of our Lord on earth extended. Finally, Paul II., in 1475, established that the festival of the jubilee should be celebrated every twenty-five years, which continues to be the interval at which this great festival is observed. As a recent specimen of a jubilee bull, we make an extract from that which was issued by the Pope in 1824, appointing the jubilee for the following year: "We have resolved," says he, "by virtue of the authority given to us from heaven, fully to unlock that sacred treasure composed of the merits, sufferings, and virtues of Christ our Lord, and of his virgin mother, and of all the saints which the author of human salvation has intrusted to our dispensation. To you, therefore, venerable brethren, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, it belongs to explain with perspicuity the power of indulgences: what is their efficacy in the remission not only of the canonical penance, but also of the temporal punishment due to the divine justice for past sin; and what succour is afforded out of this heavenly treasure, from the merits of Christ and his saints, to such as have departed real penitents in God's love, yet before they had duly satisfied by fruits worthy of penance for sins of commission and omission, and are now purifying in the fire of Purgatory." The last jubilee took place in 1850, under the auspices of the present Pope, Pius IX.

JUDAISM, the system of doctrine and practice maintained by the Jews. See JEWS (ANCIENT), JEWS (MODERN).

JUDAIZING CHRISTIANS. The Christian church, at its first formation, was composed of two separate and distinct classes of converts—those drawn from the ranks of the Jews, and those drawn from the ranks of the heathens. The converts from Judaism brought with them into the Christian church many strong prejudices in favour of Jewish rites and observances, which they were most unwilling to regard as of temporary and not permanent obligation. Accordingly, we find the Judaizing party, at a very early period, making an effort to persuade Paul to yield to their views in circumcising Titus, though a Gentile convert. The Apostle firmly resisted their demands in this matter; but soon afterwards, some persons belonging to the same party followed him to Antioch, where they had almost succeeded, by their intemperate zeal, in raising a schism in the church. The points in dispute were referred to a meeting of the apostles and elders which was held at Jerusalem, where, after the most careful deliberation, it was agreed that circumcision should be declared not to be binding upon the Gentiles, and nothing farther was exacted than the abstaining from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; and by this arrangement, which was obviously intended for a transition state of the church, the opposition between the Jewish and Hellenist parties was broken down. (See BLOOD.) By the decision of the brethren at Jerusalem, harmony was restored in the church at Antioch. The Judaizing party, however, gradually increased to such an extent, that all the churches which Paul had planted were agitated by controversy, so that the Apostle's peace of mind was disturbed, and even his life endangered. In the heat of the controversy, the labours of the great Apostle of the Gentiles were brought to a close.

The ministry of the Apostle John in Asia Minor went far to reconcile the contending parties; but still the opposition of the Judaizing Christians was not wholly suppressed, and in the middle of the second century, the controversy raised by these zealots for the Mosaic law continued to be carried on with nearly as much vigour as in apostolic times. Nay, a church founded on Judaizing principles existed at Pella down to the fifth century. That there were other churches of the same kind in different places is in the highest degree probable, from the tenacity with which many Jewish converts adhered to the observance of the law of Moses. All Judaizers, however, in course of time, as we learn from Irenæus, came to be known by the name of EBIONITES (which see).

JUDGMENT-DAY. The time of the general judgment is a secret which God has reserved for himself. Hence we are expressly informed by the Redeemer, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven." From various expressions which occur in the Apostolic Epistles, it would appear that, at a very early period in the history of the Christian church, an idea began to be entertained by some that the day of the Lord was near. Thus, in the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, Paul beseeches them not to be shaken in mind or troubled, as if the day of Christ were at hand. It is called a day, but that term in Scripture is often used indefinitely, sometimes for a longer, sometimes a shorter period. What is to be the duration of the Judgment-Day we are in utter ignorance; but of one thing we are assured, that whereas "it is appointed unto all men once to die, after death cometh the judgment."

JUDGMENT-HALL or PILATE. The solemn scene of our Lord's appearance in the judgment-hall of the Roman governor, is represented in the course of the Romish ceremonies which are annually held at Rome during Holy Week. Mr Seymour thus describes it from personal observation:—"The gospel is read by three priests. One of them personates the evangelist who wrote the gospel; and his part is to read the narrative as detailed. A second personates Pontius Pilate, the maid at the door, the priests, the Pharisees; and his part is to read those sentences which were spoken by them. The third personates our Lord Jesus Christ; and his part is to read the words which were uttered by him on the occasion. To give the greater effect to the whole, the choir is appointed to undertake those parts which were the words of the multitude. The different voices of the priests reading or intoning their different parts—Pilate speaking in one voice, Christ in another, while the choir, breaking forth, till the whole of the vast church with the shout, 'Crucify him! Crucify him!' and again with the cry 'Not this man, but Barabbas!' produce a most singular effect."

JUDGMENT (GENERAL). That there will be a period of final retribution, when men shall be summoned to impartial judgment, according to their character and actions, is a doctrine both of reason and revelation. The simple notion of a Supreme Being necessarily supposes him to be possessed of perfect justice, as well as the other moral attributes which are essential to his character as the ruler of the universe. On contemplating, however, the state of matters around us, we cannot fail to be struck with the evident inequality of the distribution of the goods and ills of this life. The wicked may often be seen to spend their days in prosperity, and the righteous in adversity and sorrow. Such an anomalous arrangement as this seems plainly to point to a period of future adjustment, when each man shall receive his final recompense, according to the deeds done in the body, whether they have been good, or whether they have been evil. If there is a just God, who sits upon the throne of the universe, the inference is undoubted, that it must ultimately be well with the righteous, and ill with the wicked. Hence, among the unenlightened heathen, in all ages, the belief has uniformly prevailed of a general judgment. In ancient times, the idolaters of Greece and Rome believed that when the souls of men left their bodies at death, they appeared before certain judges—Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Æacus—who, after an impartial investigation, pronounced sentence upon them, consigning them either to the abodes of bliss, or to the regions of torment. The notions of the heathen, however, referred solely to a private and individual, not to a public and general judgment.

It is to the Holy Scriptures alone that we are indebted for the knowledge of a general judgment, which will take place in the sight of an assembled universe. The following passages, among others, clearly establish this point: Acts xvii. 31, "Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead;" 2 Cor. v. 10, "For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad;" Mat. xxv. 31, 32, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." "A general judgment," says Dr. Dick, "at which all the descendants of Adam will be present, seems necessary to the display of the justice of God, to such a manifestation of it as will vindicate his government from all the charges which impiety has brought against it, satisfy all doubts, and leave a conviction in the minds of all intelligent creatures that he is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works. It is expedient that, at the winding up of the scheme, all its parts should be seen to be worthy of Him by whom it was arranged and conducted. In this way, those who have witnessed, with many disquieting thoughts, the irregularity and disorder in the present system, will have ocular evidence that there never was the slightest deviation from the principles of equity, and that the cause of perplexity was the delay of their full operation. They will see the good and the bad no longer mingled together, and apparently treated alike, but separated into two classes, the one on the right hand of the Judge, and the other on his left, and distinguished as much at least by their respective sentences as by the places which they occupy. We perceive, then, the reason that the judgment passed upon each individual at the termination of his life will be solemnly ratified at the end of the world. There may be another reason for the public exercise of justice in the final allotment of the human race. It may be intended to be a spectacle to the universe; it may be an act of the divine administration, which will extend its influence to all the provinces of his empire. We are sure that angels will witness it; and if there are other orders of rational creatures, it may be a solemn lesson to them, by which they will be confirmed in fidelity to their Creator, and filled with more profound veneration of his infinite excellencies."

The Day of Judgment is the last article in the creed of the Mohammedans. It will be ushered in, as they believe, by the angel Israfil, who will sound a trumpet, the first blast of which will not only overthrow cities, but level mountains; the second, that of extermination, will annihilate all the inhabitants of earth, and lastly the angel of death; and at the third, or blast of resurrection, they will be restored to life, and rise to the final judgment. All will appear naked; but those who are designed for Paradise will receive clothes, and, during the trial of the wicked, will surround the throne of God. The judgment, according to the Moslem notions, is thus described in Algazali's creed:—"He shall also believe in the balance wherein, with the weights of atoms and mustard seeds, works will be weighed with the utmost exactness. Then the books of the good works, beautiful to behold, will be cast into the scale of light, by which the balance shall be depressed according to their degrees with God, out of the favour of God and the books of evil deeds into the scale of darkness, by which the balance shall lightly ascend, by the justice of the Most High. It must also be believed that there is a real way extended over the middle of hell, sharper than a sword, and finer than a hair, on which, by the divine decree, the feet of unbelievers shall slip, so that they shall fall into the fire, while the feet of believers will remain firm on it, and they will be led into an habitation that will last. It must also be believed that the faithful will then drink out of Mohammed's lake, which will prevent their thirsting any more. Its breadth is a month's journey, and the water is whiter than milk and sweeter than honey; the cups placed round are as numerous as the stars, and it is supplied by two pipes from the river Cauther. Men must also believe in the final reckoning, which will be strict with some, with others more indulgent, while they who are near to God will enter the garden without any. Then God will question any of his prophets whom he pleases concerning his mission, and whom he pleases of the unbelievers the reason of their accusing as liars those who were sent to them. He will also interrogate heretics concerning the Sunnah, and the Moslems concerning their works."

Throughout almost the whole of the tenth century, Europe was agitated with the expectation that the day of general judgment and final consummation was at hand. The idea was founded on Rev. xx. 2—4,

"And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season. And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." This passage was interpreted to mean, that after a thousand years from the birth of Christ, Satan would be let loose. Antichrist would appear, and the end of the world would come. Accordingly, the utmost excitement and alarm prevailed. Many, transferring their property to the churches and monasteries, set out for Palestine, where they supposed Christ would come down from heaven to judge the world. Others gave up their all to the priests and monks; while in many instances the deed of gift distinctly bore as its reason these words, "The end of the world being now at hand." Not before the close of the century did the delusion finally pass away. From that period down to the present day, individuals have occasionally been found who have persuaded themselves, and sought to convince others, that the final judgment was near. But the precise time when that great event will happen is wisely concealed, that men may be always on the watch, seeking ever to be ready; for at such an hour as we think not the Son of man cometh.

JUDICIUM DEI. See ORDEAL.

JUGA, or JUGALIS, a surname of JENO (which see), as presiding over marriage. She had a temple under this name in the forum at Rome.

JUGATINUS, a god of marriage among the ancient Romans.

JUGGERNATH, or JAGAT-NATH (the lord of the world), a popular object of worship in the district of Cuttack, on the sea-coast of Orissa, in Hindustan. This Hindu deity is a form of Vishnu. The pagoda or temple dedicated to the worship of Juggernath stands close to the sea-shore, and, from its peculiar prominence, serves as an important sea-mark in guiding mariners to the mouth of the Ganges. The image is a carved block of wood, of frightful aspect, painted black, with a distended mouth of a bloody colour. On festival days, the throne of the idol is placed upon a stupendous moveable tower, sixty feet high, resting on wheels. Juggernath is accompanied with two other idols, of a white and yellow colour, each on a separate tower, and sitting upon thrones of nearly an equal height. Attached to the principal tower are six ropes, by which the people drag it along. The officiating high priest is stationed in front of the idol, and all around it are thousands of massive sculptures, which emblematically represent those scenes of revolting indecency and horrid cruelty which are the essential characteristics of this worship. The procession of the idol is thus described by Mr. Sterling, in his 'Account of Orissa':—"On the appointed day, after various prayers and ceremonies, the images are brought from their throne to the outside of the Lion-gate, not with decency and reverence, but a cord being fastened round their necks, they are dragged by the priests down the steps and through the mud, while others keep their figures erect, and help their movements by shoving from behind, in the most indifferent and unceremonious manner. Thus the monstrous idols go, rocking and pitching along, through the crowd, until they reach the cars, which they are made to ascend by a similar process, up an inclined platform, reaching from the stage of the machine to the ground. On the other hand, a powerful sentiment of religious enthusiasm pervades the admiring multitude of pilgrims when the images first make their appearance through the gate. They welcome them with shouts and cries; and when the monster Juggernaut, the most hideous of all, is dragged forth, the last in order, the air is rent with acclamations. After the images have been safely lodged in their vehicles, a box is brought forth, containing the golden or gilded feet, hands, and ears of the great idol, which are fixed on the proper parts with due ceremony, and a scarlet scarf is carefully arranged round the lower part of the body, or pedestal. The joy and shouts of the crowd on the first movement of the cars, the creaking sound of the wheels, as these ponderous machines roll along, the clatter of hundreds of harsh-sounding instruments, and the general appearance of such an immense mass of human beings, produce an astounding effect."

As the car moves with its monstrous idol, numbers of devotees cast themselves under its wheels, and are instantly crushed to pieces; while such instances of self-immolation are hailed with the acclamations of applauding thousands. The worship of this idol in his temple exhibits only a scene of the most disgusting obscenity. The temple of Juggernaut is regarded as the most sacred of all the Hindu places of worship, and immense crowds of pilgrims resort thither annually, calculated by the late Dr. Carey to amount to 1,200,000, multitudes of whom die by the way from want, disease, or exhaustion. At fifty miles' distance, the sands are whitened with the skulls and bones of pilgrims, who have perished before reaching the sacred spot.

The temple of this deity at Orissa is undoubtedly the most celebrated of all the buildings erected for his worship, but many other shrines sacred to Juggernaut are found throughout Hindustan. "As there are numbers of sacred rivers in India," says Dr. Duff, "but the Ganges, from being the most sacred, has acquired a monopoly of fame—so there are many shrines of Juggernaut in India, though the one at Puri, from being the largest and most venerated, has, in like manner, acquired exclusive celebrity. In hundreds, or rather thousands of places, where there are no temples, properly so called, there are still images and cars of Juggernaut, fashioned after the model of the great prototypes at Orissa. There is scarcely a large village in all Bengal without its car of Juggernaut. In Calcutta and its neighbourhood there are scores of them—varying in size from a few feet up to thirty or forty in height. What a view must open up to you of the fearful extent and magnitude of this destructive superstition, when you try to realize the fact, that, on the anniversary occasion of the car-festival, all the millions of Bengal are in motion; that, when the great car at Puri is dragged forth amid the shouts and acclamations of hundreds of thousands assembled from all parts of India, on the very same day, and at the very same hour, there are hundreds of cars rolled along throughout the widely scattered districts and cities and villages of the land; so that there are not merely hundreds of thousands, but literally millions, simultaneously engaged in the celebration of orgies, so stained with licentiousness and blood, that, in the comparison, we might almost pronounce the Bacchanalia of Greece and Rome innocent and pure!"

JUHLES, a name given to aerial spirits or demons among the Laplanders, from whom they receive a sort of adoration, though no statues or images of them exist. This spirit-worship is conducted under particular trees. On Christmas Eve, and the day following, they celebrate what is called the Festival of the Juhles. On this occasion there is a strict abstinence from animal food; and of the articles used for refreshment, they carefully reserve some fragments, which are thrown into a box made of birch, and suspended from the branch of a tree behind the house, that the spirits may have an opportunity of feasting upon them. Scheffer considers this festival as partaking partly of a Christian and partly of a Pagan character.

JU-JU. See FETISH-WORSHIP.

JUMALA, the supreme deity of the inhabitants of Lapland. He was represented by a wooden idol in human form, seated on a sort of altar, with a crown on his head and a bowl in his lap, into which the devotees threw their voluntary oblations. See LAPLANDERS (RELIGION OF).

JUMNOUTRI, a village on the banks of the river Jumna, and considered by the Hindus as a spot of remarkable sanctity—Hindus who perform the pilgrimage to this place from the low countries being themselves almost deified after this adventure. Along the banks of this river are a race of Hindus who, like the Parsees, worship the sun. The devout among them will on no account taste food while the orb is above the horizon, and many are found who refuse to sit down during the day while the sun is visible.

JUMPERS, a name given to those who practised jumping or leaping as an exercise of divine worship, and expressive of holy joy. This strange practice was commenced about the year 1760 in the western part of Wales, among the followers of Harris, Rowland, Williams, and others, who were instrumental in giving rise to a serious awakening among the people in that district. The novel custom was disapproved by not a few of those who waited on the ministry of these pious and zealous men; but it was seriously defended in a pamphlet published at the time by Mr. William Williams, who is generally termed the Welsh poet. The arguments of this singular production were chiefly drawn from Scripture. The practice which gave rise to the name of Jumpers, spread over a great part of Wales, and it was no uncommon thing to find congregations when engaged in solemn worship disturbed by individuals groaning, talking aloud, repeating the same words thirty or forty times in succession; some crying in Welsh, glory, glory, others bawling Amen with a loud voice, and others still jumping until they fell down quite exhausted. Mr. Evans, in his Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian world, describes a meeting among Jumpers which he himself witnessed. "About the year 1785," says he, "I myself happened very accidentally to be present at a meeting, which terminated in jumping. It was held in the open air, on a Sunday evening, near Newport, in Monmouthshire. The preacher was one of Lady Huntingdon's students, who concluded his sermon with the recommendation of jumping; and to allow him the praise of consistency, he got down from the chair on which he stood, and jumped along with them. The arguments he adduced for this purpose were, that David danced before the ark—that the babe leaped in the womb of Elizabeth—and that the man whose lameness was removed, leaped and praised God for the mercy which he had received. He expatiated on these topics with uncommon fervency, and then drew the inference, that they ought to show similar expressions of joy, for the blessings which Jesus Christ had put into their possession. He then gave an impassioned sketch of the sufferings of the Saviour, and hereby roused the passions of a few around him into a state of violent agitation. About nine men and seven women, for some little time, rocked to and fro, groaned aloud, and then jumped with a kind of frantic fury. Some of the audience flew in all directions; others gazed on in silent amazement! They all gradually dispersed, except the jumpers, who continued their exertions from eight in the evening to near eleven at night. I saw the conclusion of it; they at last kneeled down in a circle, holding each other by the hand, while one of them prayed with great fervour, and then all rising up from off their knees, departed. But previous to their dispersion, they wildly pointed up towards the sky, and reminded one another that they should soon meet there, and be never again separated! I quitted the spot with astonishment." Such scenes as that now described could only have occurred among people of a wario, fervid, enthusiastic temperament, whose feelings had been wrought up to a high pitch of religious excitement.

JUNO, a heathen goddess regarded by the ancient Romans as the Queen of Heaven. She corresponds to the HERRA (which see) of the Greeks. This female divinity was worshipped at Rome from very early times, and at a later period she had a temple reared to her honour on the Aventine hill. She was the special protector and patron of the female sex, and presided over all connected with marriage. Women sacrificed to her on their birth-day, but more especially at the festival of the Matronalia, on the 1st of March. The month of June, which received its name from this goddess, was considered in ancient times as a particularly suitable period for marriage. A law was passed at Rome in the reign of Numa, that no prostitute should be allowed to touch the altar of Juno, and if she did happen to touch it, that she should appease the offended goddess by offering a female lamb in sacrifice.

JUPITER, the lord of heaven among the ancient Romans, who presided over all celestial phenomena, such as thunder, rain, hail, and all atmospheric changes. He was the husband of JUNO (which see.) When the people wished for rain, they directed their prayers to Jupiter. He was regarded as the best and greatest of the gods, and therefore his temple occupied a conspicuous position on the summit of the Capitoline hill. He was the special guardian and protector of Rome; hence the first official act of a consul was to sacrifice to this god, and a general who had been successful in the field offered up his special thanks to Jupiter. The Roman games and Feriæ were celebrated in his honour. All human events were under the control of this deity, and, accordingly, Jupiter was invoked at the commencement of any undertaking, whether sacred or secular. Rams were sacrificed to Jupiter on the ides of every month, and in the beginning of every week. He was the guardian of law, and the patron of justice and virtue. The white colour was sacred to him, and white animals were sacrificed to propitiate him. The Jupiter of the Romans was identical with the Zeus of the Greeks, and the Ammon of the Egyptians.

JUSTICE, an essential attribute of the Divine Being as he is described in the Word of God, where we are informed that he is "just and true in all his ways," as well as "holy in all his works." This moral attribute of Deity has been distinguished into absolute and relative, universal and particular. The one refers to the absolute rectitude of his nature, the other to his character and actings as a moral governor. The one, therefore, regards what he is in himself, the other what he is in relation to his creatures.

JUSTICERS (ITINERANT), officers appointed by Richard Cœur de Lion, king of England, to watch over the interests of the Jews resident within the kingdom. They were instructed to protect the Hebrews against all oppression, to secure them in their interests and property, to decide all controversies or quarrels between them and the Christians, to keep the seal of their corporation, and the keys of their public treasury. The Justicers, in short, were to superintend the civil affairs of the Jews throughout all parts of England.

JUTURNA, the nymph of a well in Latium, the water of which was considered so peculiarly sacred, that it was used in almost all sacrifices. A chapel was dedicated to this nymph at Rome in the Campus Martius, and sacrifices were offered to her on 11th January both by the state and by private individuals.

K

KAABA, a building at Mecca, in Arabia, which has long been famed as the annual resort of multitudes of Mohammedan pilgrims. The legendary history of its origin is curious. When Adam and Eve were driven out of Paradise, Adam fell on the mountain in Ceylon which is still known by the name of Adam's Peak, where the print of Adam's foot is still shown; and the mountain is regarded as sacred both by the Buddhists and Mohammedans. Eve, on the other hand, fell on the shore of the Red Sea, where the fort of Jeddah now stands, and the tomb of Eve, at the gate of the town, is one of the sacred places to be visited in the Hadj. For two hundred years our first parents are said to have wandered over the earth in search of each other, and at length they met together on Mount Ararat. Delighted at discovering his beloved partner, Adam lifted up his hands in thanksgiving to God, and implored that another of the blessings he had lost might be restored to him, namely, the shrine in Paradise at which he had been wont to worship, and round which the angels used to move in adoring processions. His prayer was heard, and a tabernacle formed of radiant clouds was lowered down by the hands of angels, towards which Adam thenceforth turned in prayer, and walked round it daily seven times, in imitation of the sacred processions of the angels.

When Adam died, the tabernacle of clouds was again taken up into heaven, and another similar in form was built of stone and clay in the same place by Seth, the son of Adam. The Deluge, of course, washed this building away, and it is said to have been rebuilt by Ishmael, assisted by his father Abraham. While engaged in rearing this building, the angel Gabriel brought them a stone, said to have been one of the precious stones of Paradise, which they inserted in a corner of the outer wall of the Kaaba, where it remains to this day, to be devoutly kissed by the Hadj or pilgrim to Mecca. The present Kaaba is of no great antiquity, having been renewed no fewer than eight times, and, as far as could be, with the old materials, a reddish sand-stone. The singular appearance of the structure, however, affords strong evidence that it has been scrupulously restored after the original design. The last building was nearly washed away by a torrent which inundated the town, and the present was erected so late as 1624 by Amurath IV. It was rebuilt before Mohammed had commenced his public career, and it is curious that he should have been the person chosen to lift the black stone into its place.

The appearance of the Kaaba is thus described by Burckhardt the traveller:—"It contains but one small apartment, then level with the ground, but now raised so much above it, that it can only be entered by a moveable ladder. The walls are hung with a rich red silk, interwoven with flowers and silver inscriptions, which was replaced by the Pasha, and the old hangings were cut up and sold to devotees at enormous prices. The room is opened only three days in the year, and many pilgrims never enter it, for it is not obligatory: it can receive very few at a time, and a fee is exacted, to the indignation of the devout, who regard it as desecrating the holiest spot upon earth. It is customary to pray on entering, and I overheard ejaculations which seemed to come from the heart:—'O God of the Koran, forgive me, my parents, and my children, and deliver our necks from hell fire.' The Kaaba must have a singular appearance, for it is visible for no more than a fortnight, being constantly clothed with a black damask veil, in which prayers are embroidered, and as this material, an animal product, is unclean, it is lined with cotton. Openings are left for the sight of the black and white stones. Both are said to have been once of the same colour, which the first is reported to have lost in consequence of sin; but the surface has probably been blackened by time, aided by the kisses and touches of a long succession of pilgrims. It is an irregular oval, seven inches in diameter, apparently a mass of smaller stones conglomerated in a cement, and encircled by a silver band. It is probably an aërolite, and owes its reputation, like many others, to its fall from the sky. This house of God, as it is called, is said to have been first clothed by the Hamyarite kings of Yemen, seven centuries before the birth of the Prophet; and these covers used to be put on one over another, till the end of the first century of Islam. It has since been yearly renewed, and the old cover cut up. The privilege of clothing it, which was assumed by Kelau, Sultan of Egypt, on the conquest of that country by Selim, passed over to him and his successors. An adequate idea of the building may be formed from the views in Reland and Sale, and especially that in D'Oshon's work. It stands in an oblong square 250 paces by 200, but as it has been enlarged, it no longer occupies the centre. It is nearly enclosed by a circle of slight pillars at a little distance, around which are the four stations for the orthodox sects."

The Mohammedans generally believe that if all the pilgrims were at the same moment to visit the Kaaba, the enclosure would contain them all. Barchhardt calculates that 35,000 might attend, but he never could count more of them than 10,000.

KABIR PANTHIS, the followers, among the Hindus, of Kabir, whom they allege to have been the incarnate Deity, who, in the form of a child, was found floating on a lotus in a lake or pond near Benares, by the wife of a weaver named Nimá, who, with her husband Nuri, was attending a wedding procession. The Kabir Panthis believe that their founder was present in the world three hundred years, or from A. D. 1149 to A. D. 1449. The probability is, that he lived at the latter of these two periods, more especially as Nanak Shah, who began to teach about A. D. 1490, and who originated the Hindu sect of the Sikhs, is considered to have been deeply indebted to the writings of his predecessor Kabir. The Moslems claim Kabir as having been a professor of the faith of Islam, and a contest is said to have arisen between them and the Hindus respecting the disposal of his corpse, the latter insisting on burning, the former on burying it. In the midst of this dispute, Kabir himself is said to have appeared, and desiring them to look under the cloth supposed to cover his mortal remains, immediately vanished; but, on obeying his instructions, they found nothing under the cloth but a heap of flowers, one-half of which was removed to Benares, and burnt, whilst the head of the Mohammedan party erected a tomb over the other portion at the place where Kabir had died.

The Kabir Panthis being chiefly favourers of Vishnu, are included among the Vaishnava sects; but it is no part of their faith to worship any Hindu deity, or to observe any of the rites or ceremonies of the Hindus, whether orthodox or schismatical. Those of the members of the sect who mingle with the world, conform outwardly to all the usages of their tribe and caste, and some of them even pretend to worship the Hindu gods, though this is not considered consistent with their tenets. Those, however, who have retired from the world, and given themselves up to a life of seclusion, abstain from all the ordinary practices of the Hindus, and employ themselves chiefly in chanting hymns to the invisible Kabir. They use no

Mantra nor fixed form of salutation; they have no peculiar mode of address. The frontal marks, if worn, are usually those of the Vaishnava sects, or they make a streak with sandal-wood or gopichandana along the ridges of the nose. A necklace and rosary of Tulasi are also worn by them; but all these outward signs are considered of no importance, and the inward man is the only essential point to be attended to.

Professor H. H. Wilson thus explains some of the characteristic doctrines of the Kabir Panthis:—"They admit of but one God, the creator of the world; and, in opposition to the Vedanta notions of the absence of every quality and form, they assert that he has body, formed of the five elements of matter, and that he has mind endowed with the three Gunas, or qualities of being; of course of ineffable purity and irresistible power: he is free from the defects of human nature, and can assume what particular shape he will; in all other respects he does not differ from man, and the pure man, the Sádhí of the Kabir sect, is his living resemblance, and after death is his associate and equal; he is eternal, without end or beginning, as, in fact, is the elementary matter of which he consists, and of which all things are made, residing in him before they took their present form, as the parts of the tree abide in the seed, or flesh, blood, and bone may be considered to be present in the seminal fluid: from the latter circumstance, and the identity of their essential nature, proceeds the doctrine, that God and man are not only the same, but that they are both in the same manner, every thing that lives and moves and has its being: other sects have adopted these phrases literally, but the followers of Kabir do not mean by them to deny the individuality of being, and only intend these texts as assertions of all nature originally participating in common elementary principles." "The moral code of the Kabir Panthis," says the same eminent Orientalist, "is short, but, if observed faithfully, is of a rather favourable tendency. Life is the gift of God, and must not, therefore, be violated by his creatures. Humanity is, consequently, a cardinal virtue, and the shedding of blood, whether of man or animal, a heinous crime. Truth is the other great principle of their code, as all the ills of the world, and ignorance of God, are attributable to original falsehood. Retirement from the world is desirable, because the passions and desires, the hopes and fears, which the social state engenders, are all hostile to tranquillity and purity of spirit, and prevent that undisturbed meditation on man and God which is necessary to their comprehension. The last great point is the usual sum and substance of every sect amongst the Hindus, implicit devotion in word, act, and thought to the Gurn, or spiritual guide: in this, however, the characteristic spirit of the Kabir Panthis appears, and the pupil is enjoined to scrutinize his teacher's doctrines and acts, and to be first satisfied that he is the sage he pretends to be, before he resigns himself to his control. This sect, indeed, is remarkably liberal in this respect, and the most frequently recurring texts of Kabir are those which enforce an attentive examination of the doctrine that he offers to his disciples. The chief of each community has absolute authority over his dependants: the only punishments he can award, however, are moral, not physical—irregular conduct is visited by reproof and admonition: if the offender does not reform, the Guru refuses to receive his salutation; if still incurable, the only further infliction is expulsion from the fraternity."

The sect of Kabir Panthis is very widely diffused throughout Hindustan. It is split into a variety of subdivisions, and there are actually twelve branches of it traced up to the founder, among whom a difference of opinion as well as descent prevails. Of the establishments of this sect, the Kabir Chaura at Benares is pre-eminent in dignity, and it is constantly visited by wandering members of the sect. The Kabir Panthis are very numerous in all the provinces of Upper and Central India, except, perhaps, in Bengal itself. Their doctrines are taught in a great variety of works in different dialects of India; but the great authority to which they are wont to refer is the Vijek, which, however, rather inveighs against other systems than explains its own.

KADR (AL), the title of the ninety-seventh chapter of the Koran, which contains an account of God's sending down the Koran to Mohammed from heaven. Hence it represents God as saying, "The night of Al Kadr is better than a thousand months." Mohammedan doctors are by no means agreed what night Al Kadr really is, but the majority of them consider it to be one of the ten last nights of the Ramadan. They believe that in this night the divine decrees for the ensuing year are annually fixed and settled.

KAFFIRS (RELIGION OF THE). The word Kaffir, which signifies unbeliever, is now confined to the inhabitants of Kaffirland, in South Africa. It was given, however, by the Moorish navigators of the Indian Ocean to the inhabitants of the south-eastern coast of Africa, and was borrowed from them by the Portuguese. The Kaffirs form one tribe of the great Bechmana family, and their country, which lies beyond the Fish River, is bounded by the ocean on the south, and a range of mountains on the north, and beyond them lie the Ama-pondo and Zoolu tribes. The Kaffirs are in personal appearance a remarkably handsome race of men, bold and warlike in their character, of lofty stature and graceful deportment. They wear no clothing but a cloak of skin. They are a pastoral people, and their flocks and herds constitute their chief care. They have been generally alleged to be altogether destitute of a form of religion of any kind, and that the utmost which can be said of them in this respect is, that they retain a few unmeaning rites and ceremonies of a superstitious kind. It is of importance, however, to remark, that, for fifty years past, the Kaffirs have been in contact with Christian missionaries and colonists, and thus have been learning something about God; so that it is now difficult to distinguish between their former and their present knowledge. Mr. Moffat says that they are utterly destitute of theological ideas. Dr. Vanderkemp, the first missionary who laboured among them, gives this testimony as to the extent of their religious knowledge:—"If by religion we mean reverence for God, or the external action by which that reverence is expressed, I never could perceive that they had any religion, or any idea of the existence of God. I am speaking nationally, for there are many individuals who have some notion of his existence, which they have received from adjacent nations. A decisive proof of the truth of what I here say with respect to the national atheism of the Kaffirs is, that they have no word in their language to express the idea of the Deity, the individuals just mentioned calling him Thiko, which is a corruption of the name by which God is called in the language of the Hottentots, literally signifying, one that induces pain."

We learn, however, from Mr. Moffat, who has laboured for many years as a missionary in South Africa, that the Kaffirs use the word Uhlanga to denote the Supreme Being; but the probability is, that the god whom they describe by this name is no other than a deified chief or hero, who at some remote period had attained distinction in their country. Their ideas of the most elementary religious truths are undoubtedly obscure and indistinct, and yet they have some superstitious rites which deserve to be noticed. Mr. Laing, a missionary now labouring in Kaffirland, has kindly communicated to us an account of their present customs, which we present in his own words:—"I. Circumcision. Young men are circumcised about the age of puberty. I could never observe anything of a religious nature connected with this custom. When the rite is performed, the young men are separated from society, and paint themselves white. A hut is made for them, and they live a few months apart from the rest of the people; but at the various kraals from which they come, dances from time to time are held, the young men being painted white, and dressed in a short kilt made of the leaves of a particular tree, which are kept constantly shaking by the motions of the body. When the term of separation comes to an end, the young men, after burning their clothes and hut, and performing certain washings, are admitted into the society of men, and treated as such. This seems to fix the Kaffir circumcision as a civil rite. A person who has not been circumcised, though a man by years, was formerly, and in heathen districts is still, despised. A number of Christian young men, who left off the custom of circumcision so far as I know, are able to maintain a respectable position in life even in the eyes of their heathen neighbours, though uncircumcised. There are immoral practices connected with the dances which, not to speak of the apostolic letter which frees us from this burden, render this custom incompatible with Christianity.

"2. Tsivivane. Any traveller going through Kaffir-land, will see here and there heaps of stones thrown down, without any reference to order. Some of these heaps are large, indicating, I think, that the Kaffirs must have been a considerable time in possession of the country. What are these Tsivivane? They are lasting proofs that the Kaffirs sought success in their enterprises from some unseen being. When out on a journey, they were accustomed to throw a stone to one of these Tsivivane, and to pray for success in their expedition. They could, however, give no definite account of the nature of the being from whom they sought aid. Along the paths it is not uncommon to see the tall grass knotted. This I understand to be a custom similar to the Tsivivane, viz., a means of seeking good speed in their journey.

"3. Witchcraft. In common with many, perhaps all nations in some period of their history, the Kaffirs believe in witchcraft, and have been in the habit of punishing witches in the most cruel manner. They looked on these characters as the most wicked of mankind, and not fit to live. I never could find that they had a correct idea of the general depravity of man, and their view of sin is best explained by our word crime. They would often deny that they had sin, but as to witches being sinners they never had a doubt. They connected the effects of witchcraft with certain substances, such as hair, blood, nail-parings, or other fragments of the human body, and this thing which bewitched they called Ubuti. Other substances were used, as they held, for the purpose of bewitching. These witches (I mean the word to be applied to men and women) were believed to exert a powerful though unseen influence over their victims, even to the depriving them of life.

"4. Idini—Sacrifice. This rite is performed to the ancestors of the Kaffirs, not to the Supreme Being. They seem to think that by burning fat, or rather bones to them, they can appease their anger. These Idinis, so far as I know, were seldom offered. The idea of sacrifice seems to be connected with them, as they were practised for the purpose of averting evil.

"5. Hero worship. I have heard an intelligent man, yet a rude heathen, avowing that he and his people were worshippers of famous ancestors. There must have been some traces of such idolatry, from what I have heard; but this kind of worship appears to have been dying out about the time the missionaries arrived.

"6. Future state. When we spoke to the Kaffirs as to the immortality of the soul, they told us that they knew nothing of its existence after the death of the body. From some expressions which they make use of to the dying, or in reference to them after they are dead, it seems that at one time they must have believed in the immortality of the soul. For example, to a person who is about to die they will say, 'You are going home to day—look on us.'

"7. By touching a dead body, they become unclean.

"8. When a husband dies, his wife or wives go out to the field or woods for a time."

From all that can be ascertained on the religion of the Kaffirs, it seems that those of them who are still in their heathen state have no idea, (1.) of a Supreme Intelligent Ruler of the universe; (2.) of a Sabbath; (3.) of a day of judgment; (4.) of the guilt and pollution of sin; (5.) of a Saviour to deliver them from the wrath to come.

KALOMORTS, the primitive man, according to the Zendavesta, of the ancient Persians. See ABISTA.

KALA (MAHA), the male form of the Hindu god Shiva, in his character of Time, the great destroyer of all things.

KALENDERS (pure gold), wandering Dervishes among the Mohammedans, whose souls are supposed to be purified by severe penances. To this degraded class belong the spies, the assassins, and the plunderers that we read of among the Dervishes; and from them also have sprung numerous false prophets at different times. Their pretensions, however, are encouraged only by the lowest ranks of society, and they are not acknowledged as brethren by the members of the regular confraternities. In India these Mussulman mendicants are not numerous, and they are held in little esteem. They wear in that country a peculiar costume, consisting of a conical felt hat worked into chequers of white, red, and black; and their gown, which descends from the neck to the calf of the leg, is of diamond-shaped patches of the same colours. A few gourds for carrying water are hung over the shoulder or at the waist; and usually a bright steel rod, sometimes headed with a trident, completes their equipment. They never marry, but are of habits exceedingly dissolute and debauched, and are always most sturdy and importunate beggars. They regard themselves as objects of the special favour of Heaven.

KALI (MAHA), a Hindu goddess, the personified energy or consort of Shiva under a peculiar form. This is the most cruel and revengeful of all the Hindu divinities. Such is her thirst for blood, that in one of her forms she is represented as having "actually cut her own throat, that the blood issuing thence might spout into her mouth." Images of this disgusting spectacle are at this day to be seen in some districts of Bengal. All tortures which a devotee can possibly inflict upon himself are considered as agreeable to her. If he should cut off a portion of his own flesh, and present it as a burnt sacrifice, the offering would be most acceptable. Dr. Duff informs us that "by the blood drawn from fishes and tortoises the goddess is pleased one month; a crocodile's blood will please her three; that of certain wild animals nine; that of a bull or guana a year; an antelope or wild boar's twelve years; a buffalo's, rhinoceros's, or tiger's, a hundred; a lion's, a reindeer's, or a man's (mark the combination), a thousand.

But by the blood of three men slain in sacrifice she is pleased a hundred thousand years." Robbers, thieves, and murderers, lawless desperadoes, in short, of every kind, worship Kali as their avowed patroness, and offer bloody sacrifices to propitiate the favour and secure the protection of the goddess. The Thugs, in particular, conduct their sanguinary depredations under her special auspices. In honour of Kali, one of the most popular of the Hindu festivals is annually observed with great pomp and ceremony—the CHARAK PUJAH (which see), or swinging festival. Private sacrifices are sometimes offered to Kali, an instance of which is quoted by Dr. Duff, from the statement of a British officer of high character:—"A Hindu Faquir," dressed in a fantastical garb, worked upon the mind of a wealthy high-caste Brahman woman, to the extent of making her believe that he was her spiritual guide, charged with a message from the goddess, demanding a human sacrifice. She declared herself ready to obey the divine order, and asked who was the victim. The Faquir pointed to her own son, a young man about twenty-five years old, the heir to the family property. The deluded mother waited till the unconscious youth was asleep, and in the silence of the night she struck him on the head with an axe, and killed him. This done, she cut up the body, under the direction of her spiritual guide, the Faquir—presented a part, boiled with rice, as a peace offering, with the usual ceremonies, to the image of the goddess; part to the wretch who personified the spiritual messenger; the rest she buried with so little care, that the place of its deposit was discovered by the vultures hovering over the ground, and thus brought to the notice of the English commissioner by the police."

KALI-YUG, the last of the chronological cycles of the Hindus, through which the world is said to be at present passing, when the powers of darkness and disorder have become predominant in the soul of man, and when external nature groans beneath the burden of iniquity.

KALIKA PURANA, one of the divine writings of the Hindus, which is chiefly devoted to a recital of the different modes of worshipping and appeasing the goddess KALI (which see).

KALKI AVATAR, the tenth and last of the AVATARS (which see), when Vishnu, in human form and seated on a white horse, shall give the signal for the destruction of this visible universe.

KALPA, in Hindu chronology, a day of Brahma, equal to four thousand three hundred and twenty millions of solar years.

KAMAC, the god of love among the Hindus.

KAMIMITSI. See SINTOISTS.

KAMISIMO, a garment of ceremony among the Japanese, worn on festivals and other solemn occasions. It consists of two parts, a short cloak, without sleeves, called katageno, and a sort of petticoat called wakama, fastened about the waist by a band. Both are of a particular form, and of coloured stuffs.

They are used only on days of ceremony and at funerals.

KAMTSCHADALES (RELIGION OF). See SHAMANISTS.

KAMYU-MURUNU (desire for death), modes of suicide formerly prescribed in the Shastras or Sacred Books of the Hindus. The commonest mode is drowning in the Ganges, but sometimes the self-murderer submits to being buried alive. In certain temples in India there was formerly an instrument by which a person could decapitate himself. It consisted of a sharp crescent shaped instrument, with a chain and stirrup at each horn. The devotee placed the sharp edge on the back of his neck, and his feet in the stirrups, then gave a violent jerk with his legs, and his head was instantly severed from his body.

KANCHELIYAS, a sect of Hindus which is said to be not uncommon in the south of India, and whose worship is that of Sakti, the personified energy of the divine nature in action. It is said to be distinguished by one peculiar rite, the object of which is to confound all the ties of female alliance, and to enforce not only a community of women amongst the votaries, but disregard even to natural restraints.

KANTIANIS, a sect of German thinkers in the last century, who adopted the philosophical principles of Emmanuel Kant. This eminent philosopher was born at Königsberg in 1724. His mind early displayed a taste for the study of abstract truth, which rendered him so conspicuous in this department, that, while yet a comparatively young man, he was appointed professor of logic and metaphysics in the university of his native town. In the course of a long life, he made such valuable discoveries in abstract science, that he gave rise to a new school of German philosophy, the influence of which has extended down to the present day. The work in which he first developed his own peculiar principles was his 'Critique of Pure Reason,' which he published in 1781, following it up by various other treatises explanatory of his philosophical system in its different bearings.

The Kantian philosophy was designed, in the first instance, to meet and to neutralize the sceptical principles set forth by David Hume, who, by attempting to trace all truth to experience, unsettled the foundations of human knowledge. The philosopher of Königsberg, however, showed that, independently altogether of experience, there are a priori principles which originate solely from the operation of the mind itself, and are distinct from any sensible element. Thus Kant pointed out the very important distinction between a priori and a posteriori knowledge.

Another distinction of great importance was first clearly developed by Kant, that, namely, between analytic and synthetic judgments. In the former, as he showed, the attribute or predicate is necessarily contained in the subject; while in the latter it is not contained in, but is distinct from the subject. The former judgments, therefore, are a priori, and the latter are some of them a priori and others a posteriori. Human knowledge, according to this system, is composed of two elements, the empirical or a posteriori element, and the transcendental or a priori element, which is derived from the intelligence. In the Kantian philosophy there are three faculties: Perception, which has to do with single objects; Understanding with notions; and Reason with ideas. Time and space are the universal forms of things. Understanding thinks and judges according to certain categories which are not in the objects, but in the mind itself. Reason has the ideas, universe, soul, God; but, as Kant believed, the existence of these ideas cannot be proved. Dr. Kalnis gives a rapid sketch of the Kantian principles in these words:—"The human mind has, in its a priori medium, forms to which universality and necessity belong (in opposition to scepticism), but only a subjective one; but it cannot claim to know objective being—the thing in itself (in opposition to dogmatism). If, then, our theoretical reason must allow the things external to it not to be cognizable, practical reason has a firm, immovable ground. It demands, with absolute necessity (categorical imperative): Act as a general being, i.e., as a member of the universe, as a rational being. But man has within himself desires, the common aim and object of which is the gratification of self. While practical reason says, Act as a general rational being, the desires say, Act as a particular being, in an arbitrary way. He only is virtuous who, in his actions, is not determined by desires, but by reason. But virtue would be without a sphere, unless objects of action were brought to it by the desires. The territory of virtue, and that of desires, mutually require one another. Now, it is here that the idea of God, which was given up on the territory of pure reason, obtains its right as a postulate of practical reason. The domain of virtue, and that of desires, are heterogeneous worlds, but yet ordained for one another. Hence there must be a power which has harmonized both of these domains, and that power is God. As virtue does not reach the highest good in this world, which highest good consists in the unity of that which reason and the desires seek after, i.e., worthiness and happiness, this ideal must needs be realised in another life after death. The theological results of his criticism, Kant has developed in his 'Religion within the limits of reason.' He rejects any stand-point which places itself in opposition to the positive in Christianity (naturalism), but is in favour of a rational faith (rationalism) connecting itself with it. This connection he gained by changing, by means of an allegorical exposition, the doctrine of the Scriptures and the Church into moral religion."

Thus Kant held that pure reason has no power to make any certain statement concerning supernatural truths, and that the existence of God, liberty, and immortality, are postulates of practical reason. Thus it was that Rationalism, which from that time formed a constant opposition to Supra-naturalism, had its origin in the critical philosophy of Kant, which limited itself within an order of ideas purely subjective, from which it could not find an outlet without having recourse to practical reason, which again was founded on ideas drawn from speculative reason. Religion, in the view of Kant, consists in this, that in reference to all our duties, we consider God the legislator, who is to be revered by all. He combated the idea that reason is competent to decide what is, and what is not, revealed. He introduced the system of moral interpretation according to which Scripture ought to be explained, apart from its original historical meaning, in such a manner as is likely to prove beneficial to the moral condition of the people.

The opinions of Kant on the subject of the Divine existence are thus noticed by Hagenbach in his 'History of Doctrines':—"In his opinion the existence of God can be proved on speculative grounds only in a threefold manner; either by the physico-theological, or the cosmological, or the ontological argument. These are the only modes of argumentation, nor is it possible that there should be more. The ontological proof is not admissible, because its advocates confound a logical predicate with a real. 'A hundred real dollars do not contain anything more than a hundred possible. . . . But in reference to my property, a hundred real dollars are more than the mere idea of that sum (i.e., of its possibility). . . . 'The idea of a Supreme Being is in many respects a very profitable idea; but because it is a mere idea, it cannot by itself enlarge our knowledge of that which exists;' for 'a man might as well increase his knowledge by mere ideas, as a merchant augment his property by adding some ciphers to the sum-total on his books.' In opposition to the cosmological proof, he urged that its advocates promise to show us a new way, but bring us back to the old (ontological) proof, because their argument is also founded on a dialectic fiction. In reference to the physico-theological proof he said, 'This argument is always deserving of our respect. It is the earliest, clearest, and most adapted to common sense. It cultivates the study of nature, from which it also derives its existence, and through which it obtains new vigour. It shows to us an object and a design where we should not have discovered them by independent observation, and enlarges our knowledge of nature by making us acquainted with a particular unity whose principle is above nature. But this knowledge exerts a reacting influence upon its cause, viz., the idea from which it derives its origin, and so confirms the belief in a supreme Creator, that it becomes an irresistible conviction. Nevertheless this argument cannot secure apodictical certainty; at the utmost it might prove the existence of a builder of the world, but not that of a creator of the world. Morality and a degree of happiness corresponding to it are the two elements constituting the supreme good. But the virtuous do not always attain it. There must, therefore, be a compensation in the world to come. At the same time there must be a being that possesses both the requisite intelligence and the will to bring about this compensation. Hence the existence of God is a postulate of practical reason."

Kant held the doctrine of innate evil in man, but he did not understand by it original sin in the sense in which that expression is used by theologians generally. In his opinion the Scriptural narrative of Adam's fall is only a symbol, which he explains according to the principles of moral interpretation. The proposition, "Man is by nature wicked," he explains as meaning simply, "He is wicked because he belongs to the human race." Hence he comes to the conclusion, "That which man, considered from the moral point of view, is, or is to be, whether good or bad, depends on his own actions." In connection with the doctrine of original sin, Kant maintained the restoration of man by means of his liberty. To reach this end, man stands in need of an ideal, which is presented to him in the Scriptural doctrine concerning Christ, whom he regards as the personified idea of the good principle. The idea has its seat in our reason; for the practical purposes of an example being given, a character is sufficient which resembles the idea as much as possible.

Kant considered the death of Christ as having only a symbolical moral significance, and he maintained that man must, after all, deliver himself. "A substitution, in the proper sense of that word," says he, "cannot take place. It is impossible that liabilities should be transmissible, like debts. Neither does the amendment of our life pay off former debts. Thus man would have to expect an infinite punishment on account of the infinite guilt which he has contracted. Nevertheless the forgiveness of sin is possible. For inasmuch as, in consequence of the contrast existing between moral perfection and external happiness, he who amends his conduct has to undergo the same sufferings as he who perseveres in his evil course, and the former bears those sufferings with a dignified mind, on account of good, he willingly submits to them as the punishment due to his former sins. In a physical aspect he continues the same man, but, in a moral aspect, he has become a new man; thus the latter suffers in the room of the former. But that which takes place in man himself, as an internal act, is manifested in the person of Christ (the Son of God) in a visible manner, as the personified idea; that which the new man takes upon himself, while the old man is dying, is set forth in the representative of mankind as that death which he suffered once for all."

In regard to the mode of man's deliverance from sin, Kant held that man possesses the power of amending his conduct by his own efforts, and at the same time he plainly states in his 'Religion within the Boundary of Pure Reason'—"The moral culture of man must not commence with the amendment of his conduct, but with a complete change of his mode of thinking and the establishment of his character." The importance of faith was also maintained by the Königsberg philosopher, but he made a distinction between faith in the doctrines of the church and the faith of religion; that is, in his view, the religion of reason, ascribing only to the latter an influence upon morality. He pointed out the importance and necessity of a society based upon moral principles, or the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth, which he viewed in no higher than a merely moral aspect.

The philosophy of Kant was completely opposed to the boasted principles of Illuminism, which had diffused themselves so widely in Germany towards the middle of the eighteenth century. Various writers, accordingly, among whom may be mentioned Eberhard and Mendelssohn, hastened to protest against the Kantian doctrines. A large circle of pupils, however, gathered around the sage of Königsberg, and, in their enthusiasm, they eagerly sought to make the abstract doctrines of their master intelligible and agreeable to the public mind. But the most influential organ of the new philosophy was the 'Jenaische Literaturzeitung,' or Jena Literary Gazette, edited by Schütz. Nor was the admiration of the Kantian system confined to literary circles; the theologians also expounded its doctrines from the pulpit, and the whole country rang with the praises of Kant. Accordingly, the RATIONALISTS (which see), who had arisen out of the Kantians, soon became a numerous and influential class in Germany, placing human reason far above divine revelation, and bringing down the theology of Heaven to a level with the weak and erring fancies of men.

KAPALIKA, a sect of Hindus who, seven or eight centuries ago, sacrificed human victims to Kali, and other hideous personifications of the Sakti of Shiva. The Kapalika is thus described in one of the Hindu records: "His body is smeared with ashes from a funeral pile, around his neck hangs a string of human skulls, his forehead is streaked with a black line, his hair is woven into the matted braid, his loins are clothed with a tiger's skin, a hollow skull is in his left hand for a cup, and in his right he carries a bell, which he rings incessantly, exclaiming aloud, Ho! Sambhu Bhairava—Ho! lord of Kali."

KAPILA, a celebrated Hindu sage, supposed by many of his followers to have been an incarnation of Deity. He was the founder of the Sankhya school of philosophy. See SANKHYA SYSTEM.

KARA LINGIS, a sect of Hindu ascetics, found only occasionally among the most ignorant portions of the community. They wander up and down in a state of nudity, and are professed worshippers of Shiva.

KARAITES. See CARAITES.

KARENS (RELIGION OF). The Karens are a race of aboriginal inhabitants of the hilly parts in the south and east of Burmah. Numbers of them are to be found also in Siam and Laos. They are a quiet, intelligent people, living chiefly by agriculture. The first notice of this interesting race is found in the travels of Marco Polo, in the fourteenth century. The Rev. E. Kincaid, who visited them so recently as 1837, tells us that they regard themselves as the first and most extensive of all the races in the world. It is a curious fact, that in their oral songs are to be found remarkable traditions in reference to the creation of the world and of the human race, the apostasy of man, the loss of divine knowledge, and promises in reference to their future enlightenment; all of them beautifully accordant with the Mosaic records. "When America," says Mr. Kincaid, "was inhabited only by savages, and our ancestors in Britain and Germany were dwelling in the rudest tents, and clothed with the skins of beasts, and, in dark forests of oak, practising the most cruel and revolting forms of heathenism, the Karens stood firm in the great truth of one eternal God, the Creator of all things, and the only rightful object of adoration. From age to age, they chanted songs of praise to Jehovah, and looked, as their songs directed, towards the setting sun, from whence white men were to come with the good book, and teach them the worship of the living God. Buddhism, claiming to embody all science and literature, and all that pertains to the physical and moral world—propounding a system of morals admirably suited to carry the understanding, while it fosters the pride and arrogance and selfishness so deeply seated in fallen humanity—reaching back in its revelations through illimitable ages, and obscurely depicting other worlds and systems, and gods rising and passing away for ever—surrounding itself with pagodas and shrines and temples and priests, as imposing as pagan Rome, and a ritual as gorgeous as Rome papal—has failed to gain an ascendancy over the Karen race. Arbitrary power, surrounded by imperial pomp and splendour, has neither awed nor seduced them from their simple faith. The preservation of this widely-scattered people from the degrading heathenism which darkens every part of this vast continent, is a great and unfathomable mystery of God's providence. They have seen the proudest monuments of heathenism rise around them—many of them glittering in the sun like mountains of gold, and in their construction tasking the energies of an empire; still they chanted their oral songs, and looked towards the setting sun for white men to bring the promised book of Jehovah. They have seen dynasties rise and fall, age after age, and yet their faith has never failed them."

This remarkable people, though widely scattered over the Burman Empire, are completely distinct from the Burmans, by whom they are looked upon as inferiors and slaves, whom they are entitled to treat with harshness and cruelty. To escape from their oppressors, the Karens are often compelled to wander from place to place, and establish temporary dwelling-places in remote districts. They have no outward form of religion nor established priesthood but believe in the existence of God and a state of future retribution. Among their ancient traditions, which they fondly cherish, and carefully transmit from sire to son, are some strange prophecies, which predict their future elevation as a race, and that white strangers from across the sea would come to bring them the Word of God. Accordingly, when, about thirty years since, Mr Boardman, an American missionary, appeared among them, they were quite prepared to listen to his preaching, and evinced a peculiar interest in the truths of the Gospel. The tidings of the arrival of a white teacher soon spread among the Karens, and great numbers flocked to the house of the missionary. Mr. Newcomb, in his 'Cyclopedia of Missions,' relates an interesting story of the deified book, which, taken in connection with the brief career of Mr. Boardman, shows the Karens in a very favourable light:—"It had been left in one of their villages some twelve years before by a travelling Mussulman, who was understood to have told the people it was to be worshipped as sacred. Though entirely ignorant of its contents, the person with whom it was left carefully preserved it, and, in virtue of possessing it, became a kind of sorcerer, of great importance among the people. It was brought one day to Mr. Boardman, and on being unrolled from the coverings in which it was enveloped, it proved to be the 'Book of Common Prayer and the Psalms,' printed at Oxford. From this period Mr. Boardman devoted the remnant of his too brief life almost exclusively to labours among the Karens. Early in 1829, he made an excursion to the jungle and mountains where their villages were most numerous, and saw much of their condition and modes of life in their native wilds. He also conferred with the British Commissioner for the district, and formed liberal plans for schools, and other agencies of civilization, while he gave a large part of every day to preaching and conversation among the people. In the summer of 1830, however, his strength had become exceedingly reduced by repeated attacks of hæmorrhage of the lungs, and he sailed for Maulmain. Here he regained a temporary strength, and after a few months returned to Tavoy, where he found many converts waiting to be baptized, and still many more daily visiting the zavay for religious inquiry and instruction. A large number were baptized by Moung-Ing, one of the native Burman preachers, under the direction of Mr. Boardman. Just at this time Mr. and Mrs. Mason arrived at Tavoy as auxiliaries to the mission, and in their company, and that of Mrs. Boardman, this excellent missionary made an excursion into the country for the purpose of meeting and baptizing a large number of converts, who had often visited him in the city. The journey of three days was accomplished, and the baptism of thirty-four persons was performed in his presence by the Rev. Mr. Mason. But, ere he could reach his home in Tavoy, he sunk beneath the exhausting malady which had long pressed upon his constitution. His tomb is at Tavoy, and the marble slab which covers it is inscribed with a simple epitaph, which records his heroic services for the Karens of the neighbouring forests and mountains."

The labours of Mr. Boardman were followed up by Mr. Mason, his successor in the mission among the Karens, and it is gratifying to know that a people to whom so much interest has attached, have received the Gospel with far greater readiness than the Burmans among whom they live. In 1832, Mr. Mason, writing from a Karen village, says—"I no longer date from a heathen land. Heathenism has fled these banks. I eat the rice and fruits cultivated by Christian hands, look on the fields of Christians, see no dwellings but those of Christian families. I am seated in the midst of a Christian village, surrounded by a people that love as Christians, converse as Christians, act like Christians, and, in my eyes, look like Christians."

The Karens, though many of them are acquainted with the Burman language, have, nevertheless, a language of their own, which, however, previous to the arrival among them of the American missionaries, had not been reduced to writing. Accordingly, the missionaries, with the aid of some Christian Karens, made an alphabet of its elemental sounds, compiled a spelling-book of its most common words, and translated two or three tracts. This was the beginning of a most useful and important work, which has since been carried onward with activity and zeal, and the Karens now rejoice in a written language taught in their schools, and in a Christian literature, at least in its rudimentary state. A number of villages have been formed wholly composed of Christian Karens, who are supplied with churches and ministers of the Gospel, who are several of them converted natives. In 1840, nearly two hundred of these simple-hearted and interesting people were baptized, and during the year 1844, upwards of 2,000 professed their faith, and were admitted to baptism. An entire change came over the population of the district in which the missionaries laboured, and the people generally assumed an aspect of higher civilization. In 1843 they were subjected to cruel persecution on the part of their Burman oppressors. Large numbers of the Christian Karens were seized, and chained together, and conveyed to distant prisons, from which they were liberated only by the payment of a large ransom. These sufferings were endured with heroic fortitude, and with so firm and unflinching adherence to the faith which they had embraced, that many were thereby induced to join the ranks of the Christians. Worn out with the violence of the persecution, large companies of the Karens left their homes, and fled across the mountains to Arracan, where they obtained a peaceful settlement, and attracted no small sympathy from the Europeans who were resident in that quarter. Early in 1849, the Karen mission was separated from the Burman mission, and organized on an independent footing. From this date both these missions greatly extended the sphere of their influence, and in 1850 the Karen churches at Maulmain were reported as containing upwards of 1,700 members. A theological school was formed for educating Karen preachers, and a normal school for training teachers, besides a number of other schools. In the mission at Tavoy, which has been established almost exclusively for the Karens, there were in that same year stated to be twenty-seven churches, containing about 1,800 members. The Arracan mission consisted of two stations. In the Sandoway mission, which was designed for the Karens in its immediate vicinity, and also for those beyond the mountains in Burmah proper, where the gospel could not be preached, the number of churches was thirty-six, and the whole number of church members about 4,500.

In the commencement of 1852, war broke out between Great Britain and Burmah, and in the end of the same year the entire southern portion of the kingdom of Burmah, including the ancient province of Pegu, was incorporated with the territories of British India. A change was now effected in the whole aspect of affairs in so far as the Karens were concerned. They were no longer exposed to persecution, and multitudes of them, no longer deterred by the tyranny of priests or rulers, eagerly embraced the gospel. In consequence of the changes effected by the war, the American missions in Burmah have been entirely re-organized, and such has been the success of missionary work among the Karens, that there are about 12,000 church members, and a Christian population little short of 100,000.

KARMA, a term used in the system of the Budhists to denote action, consisting both of merit and demerit; that is, moral action, which is considered as the power that controls the world. When a human being dies, his Karma is transferred to some other being, regulating all the circumstances of his existence. See BUDHISTS.

KARMA-WISAYA, one of the four things which, according to the Buddhist system, cannot be understood by any one who is not a Budha. This point, called Karma wisaya, denotes how it is that effects are produced by the instrumentality of KARMA (which see). The other three things which only a Budha can comprehend are, (1.) Idhi-wisaya, how it was that Budha could go, in the snapping of a finger, from the world of men to the Brahma-lokas; (2.) Loka-wisaya, the size of the universe, or how it was first brought into existence; (3.) Budha-wisaya, the power and wisdom of Budha.

KARTIKEYA, the son of Shiva or Mahadewa, the Hindu god of war. He is famous for having destroyed a demon named Tarika, who set himself up against the gods.

KASI (the magnificent), the ancient name of BENARES (which see), and the name by which it is still called among the Brahmans. The Hindu priests are fond of extolling the glory of the holy city, and hence they sedulously propagate among the people legends of the strangest description, which they allege have come to them from the gods. Thus, in reference to the origin of Kasi, they give the following description:—"The world itself, since the day of its creation, has remained supported upon the thousand heads of the serpent Ananta (eternity), and so it will continue to be upheld until the command of Brahma shall be proclaimed for it to be for ever enveloped in the coils of that interminable deity. Now, when the judgment takes place, the city of Kasi, with a circumference of seven kos (about ten miles) from its centre, will alone remain firm; for it rests not upon the heads of Ananta, but is fixed upon the three points of the trident of Siva or Mahadeo, to whose care it will be entrusted. All who now die within its walls are blessed, and those who are found within it on that eventful day shall be blessed a thousandfold. Ages before the Mahomedan conquest of this city by Sultan Mahommed, which happened in the eleventh century; ages before it was made subservient to the Patans, which was a hundred centuries earlier; ages before Kasi was the second capital of the Hindoo kingdom of Kannaï, which was the case a hundred centuries before that; ages before history has any record, Siva built this wonderful city—of the purest gold, and all its temples of precious stones; but, alas! the iniquity of man contaminates and destroys the beauty of everything divine; in consequence of the heinous sins of the people, the precious material of this sacred place was deteriorated, and eventually changed into stone, by permission of the founder Siva." Kasi is emphatically a city of priests, for it has been computed that out of the 600,000 souls who form its population, 80,000 are officiating Brahmans attached to the temples, exclusive of the thousands who daily visit it from other parts of the country. The greater number of the temples are dedicated to Shiva, or to his son Ganesa, and are endowed some of them with overflowing funds for their support, while to others are attached the revenues of large tracts of land.

KASINA, an ascetic rite among the Buddhists, by which it is supposed that a miraculous energy may be received. There are ten descriptions of this rite. 1. Pathami, earth; 2. Apo, water; 3. Tejo, fire; 4. Wago, wind; 5. Nilo, blue; 6. Pita, golden; 7. Lohita, blood-red; 8. Odota, white; 9. Aloka, light; 10. Akasa, space.

The priest who performs the first of these kinds of Kasina must form a small circle, which he can easily fix his eye upon. The circle must be formed of clay of a light-red colour, placed upon a frame made of four sticks, covered over with a piece of cloth, a skin, or a mat, upon which the clay must be spread, free from grass, roots, pebbles and sand. The clay must be kneaded into a proper consistency, and formed into a circle one span and four inches in diameter. The priest must now take water that falls from a rock, and render the clay perfectly smooth;

then, having bathed, he must sweep the place where the frame is erected, and place a seat, which must be quite smooth, and one span four inches high, at the distance of two cubits, and one span from the frame. Remaining upon this seat, he must look steadfastly at the circle, and engage in meditation on the evils arising from the repetition of existence, and the best modes of overcoming them; on the benefits received by those who practise the dhyanas and other modes of asceticism; on the excellencies of the three gems; and he must endeavour to secure the same advantages. He must notice the colour of the circle, and not only think of it as composed of earth, but remember that the earthy particles of his own body are composed of the same element. He must continue to gaze and to meditate until the nimitta be received, that is, inward illumination, by which all scepticism will be removed, and purity attained.

The Apo-Kasina is performed by catching a portion of water in a cloth as it falls from the sky in rain, before it has reached the ground; or, if rain-water cannot be procured, any other water may be used. The water is poured into an alms-bowl or similar vessel, and the priest, having chosen a retired place, must sit down and meditate, gazing upon the water, and reflecting that the perspiration and other fluids of his own body are composed of the same material.

The Tejo-Kasina is practised by taking wood, dry and firm, cutting it into small pieces, and placing it at the root of a tree, or in the court of the vihara, where it must be ignited. He must then take a mat made of shreds of bamboo, or a skin or a cloth, and making in it an aperture one span and four inches in diameter, he must place it before him, and looking through the aperture, he must meditate on the fire, and reflect that the fire in his own body is of a similar nature, flickering and inconstant.

The Wago-Kasina is performed by sitting at the root of a tree, or some other convenient place, and thinking of the wind passing through a window or the hole of a wall; the Nilo-Kasina by gazing on a tree covered with blue flowers, or a vessel filled with blue flowers, or a blue garment covered with flowers; the Pita-Kasina by gazing on a golden-coloured object; the Lohita-Kasina on a circle made with vermilion; and in Odota-Kasina on a vessel of lead or silver, or the orb of the moon. In Aloka-Kasina, the priest must gaze upon the light passing through a hole in the wall, or, better still, upon the light which passes through a hole made in the side of an earthen vessel which has a lamp placed within it. When the Akasa-Kasina is practised, the sky is looked at through a hole in the roof of a hut, or through a hole of the prescribed dimensions made in a skin.

From the practice of Kasina in any one of its forms, a Buddhist priest expects to derive many advantages. More particularly, he acquires the power of working miracles according to the species of Kasina practised. Thus Mr. Spence Hardy, in his 'Eastern Monachism,' informs us of the kind of power received from each:—"By the practice of Pathawi-Kasina, the priest will receive the power to multiply himself many times over, to pass through the air, or walk on the water, and to cause an earth to be made on which he can walk, stand, sit, and lie. By Apo-Kasina he can cause the earth to float, create rain, rivers, and seas, shake the earth and rocks, and the dwellings thereon, and cause water to proceed from all parts of the body. By Tejo-Kasina he can cause smoke to proceed from all parts of the body, and fire to come down from heaven like rain, by the glory that proceeds from his person; he can overpower that which comes from the person of another; he can dispel darkness, collect cotton or fuel, and other combustibles, and cause them to burn at will; cause a light which will give the power to see in any place as with divine eyes; and when at the point of death, he can cause his body to be spontaneously burnt. By Wayo-Kasina he can move as fleetly as the wind, cause a wind to arise whenever he wishes, and can cause any substance to remove from one place to another without the intervention of a second person. By the other Kasinas respectively, the priest who practises them in a proper manner can cause figures to appear of different colours, change any substance whatever into gold, or cause it to be of a blood red colour, or to shine as with a bright light; change that which is evil into that which is good; cause things to appear that are lost or hidden; see into the midst of rocks and the earth, and penetrate into them; pass through walls and solid substances; and drive away evil desire."

KASWA (AL), the favourite camel on which Mohammed entered Mecca in triumph.

KE, one of the entities and essences in the dualistic system of the Chinese philosophers. It consists of matter most ethereal in its texture, and may be styled the ultimate material element of the universe, the primary matter which acts as the substratum on which things endued with form and other qualities rest, or from which they have been gradually evolved. The Ke, when resolved into its constituent elements, gives birth to two opposite essences, to Yang and Yin, which are the phases under which the Ultimate Principle of the universe displays itself in the phenomenal world. From the constant evolution and interaction of these opposite essences resulted every species of formal matter and the mixed phenomena of the world.

KEBLA, or KIBLA, the name which the Mohammedans give to that part of the world where the temple of Mecca is situated, towards which the face of the Moslem worshipper is turned when he recites his prayers. In the Koran, the express command is given by the Arabian prophet, "Thou shalt turn thy face towards the sacred temple of Mecca." In another passage, however, are these words, "God is Lord of the east and west, and which way soever you turn your face in prayer, you will find the presence of God."

KEITHIANS, an offshoot from the Society or Friends or Quakers in North America. They derived their name from their originator, George Keith. This individual was a native of Scotland, a man of considerable ability and literary attainments, and formerly a rigid Presbyterian. He was educated at the university of Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. The circumstances attendant on his conversion to the opinions of the Friends cannot now be discovered, but it is well known that for many years he was subjected to sore trials, long imprisonments, and heavy fines, because of his zeal in the cause which he had conscientiously embraced. His acute and powerful mind fitted him peculiarly for public disputations, and, accordingly, he was not unfrequently employed in defending the Society from unjust aspersions. He wrote also several powerful treatises in support of the doctrines of the Friends.

About the year 1682, he left Scotland to conduct a Friends' school at Edmonton, in the county of Middlesex; but the persecution to which he was here exposed led him to remove to London, where, however, instead of receiving the protection he had looked for from priestly domination, he was imprisoned for five months in Newgate. It was at this time that George Keith began to imbibed some strange speculative opinions, chiefly derived from the writings of Van Helmont. Among other absurd notions, he embraced the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. He held some curious notions respecting our first parents, and alleged that much of the Mosaic narrative in the Old Testament was to be regarded as allegorical. In a work which he published in 1634, entitled, 'Wisdom advanced in the correction of many gross and hurtful errors,' he gave to the world some of the wild fancies in which he now indulged. His opinions found no favour with Friends in England, and probably from this cause, as well as from a desire to escape persecution, he emigrated to New Jersey in America. After being employed for a time in determining the boundary line between East and West Jersey, he removed to Philadelphia, where he was intrusted with the head-mastership of the grammar school, which, however, he retained for only a single year, at the end of which he began to travel as a minister in New England. In wandering from place to place, he engaged in public disputations, but, in conducting them, he evinced so much acrimony, that he injured perhaps rather than advanced the cause which he professed to advocate.

Naturally proud and vain-glorious, George Keith soon began to find fault with the Society, more especially in the matter of discipline. Friends treated him with great forbearance and tenderness, but he became increasingly captious and self-willed, and at length he quitted the Society, along with several other Friends who adhered to him. The unhappy apostasy of George Keith gave rise to a spirit of discord among Friends in Pennsylvania, which gave much concern to the members of the Society, not only in America, but also in England. Some Friends in Aberdeen who had long known George Keith, addressed an earnest appeal to him on the subject of the differences to which he had given rise in the Society. An admonitory letter was also sent from Friends in England to Friends in America on the points in dispute. Nothing, however, would move the unhappy man, but proceeding from bad to worse, he and his adherents set up a separate meeting of their own, under the designation of Christian Quakers and Friends.

But though George Keith had now assumed an independent position, he did not cease on that account to harass and annoy the Society at large, preferring charges of unsoundness against them. At the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers, held in January 1692, Keith accused them of meeting "to cloak heresies and deceit," and maintained "that there were more damnable heresies and doctrines of devils among the Quakers than among any profession of Protestants." Such audacious and unmeasured abuse could not be passed over in silence. Two Friends were appointed to visit Keith, and to call upon him to retract his words. He received the deputation with the utmost haughtiness, and instead of listening to their counsels, he told them that "he trampled upon the judgment of the meeting as dirt under his feet." All hopes of a reconciliation were now gone, and the Society came to the resolution of issuing a declaration of disunity with him. The testimony issued on the occasion was drawn up in the form of an address to the Society, in which the grounds of the proceeding were set forth. Before publishing the document, it was thought right to give George Keith or those of his party who might wish, an opportunity of perusing it. He declined the offer, however, and not only so, but he maliciously published to the world that in the proceedings with respect to him, all gospel order and Christian kindness had been violated. Against the judgment of the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers, Keith determined to appeal to the ensuing Yearly Meeting. Meanwhile he published several pamphlets in vindication of himself, which excited so strong a feeling in his favour, that many Friends united with him and his party, and a wide and distressing schism ensued. Separate meetings were set up at Philadelphia, Burlington, Neshauney, and other places. Families were divided, and the ties of friendship broken. Husbands and wives, professedly of the same faith, no longer worshipped in the same house, and seldom, in short, has a more painful spirit of division prevailed in any Christian body than was displayed on this occasion.

At the Yearly Meeting in 1692, which was held at Burlington, it was fully expected that George Keith would follow up the appeal which he had taken against the judgment of the Quarterly Meeting.

When, however, the Yearly Meeting had convened instead of proceeding in the usual course of the discipline, he and his party met separately, calling themselves the Yearly Meeting, and proceeded to give judgment in favour of their leader, and issued an epistle to that effect. They also drew up a Confession of Faith, with the view of vindicating their claim to genuine Quakerism. In these circumstances Friends judged it right to give forth a testimony in condemnation of the conduct of Keith, and a paper to that purport was signed by two hundred and fourteen Friends. Similar testimonies condemnatory of Keith and his adherents were given forth at the Yearly Meeting in New England, in Maryland, and in Long Island.

Finding his conduct so generally condemned in America, Keith resolved to seek the judgment of the Yearly Meeting of London on his case. Thither, accordingly, he proceeded in 1694, and after a full investigation of the whole matters in dispute, a committee was appointed to prepare a document embodying the sense and judgment of the meeting on the case, with the special injunction that those "that have separated be charged in the name and power of the Lord Jesus Christ, to meet together with Friends in the love of God." The document having been drawn up, and approved by the Yearly Meeting, was communicated to George Keith as the deliberate judgment of Friends, but instead of receiving it in a proper spirit, he asserted that the advice was that of a party, and not of the Society itself. He sought also to attract sympathizers and friends, but in vain; only a few evinced the slightest feeling in his favour. The Yearly Meeting in London perceiving that the decision affected not Keith alone, but all those in America who had separated with him, addressed a Christian exhortation to them in reference to their separation from Friends as a body, and calling upon them to seek a reconciliation with their brethren. All efforts to accomplish an object so desirable were utterly unavailing. At the next Yearly Meeting in London, the unsatisfactory conduct of George Keith was again brought under notice. He was allowed to read a written statement in vindication of his conduct, concluding, however, with an offer to prove that the writings of Friends contained gross errors. On his withdrawal the meeting decided not to own nor receive him nor his testimony while he remains therein, but to testify against him and his evil works of strife and division. On the following day Keith was admitted to hear, and if he inclined, to reply to the decision of the meeting. On this occasion he broke forth into the most bitter and intemperate language towards Friends, and left the meeting abruptly. The Yearly Meeting now unanimously agreed no longer to recognize this turbulent man as one in religious profession with them. Accordingly they issued the following minute: "It is the sense and judgment of this meeting, that the said George Keith is gone from the blessed unity of the peaceable Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ, and hath thereby separated himself from the holy fellowship of the Church of Christ; and that whilst he is in an unreconciled and uncharitable state, he ought not to preach or pay in any of Friends' meetings; nor be owned or received as one of us; until, by a public and hearty acknowledgment of the great offence he hath given, and hurt he hath done, and condemnation of himself, therefore, he gives proof of his unfeigned repentance, and does his endeavour to remove and take off the reproach he hath brought upon Truth and Friends; which, in the love of God, we heartily desire for his soul's sake."

George Keith was thus formally cut off from the Society of Friends, as no longer worthy of church fellowship, and he therefore commenced holding separate meetings at Turner's Hall in London, where he attracted crowds for a time to hear his discourses, which were full of the most bitter invectives against Friends. While this factious individual was thus endeavouring to gain adherents in England, his partisans in America were busily engaged in disturbing the peace and unity of Friends in that country. In a short time, however, the Transatlantic Keithians became divided among themselves, and were split into different sections. "The Separatists," say Friends from Philadelphia in 1698, "grow weaker and weaker; many of them gone to the Baptists, some to the Episcopalians, and the rest are very inconsiderable and mean, some of whom come now and then to our meetings, and some have lately brought in letters of condemnation." The following year they had so far dwindled away that we find Friends declaring them to be almost extinct. In an account of this sect written by Edwards, he makes a similar statement in regard to them. "They soon declined," he says; "their head deserted them, and went over to the Episcopalians. Some followed him thither; some returned to the Penn Quakers, and some went to other societies. Nevertheless many persisted in the separation. These, by resigning themselves, as they said, to the guidance of Scripture, began to find water in the commission, Matt. xxviii. 19: Bread and Wine, in the command, Matt. xxvi. 26, 30; Community of goods, love feasts, kiss of charity, right hand of fellowship, anointing the sick for recovery, and washing the disciples' feet, in other texts.—The Keithian Quakers ended in a kind of transformation into Keithian Baptists. They were called Quaker-Baptists, because they still retained the language, dress and manners, of the Quakers. But they ended in another kind of transformation into Seventh-day Baptists, though some went among the First-day Baptists, and other societies. However, these were the beginning of the Sabbatarians in this province."

For some years after he had been disowned by the body, Keith continued to wear the garb and to use the language of a Friend, but about the year 1700 he laid aside these peculiarities, and joined the Episcopal Church, accepting ordination at the hands of a bishop. In the course of two years after his ordination he proceeded to America as a missionary, under the auspices of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts." One of the chief objects of his mission he declared to be to "gather Quakers from Quakerism to the Mother Church," and during the two years he now spent in America, he frequently engaged in public disputation with Friends on their peculiar tenets. At length he returned to England, where he boasted of the remarkable success which had attended his labours on the other side of the Atlantic. Whether true or false, his statements were credited, and gained for him such favour that he was rewarded with the living of Edburton in Sussex. He did not long survive to enjoy his promotion, for in 1714 his labours in the work of the ministry were brought by death to a final termination. It is said that his last hours on earth were disturbed with feelings of bitter remorse on account of the turbulent life he had led. He was even alleged to have given utterance to these words, "I wish I had died when I was a Quaker; for then I am sure it would have been well with my soul." Before the death of their founder the Keithians had been wholly scattered, some having joined the Baptists and other denominations of Christians, while the great majority returned to the Society of Friends.

KELAM, the science of the Word, a term used by the Mohammedans to describe their scholastic divinity. On this part of their system the writings of Mohammedan doctors are very numerous, their opinions being much divided.

KERAMIANS, a Mohammedan sect, who maintained that God was possessed of a bodily form. They derived their name from the originator of the sect, Mohammed ben Keram.

KERARI, a Hindu sect who worshipped Devi in her terrific forms, and were wont to offer up human sacrifices. The only votaries belonging to this sect still remaining in India are those who inflict upon themselves bodily tortures, and pierce their flesh with hooks or spits, following such practices as are carried on in Bengal at the CHARAK PUJA (which see).

KERBELA, a place esteemed peculiarly sacred by the SCHIITES (which see), in consequence of the tomb of Hossin the son of Ali having been erected there. It is a favourite place of pilgrimage to the Persian Mohammedans, who are wont even to carry off a small portion of the sacred soil, and to put it in pads or bags for the purpose of placing it before them at their devotions, that their foreheads may rest upon it as they prostrate themselves. They thus flatter themselves that they are worshipping on holy ground. The Shiite pilgrims resorting annually to Kerbela are estimated at 80,000, and the stream is incessant, for this pilgrimage has not, like that to Mecca, a fixed season. Another peculiar difference is the succession of caravans of the dead carried in coffins to be interred at Kerbela; and the revolting custom is promoted by the idea that by this act of posthumous merit they shall atone for the greatest crimes. Eight thousand corpses are said to be brought annually from Persia. Kerbela rivals the Kaaba as a place of pilgrimage, the former being the favourite resort of the Schîtes, the latter of the Sonnites.

KERI and KETIB (Heb. read and written). In many Jewish manuscripts and printed editions of the Old Testament, a word is often found with a small circle attached to it, which is called Ketib or written; or with an asterisk over it and a word written in the margin of the same line, this being the Keri or reading. The intention of these two Masoretic marks is to give direction to write in this manner, but read in that manner. They are supposed by some Jewish writers to have been invented by Ezra; but others maintain, with much greater probability, that their origin is to be dated no farther back than the time of the Masorites. Where there occurs a various reading, the wrong reading, the Ketib is written in the text, and the true reading, the Keri is written on the margin. The Jews do not always insist that as an invariable rule, we should follow the Keri; on the contrary they hold that we should prefer the Ketib when it is authorized by the ancient versions and gives a better meaning.

KEYS (THE POWER OF THE). This expression, which has, since the Reformation, formed the subject of a keen controversy between the Romanists and the Protestants, is derived from Mat. xvi. 19, "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." The key is often used in Scripture metaphorically as a symbol of government, power, and authority. Thus Isa. xlii. 22, "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open." In the East, a key was generally worn by the stewards of wealthy families as a symbol or token of their office. To give a person a key was therefore frequently used to denote the investing him with a situation of authority and trust. Hence, when our Saviour assures Peter that he would give him the keys of the kingdom of heaven, many Protestant writers interpret his words as implying the power of preaching the gospel officially, of administering the sacraments as a steward of the mysteries of God, and as a faithful servant whom the Lord hath set over his household. Other Protestant divines again allege that to Peter personally and exclusively was assigned the power of the keys, that is the honour of opening the gates of the kingdom of heaven, or in other words, the Christian or gospel dispensation to the Jews at the day of Pentecost, and then to the Gentiles when he went down to Cornelius at Caesarea. The Roman Catholics, on the other hand, maintain that by the power of the keys we must understand a special authority given to Peter over the church of Christ, a supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction which they allege belongs also to the Pope, as being the successor of Peter, and, therefore, having the power of excommunicating and absolving, as well as of opening and shutting the gates of Paradise at pleasure.

The ancient Jewish Rabbis or Doctors, if we may credit the statements of later Jewish writers, received a key in entering upon their office as an emblem of the grand official duty which it was incumbent upon them faithfully to discharge, that of opening the meaning of the law by their public teaching. The expression, "the power of the keys," is exegetically explained by the phrase, "binding and loosing," which Lightfoot, Schoetgen, and others skilled in Rabbinical lore, explain as denoting the power of declaring what was binding on men's consciences; and that from the obligation of which they were loosed or free. It is worthy of notice, that the power of binding and loosing which is mentioned by our Lord as an exercise of the power of the keys in Mat. xvi. 19, already quoted, is stated elsewhere as having been conferred not on Peter alone, but on all the apostles. Thus in Mat. xviii. 18, Jesus says, addressing the whole apostolic college, "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." The Fathers also generally agree in ascribing to all the apostles the power of the keys. Jesus claims for himself the power of the keys when he says, "I am he that hath the key of David, that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth." Such expressions plainly indicate that Christ has sole power and authority in his church. Whatever may therefore be the extent of the power which is given to the apostles in conferring upon them the power of the keys, it must be something essentially different from the kingly power and authority of Christ.

The power of the keys as exercised by the apostles and their associates was peculiar to themselves. They sometimes inflicted miraculous punishment upon notorious offenders, as upon Ananias and Sapphira, and Elymas the sorcerer. And in many cases also they loosed persons from supernatural diseases. But the power of the keys, in so far as it has descended to the Christian ministry, simply implies two things—an authority to preach the gospel, and an authority to administer discipline in the church by binding and loosing, by inflicting and removing censures. And their proceedings, when conducted agreeably to Scripture, are believed to be ratified in heaven.

The Church of Rome considers the power of the keys as extending beyond the infliction of church censures to the remission or retention of sins. Accordingly, in the Roman Pontifical a prayer occurs in the consecration of a bishop, beseeching that the power of the keys, of remitting and retaining sins might be given to every one ordained to that office

The Council of Trent also confirms this view of the matter by their decision, which declares the power of the keys to have been left by Christ to "all priests his vicars as presidents and judges, to whom all mortal sins were referred into which the faithful might fall." Dens again says, "That Peter did not receive the keys as a private person, but as supreme pastor, and for the benefit of the Church; and from him, by ordinary right, the power of the keys is derived to other superiors, bishops, and pastors of the Church." The theory of the Papacy, however, which is taught by many Romish divines, is, that the power of the keys, which was conferred upon Peter, belongs to the Pope as the successor of Peter; and even admitting that it was given by Christ to all the apostles, and therefore has descended to the priests and bishops their successors, they hold that it must be principally vested in the Pope as the bishop of bishops, and the head of all ecclesiastical influence and authority in the church on earth. Thus Romanists seek to vest in the Pope a supremacy over the church, and in the highest sense in which the words can apply to any one on earth, in him is vested the power of the keys. In opposition to this claim which Romanists allege for the Pope, Protestants contend that it rests on a series of unfounded assumptions; for instance, on the supremacy of Peter, his having actually been bishop of Rome, and the transmission of his power to all future bishops of Rome.

KHAKIS, one of the Vaishnava sects of Hindus, founded by Kil, a disciple, though not immediately, of Ramanand. The history of the sect is not well known, and it seems to be of modern origin. Its members, though believed to be numerous, appear to be either confined to a few particular districts, or to lead a wandering life. The Khakis are distinguished from the other Vaishnavas by the application of clay and ashes to their dress or persons. Those who reside in fixed establishments generally dress like other Vaishnavas, but those who lead a wandering life, go either naked, or nearly so, smearing their bodies with the pale gray mixture of ashes and earth. They also frequently wear the Jata, or braided hair, after the fashion of the votaries of Shiva, some of whose characteristic practices they follow, blending them with the worship of Vishnu, of Sita, and particularly of Hamman. Many Khakis are found about Farakhabad, but their principal seat is at Hamman Gerk, in Oude.

KHALIF. See CALIPH.

KHANDAS, the elements of sentient existence among the Buddhists, of which there are five constituents:—(1.) The organized body, or the whole of being, apart from the mental processes; (2.) Sensation; (3.) Perception; (4.) Discrimination; (5.) Consciousness. The four last Khandas are results or properties of the first, which must be understood as including the soul as well as the body. At death, the Buddhists believe the Khandas entirely vanish. Gotama says that none of the Khandas, taken separately, are the self, and that, taken conjointly, they are not the self. There is no such thing as a soul apart from the five Khandas.

KHANDOBA, an incarnation of Shiva, the same which is called also BHAIRAV (which see). The principal temple of Khandoba is at Jejuri. It was endowed by Holkar with an annual sum of 10,000 rupees, and the Peshwa's government granted a like sum. A large sum also accrues to the temple from its offerings, part of which were demanded back by government, till, on Christian principles, this branch of revenue was abandoned by Sir Robert Grant. A fraternity of Vira, amounting to about fifty men, is attached to the temple, besides a sisterhood of twice the number of Murali. One of the Vira is required at the annual festival to run a sword through his thigh, and afterwards to walk through the town as if nothing had happened to him. The Murali are unmarried females, consecrated by their parents to the god, and sent, when they grow up, to the temple at Jejuri, that they may lead a life of sacred prostitution.

KHAREJITES, or revolvers, a Mohammedan sect, who originally withdrew from Ali, and maintain that the Imam need not be of the tribe of Koreish, nor even a freeman, provided he be just and qualified. They maintain too, that if unfit he may be deposed, and that the office itself is not indispensable.

KHATA, or SCARF OF BLESSINGS, an article which is considered in Thibet as conveying to the individual on whom it is bestowed many blessings from above. It is thus described by M. Hue, in his 'Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China':—"The Khata is a piece of silk, nearly as fine as gauze, and of so very pale a blue as to be almost white. Its length about triples its breadth, and the two extremities are generally fringed. There are Khatas of all sizes and all prices, for a Khata is an object with which neither poor nor rich can dispense. No one ever moves unless provided with a supply. When you go to pay a visit, when you go to ask a favour, or to acknowledge one, you begin with displaying the Khata; you take it in both hands, and offer it to the person whom you desire to honour. When two friends, who have not seen each other for a long time, meet, their first proceeding is to interchange a Khata; it is as much a matter of course as shaking hands in Europe. When you write, it is usual to enclose a Khata in the letter. We cannot exaggerate the importance which the Thibetians, the Si-Fan, the Houng-Mao-Eul, and all the people who dwell towards the western shores of the Blue Sea, attach to the ceremony of the Khata. With them, it is the purest and sincerest expression of all the noblest sentiments. The most gracious words, the most magnificent presents, go for nothing, if unaccompanied with the Khata; whereas, with the Khata, the commonest objects become of infinite value. If any one comes, Khata in hand, to ask you a favour, to refuse the favour would be a great breach of propriety.

This Thibetian custom is very general among the Tartars, and especially in their Lamaseries; and Khatas, accordingly, form a very leading feature of commerce with the Chinese at Tang-Keou-Enl. The Thibetian embassy never passes through the town without purchasing a prodigious number of these articles."

KHATIB, an ordinary Mohammedan priest, who conducts the worship of the mosque on the Fridays. He recites the prayers, and often preaches a sermon.

KHATMEH, a recitation of the whole Koran, which occupies about nine hours, and is customary at the funerals, weddings, and public festivals of Mohammedans, being regarded as meritorious in those who bear the expense.

KHEMAN, one of the principal female disciples of BUHA (which see).

KHIRKHAH (Arab., a torn robe), a name given to the dress generally worn by DERVISHES (which see). The Mussulmans pretend that it was the dress of the ancient prophets.

KHLESTOVSHCHIKI (from Slav., khlestat, to flog), a sect of dissenters from the Russo-Greek church. They are a kind of Flagellants, and a branch of the SKOPTZI (which see). They impose upon themselves flagellation and some other penances, and they are said to have mysterious doctrines and rites, marked by the wildest superstition. They are accused of the same guilty extravagances which were ascribed to the ADAMITES (which see). The police of Moscow, it seems, surprised one of their meetings in 1840, and it was proved, by the investigation which followed on this discovery, that the Khlestovshchiki are only a lower or preparatory grade of the Skoptzi; that they have a community of women, although, in order to conceal it, they live in couples, married by priests of the established church. At their meetings they often jump about until they fall down from exhaustion; a practice not altogether unknown even in England. (See JUMPERS.)

KHONDS (RELIGION OF THE). The Khonds are a wild aboriginal tribe in Orissa, that portion of Hindustan which lies between the mountains of the Dekkan and the sea-coast. Their religion is very peculiar, and in its whole features entirely distinct from Hinduism. Their supreme god is called BURA-PENXOU (which see), the god of light, who created for himself a consort, the earth-goddess called Tari-Pannou, the source of evil in the world. The god of light arrested the action of physical evil, while he left man at perfect liberty to reject or receive moral evil. They who rejected it were deified, while the great mass of mankind who received it were condemned to all kinds of physical suffering, with death, besides being deprived of the immediate care of the Creator, and doomed to the lowest state of moral degradation. Bura-Pennou and his consort, meanwhile, contended for superiority, and thus the elements of good and evil came to be in constant collision both in the heart of man and in the world around him. At this point the Khonds diverge into two sects, which are thus described by Major Macpherson in an interesting memoir read before the Asiatic Society, and inserted in their Journal:—"One sect," says he, "holds that the god of light completely conquered the earth-goddess, and employs her, still the active principle of evil, as the instrument of his moral rule. That he resolved to provide a partial remedy for the consequences of the introduction of evil, by enabling man to attain to a state of moderate enjoyment upon earth, and to partial restoration to communion with the Creator after death. And that, to effect this purpose, he created those classes of subordinate deities, and assigned to them the office—first, of instructing man in the arts of life, and regulating the powers of nature for his use, upon the condition of his paying to them due worship; secondly, of administering a system of retributive justice through subjection to which, and through the practice of virtue during successive lives upon earth, the soul of man might attain to beatification. The other sect hold, upon the other hand, that the earth-goddess remains unconquered; that the god of light could not, in opposition to her will, carry out his purpose with respect to man's temporal lot; and that man, therefore, owes his elevation from the state of physical suffering into which he fell through the reception of evil, to the direct exercise of her power to confer blessings, or to her permitting him to receive the good which flows from the god of light, through the inferior gods, to all who worship them. With respect to man's destiny after death, they believe that the god of light carried out his purpose. And they believe that the worship of the earth-goddess by human sacrifice, is the indispensable condition on which these blessings have been granted, and their continuance may be hoped for; the virtue of the rite availing not only for those who practise it, but for all mankind.

"In addition to these human sacrifices, which still continue to be offered annually, in order to appease the wrath of Tari, and propitiate her in favour of agriculture, there is a fearful amount of infanticide among the Khond people. It exists in some of the tribes of the sect of Boora to such an extent, that no female infant is spared, except when a woman's first child is female; and that villages containing a hundred houses may be seen without a female child."

The revolting rites of human sacrifice and female infanticide have prevailed from time immemorial among these barbarous people. The British government, however, has happily succeeded in almost completely abolishing these bloody rites. Many children, who had been stolen from their parents, and sold to the Khonds for sacrifice, have been rescued from a cruel death, and put into asylums for Christian education and training. The manner in which the revolting human sacrifices were conducted by the Khonds is thus described by Mr. Fry, a government agent, who has rescued numbers from the sacrificial knife:—"The victim," he informs us, "is surrounded by a crowd of half-intoxicated Khonds, and is dragged around some open space, when the savages, with loud shouts, rush on the victim, cutting the living flesh piecemeal from the bones, till nothing remains but the head and bowels, which are left untouched. Death has by this time released the unhappy victim from his torture; the head and bowels are then burnt, and the ashes mixed with grain." These Meriah sacrifices, as they are called, are almost abolished.

KHORS, a god worshipped by the ancient Slavonians, an image of whom existed at Kioff before the introduction of Christianity. They were wont to offer to this deity the koroway, or wedding-cake, and to sacrifice hens in honour of him.

KHOTBEH, a prayer which Mohammed was accustomed to recite, and in which example he was followed by his successors. It consists of two parts. The first is appropriated to the Deity, the prophets, the first four caliphs and their contemporaries. The second includes the prayer for the reigning sovereign. The Khotbeh at present in use on the Fridays in the Mohammedan mosques in Turkey is as follows:—"Thanks be to the Most High, that supreme and immortal Being who has neither wife nor children nor equal on earth or in the heavens, who favours acts of compunction in his servants, and pardons their iniquities. We believe, we confess, we bear witness, that there is no God but God alone, the sole God, who admits no association. Happy belief, to which is attached heavenly blessedness. We also believe in our Lord our support, our master Mohammed his servant, his friend, his prophet, who has been directed in the true way, favoured by divine oracles, and distinguished by marvellous works. May the divine blessing be on him, on his posterity, on his wives, on his disciples, on the orthodox khalifs endowed with doctrine, virtue, and sanctity, and on the viziers of his age, particularly on the Imam, the true khalif of God's prophet, the prince of believers, Abubekr, the pious certifier, pleasing to the Eternal; on the Imam, the true khalif of God's prophet, the prince of believers, Omar, the pure discriminator, pleasing to God; on the Imam, the true khalif of God's prophet, the prince of believers, Othman, the possessor of the two lights; on the Imam, the true khalif of God's prophet, the prince of believers, Ali, the generous, the upright, pleasing to God; on the two great Imams, perfect in virtue and doctrine, distinguished in knowledge and in works, illustrious in race and in nobility, resigned to the will of God and the decrees of destiny, patient in reverses and misfortunes, the princes of the heavenly youth, the pupils of the eyes of the faithful, the lords of true believers, Hassan and Hossein, pleasing to God, to whom may all be equally pleasing. O ye assistants, O ye faithful, fear God, and submit to Him. Omar, pleasing to God, has said. The prophet of God pronounced these words: Let there be no actions but those founded on good intentions. The prophet of God is truthful in what he said. He is truthful in what he said. Ali, the friend of God, and the minister of the heavenly oracles, said, Know that the best word is the Word of God, most powerful, most merciful, most compassionate. Hear his holy commandment. When you hear the Koran, listen to it with respect, and in silence, for it will be made to you piety. I take refuge with God from the stoned devil. In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate in truth, good deeds efface bad ones."

Here the preacher repeats several verses of the Koran, to which the muezzins chant Amen. He then commences the second Khotbeh, which runs thus:—"In honour to his prophet, and for distinction to his pure soul, this high and great God, whose word is an order and a command, has said, Certainly God and his angels bless the prophet. Bless him, ye believers, address to him pure and sincere salutations. O God, bless Mohammed, the Emir of Emirs, the chief of the prophets, who is perfect, accomplished, endowed with eminent qualities, the glory of the human race, our lord and the lord of both worlds, of temporal and of eternal life. O ye who are enamoured of his beauty and of his fame, address to him pure and sincere salutations. Bless, O God, Mohammed, and the posterity of Mohammed, as thou hast blessed Abraham and the posterity of Abraham. Certainly thou art adorable, thou art great; sanctify Mohammed, and the posterity of Mohammed, as thou hast sanctified Abraham and the posterity of Abraham. Certainly thou art adorable, thou art great. O God, have pity on the orthodox khalifs, distinguished by doctrine, virtue, and heavenly gifts, with which thou hast laden those who have acted with truth and justice. O God, assist, sustain, and defend thy servant, the greatest of sultans, the most eminent of khalifs, the king of Arabs, and Ajene, the servant of the two holy cities, sultan, son of a sultan, Sultan ———, whose khalifat may the Supreme Being make eternal, and perpetual his empire and power, Amen. O God, exalt those who exalt religion, and lower those who lower religion. Protect the Moslem soldiers, the orthodox armies, and grant us health, tranquillity, prosperity to us, to pilgrims, to the military, to citizens, as well to those at home as to those who travel by land and sea; finally, to the whole Moslem people. Health to all the prophets and all the heavenly messengers. Eternal praises to God, the Creator and Governor of the universe. Certainly God commands equity and benevolence, he commands and recommends the care of our relations, he prohibits unlawful things, sins, prevarications. He counsels you to obey his precepts, and to keep them carefully in your memory."

A Khotbeh, in substance the same, is used on the first Friday after the New Year. Besides the benediction on the prophet, his four successors, and the two sons of Ali, a blessing is invoked on their mother

Fatimah, and grandmother Khadijah; Ayesha, the mother of the faithful, and the rest of the prophet's pure wives; on the six who remained of the ten noble and just persons who swore allegiance under the tree, Talha, Alzobier, Saad, Said, Abdurahman, Ibn Auf, and all the companions, and the two succeeding generations. This prayer, and frequently a moral discourse, is delivered from the pulpit by the Khatib, who holds a wooden sword reversed, a custom said to be peculiar to the cities taken from the unbelievers.

KHUMBANDAS, an order of beings among the Buddhists, who are believed to be the attendants of Hirólha, who is one of the four guardian devas. The Khumbandas have blue garments, hold a sword and shield of sapphire, and are mounted on blue horses. They form one of the thirteen orders of intelligence, exclusive of the supreme Buddhas. They are monsters of immense size and disgusting form.

KID-WORSHIP. A remarkable prohibition occurs in three different passages of the Old Testament, couched in these words, "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk." This precept has been supposed to be intended to guard the Hebrews against some idolatrous or superstitious practice of the neighbouring heathen nations. In this explanation some of the Jewish expositors coincide, though they have not been able to cite any instance of such a practice. Dr. Cudworth, however, in his Treatise on the Lord's Supper, states, that in an old Caraitic commentary on the Pentateuch, it is mentioned as having been a practice of the ancient heathens when they had gathered in all their fruits, to take a kid and boil it in the milk of its dam, and then in a magical way to go about and besprinkle with it their trees, fields, gardens, and orchards; thinking that by this means they would fructify and bring forth fruit more abundantly the following year. Horace seems to allude to a custom of this kind. Abarbanel also refers to such a practice as followed, in some parts of Spain, even in his time. Spencer mentions a similar rite as in use among the Sabians. Bloody sacrifices of cocks and kids are wont to be offered to the Hindu god Vishnu.

KIEW, a holy city among the ancient Slavonians. It was situated on the right bank of the Dnieper or Borysthènes. In this city nearly all the gods of the Slavie race were at one time assembled. The inhabitants of Kiew, in their annual voyages to the Black Sea in the month of June, were wont to disembark on an island, at the distance of four days' journey from the mouth of the river, and there they offered their sacrifices under an oak.

KILHAMITES. See METHODIST (WESLEYAN) NEW CONNEXION.

KING, the canonical sacred books of the Chinese, which are believed to be the most ancient literary monuments of China, and to possess an authority far higher than any other ancient writings. All these productions of the shing-jin, or holy man, are considered to be absolutely and infallibly true. The oldest of the sacred books is the Yih-king, said to have been written by Fuh-he, the reputed founder of the Chinese civilization. The second of the Chinese sacred books is the Shoo-king, which is chiefly historical, stretching from the reign of Yaou, one of the very earliest emperors, to the life-time of Confucius. The Shu-king is the third of the sacred books, comprising 311 odes, and other lyrics, generally breathing a moral tone. Inferior in authority to these three, but still regarded as a sacred book, is the Le-ke, the Chinese book of rites and manners. The four just mentioned, along with the Tsun-tseu, a historical work by Confucius, form the Woo-king or Five Sacred Writings of the Chinese, the monuments of the "holy men" of antiquity, and hence regarded as the foundation of all history and ethics, politics, philosophy, and religion in China.

KIRCHENTAG (Ger. church diet), a free association of pious professors, ministers, and laymen of Protestant Germany, for the discussion of the religious and ecclesiastical questions of the day, and for the promotion of the interests of practical Christianity embraced under the term INNER MISSION (which see). It was originated in 1848, and meets annually in one of the leading cities of Germany. Its doctrinal basis is the Bible as explained by the ecumenical symbols and evangelical confessions of the sixteenth century. It comprehends four Protestant denominations, the Lutheran, German Reformed, United Evangelical, and the Moravian, but it holds fraternal intercourse with all foreign Evangelical Societies and Churches, who hold the basis of the Diet, and may choose to send delegates to represent them at its meetings. All parts of Germany, especially Prussia and Württemberg, send delegates to this body; but it is discountenanced and disowned by the rationalists and semi-rationalists as well as the rigid Lutherans.

This German Church Diet originated with the most eminent evangelical ministers and laymen of Germany, headed by a true Christian nobleman, von Bethmann Hollweg, who has presided at every one of its meetings. The first Kirchentag, which consisted of five hundred members, met on the 21st of September 1848 in Wittenberg, and in that very church to the doors of which Luther affixed his ninety-five theses. "It was indeed," says Mr. Thomas H. Gladstone, "a new and interesting sight to behold the learned professor seated side by side with the simple-minded Christian, the dignified ecclesiastic taking brotherly counsel with the humble lay-missionary or provincial school teacher. It was no less a strangely novel spectacle to see the strongest upholders of the respective orthodoxies, Lutheran and Reformed, for getting doctrinal differences in the harmony of Christian purpose and Christian love; still more to see the object of their common jealousy, the 'United' Church, as well as the Moravian and other dissenting communities, completing the picture of Christian union and brotherly love by being admitted to their association without question of their ecclesiastical polity or church rule. All seemed to point to the dawning of a better day. And the tempest of persecution with which the church was assailed, appeared already converted into a blessing, in the recognition of its essential unity, and the sense of the mutual dependence of its parts as members of that mystic body which is one in its living Head. This feeling of Christian fellowship was heightened to the sublime, and received an expression too deeply affecting ever to be erased from the memory of those who witnessed the scene, when, at a solemn moment on the last day, the earnest Krummacher, in one of his fervent addresses, pledged the members to stand true to one another in the day of persecution, which seemed about to burst upon them, and received in the prolonged affirmation of the whole assembly, the assurance that they would bear each other as members of one family in their hearts and prayers, would receive each other in the day of persecution to house and home till the storm should be overpast, and would account as their own sisters and their own children the widows and orphans of the brother who should seal his testimony by the martyr's death."

This first meeting of the Kirchentag lasted for three days, and the result of its deliberations, which were conducted with the greatest order and solemnity, was that two very important resolutions were unanimously passed:—

"1. That an invitation should be addressed to all the Protestant churches of Germany, to hold on the 5th of November 1848, the Sunday following the anniversary of the Reformation, a day of general prayer and humiliation, in order to begin the work of the regeneration of Protestantism with the same spirit of true evangelical repentance, with which Luther commenced the Reformation, and which he so clearly expressed in the very first of his ninety-five theses.

"2. A resolution to form a confederation of all those German churches which stand on the ground of the reformatory confessions, not for the purpose of an amalgamation of these churches and an extinction of their peculiarities and relative independence, but for the representation and promotion of the essential unity and brotherly harmony of the evangelical churches; for united testimony against every thing unevangelical; for mutual counsel and aid; for the decision of controversies; for the furtherance of ecclesiastical and social reforms, especially Inner Mission; for the protection and defence of the divine and human rights and liberties of the evangelical church; for forming and promoting the bond of union with all evangelical bodies out of Germany."

The Kirchentag, like the Evangelical Alliance, is not a union of churches, but a union of Christians, both ministers and laymen. It is not a legislative assembly, but a meeting of Christians from all parts of the world, for the purpose of consulting about the common interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. But at the same time it differs from the Evangelical Alliance in one point, that from its first formation it contemplated a confederation of the churches of the Reformation.

From its first formation in 1848, the Kirchentag has met every year except 1855, when it would have met, as had been fully arranged, at Halle, had not the cholera broken out in that city. Its two first meetings took place at Wittenberg, but ever since they have been held at different towns, and the attendance of members has of course varied in amount. The meetings of the Kirchentag continue for four days, two of which are devoted to the congress of Inner Mission. Each session is opened and closed with devotional exercises, and the business is exclusively of a spiritual character, and separate sessions are held early in the morning, and late in the evening for special objects of a practical kind, such as Sabbath observance, prison discipline, the establishment of houses of refuge, the cultivation of religious art, and similar matters.

The meeting of the Kirchentag at Berlin in 1853, was perhaps the most important of all the meetings which have been held. On that occasion the Augsburg Confession of 1530 was unanimously adopted as the fundamental symbol of the entire Evangelical Church of Germany in all its branches, with the distinct understanding, however, that the tenth article on the Lord's Supper should not exclude the Reformed doctrine on the subject, and that this whole act should not interfere at all with the peculiar position of those churches which never adopted the Augsburg Confession. Two thousand members of the Kirchentag solemnly gave their assent to this decision, which was hailed by the king of Prussia, and the pious Protestants of Germany, as a most gratifying testimony of the doctrinal unity which prevailed in the great sections of German Protestantism, while at the same time it was a most powerful protest against both Romanism and Rationalism.

The meetings which have been held since 1853 have been characterized by a spirit of union and Christian love. Questions of great practical importance have been discussed with the utmost independence of mind, and yet with the most commendable meekness and forbearance. Thus the Kirchentag has exercised a most salutary Christian influence, not only upon the cities in which its meetings are held, but even upon the remotest parts of Germany. It has promoted the cause of Christian union both at home and abroad. But the impulse which it has given to the work of INNER MISSION (which see), may well be regarded as the crowning act of the Kirchentag, and though it is possible that the progress of a high-church Lutheran spirit may ultimately break up this friendly confederation of Christian ministers and laymen, the benefit which has already accrued from it to the cause of practical Christianity and Christian philanthropy will not soon be forgotten.

KIRIATH SHEMA (Heb. the reading of the Shema', the recital by the Jews of certain passages of the Old Testament Scriptures called SHEMA (which see).

KIRIN, a monster which occupies a conspicuous place in the fabulous legends of the Chinese and the Japanese. It is supposed to be not only gentle, innocent, and inoffensive, but virtuous and holy. It is never seen, therefore, but at the appearance of a particular constellation, and at the nativity of some worthy benefactor of his race. The Kirin of Japan is a dragon with three claws, and that of China with five.

KIRK (Ger. kirche, Gr. kuriake, Sax. or Teut. kerke), a place set apart for divine worship. It is also applied to the congregation which assembles in one place, and to the various congregations which in their collective capacity form one communion.

KISLAR AGA, the chief of the black eunuchs in Turkey, who is intrusted with superintendence of all the mosques.

KISSING (SACRED). The ancient heathens were accustomed to kiss the hands, the feet, the knees, or even the mouths of the gods. It was also accounted a part of devotion to kiss the doors of the temples, the pillars and the posts of the gates. Among idolaters, in times as remote as the days of Job, it seems to have been a customary act of worship to their distant or unseen deities to kiss the hand. To this there is an evident allusion in Job xxxi. 26, 27, "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness: and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand." At the inauguration of the ancient Jewish kings, the principal men of the kingdom, as an expression of their homage to the new monarch, kissed either his feet or his knees. A reference to this act of homage seems to be made in Ps. ii. 12, "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him." An Oriental shows his respect to a superior by kissing his hand and putting it to his forehead; but if the superior be of a kind and condescending turn of mind, he will snatch away his hand as soon as the other has touched it; then the inferior puts his own fingers to his lips, and afterwards to his forehead. The Mohammedan pilgrims, as a religious duty, kiss the black stone in the KAABA (which see) at Mecca. Kissing as a mark of idolatrous reverence is referred to in Hosea xiii. 2, "Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves:" and 1 Kings xix. 18, "And every mouth which hath not kissed him," that is, Baal. The Roman Catholics make very frequent use of this ceremony in religious worship. Thus they kiss the crucifix and the relics of saints. In sprinkling the holy water, the priest kisses the aspergillum or sprinkling brush; and at the procession on Palm-Sunday the deacon kisses the palm which he presents to the priest. In the rite of ordination, as laid down in the Romish Pontifical, the ordained priests kiss the hand of the Pontiff. On numberless occasions the ceremony of kissing as a religious rite is practised among Romanists. One of the most extraordinary instances, however, of the use of this mode of expressing sacred homage and respect is that of kissing the Pope's foot or toe, which has been required by Popes as a token of respect from the secular power since the eighth century. The first who received this honour was Pope Constantine I. It was paid him by the Emperor Justinian II. on his entry into Constantinople in A. D. 710. But the first Pope who made it imperative was Valentine I. about A. D. 827, who required every one to kiss his foot: and from that time this mark of reverence appears to have been expected by all the Popes. When this ceremony is to be performed, the Pope wears a slipper with a cross upon it which is kissed.

KISS OF PEACE. One of the most conspicuous features in the character of the early Christians, was the love which they bore one to another; and in token of Christian affection they were accustomed when they met together to kiss each other. This outward expression of love was manifested in their private houses, at their public meetings, and on all suitable occasions. Such a practice, however, was avoided on the public streets, lest it should be misunderstood and misrepresented by their heathen fellow-citizens. When they met their pastor they were accustomed to bow their heads, and to receive his benediction, but afterwards, when greater reverence was attached to the clerical office, the practice was introduced of kissing the hands of their pastor, and embracing his feet. In the early Christian church after baptism had been administered to a convert, he was received into the church by the first kiss of Christian brotherhood, the salutation of peace, and from that time he had the right of saluting all Christians with this fraternal sign. But Clement of Alexandria complains that even in his day the kiss of peace had become a mere form, a matter of outward display, which excited the suspicion of the heathen. This early Father objects to such a ceremony on the ground that love shows itself not in the brotherly kiss, but in the disposition of the heart. This outward form of salutation, however, as a token of Christian affection, appears to have been an apostolic custom, as it is frequently mentioned in the writings of the apostles. Thus, for example, it is referred to in Rom. xvi. 16, 1 Cor. xvi. 20, 2 Cor. xiii. 12, 1 Thess. v. 26, and 1 Pet. v. 14. This practice continued in use for several centuries. It was usual after baptism, both in the case of infants and adults, as late as the fifth century, but after that time it seems to have been superseded by the simple salutation, Pax tecum. Peace be with you. The kiss of peace was also one of the rites of the sacramental service, and not only so, but it was observed on common occasions of public worship. It was omitted on Good Friday in commemoration of the traitorous kiss of Judas Iscariot. To prevent the abuses which might naturally arise out of this practice, the different sexes were not permitted to interchange this salutation with one another. The kiss of peace was often a matter of taunt and reproach on the part of the enemies of Christianity, but it was still continued through the eighth and ninth centuries, even to the thirteenth, when it appears to have ceased. According to the canons of the council of Laodicea, the presbyters were appointed first to give this kiss to the bishop, and then the laity were to exchange it among themselves. At the ordination of a bishop, it was customary after his consecration for all the bishops and clergy present to salute him with a holy kiss in the Lord. The solemn kiss formed also an essential part of the ceremony of espousals or betrothal among the ancient Christians. Such importance, indeed, did Constantine attach to this token of contract between the parties betrothed to each other, that he laid it down as a law, and it was afterwards embodied in the Code of Justinian, that if a man betrothed a woman by the intervention of the kiss, then if either party died before marriage, the heirs of the deceased party were entitled to half the donations, and the survivor to the other half; but if the contract was made without the intervention of the solemn kiss, then upon the death of either party before marriage, the whole of the espousal gifts must be restored to the donor or his heirs at law. A corrupt practice crept into some places, but was strictly forbidden by the canons,—that of giving the kiss of peace to the dead; and such a practice receives a favourable mention from the author who calls himself Dionysius the Areopagite. It was evidently the offspring of a blind superstition, and accordingly, when it began to creep into France about A. D. 578, the council of Auxerre passed a decree declaring it unlawful to give the kiss of peace to the dead.

KITU, homage or reverence paid by one person to another, among the natives of Japan. Inferiors being seated on their heels according to the Japanese fashion, testified their respect for their superiors by laying the palms of their hands on the floor, and bending their bodies so low that their foreheads almost touched the ground. This is called the Kitu.

The superior responded by laying the palms of his hands upon his knees, and nodding or bowing, more or less low, according to the rank of the other party.

KNEELERS. See GENUFLECTENTES.

KNEELING IN PRAYER. This seems to be a proper and becoming attitude in devotion, and abundant authority for the practice is found in Scripture. Thus we find it distinctly mentioned in 2 Chron. vi. 13, Dan. vi. 10, Luke xxii. 41, Acts vii. 60, and Eph. iii. 14. The expression to bow the knee, is referred to in 1 Kings xix. 18, as denoting to perform an act of worship; and in this sense it is used in the Hebrew, in Isa. lxvi. 3, "He that worships idols," is literally "He that bows the knee" to them. In the early Christian church, the act of kneeling was regarded as a sign of humiliation before God; hence it was uniformly required of all who had fallen under the censure of the church for their offences. Basil calls it the lesser penance, in distinction from the act of prostration which was termed the greater penance. Constantine, followed by Theodosius, enacted a law that on festival days prayers were to be offered by the congregation not kneeling but standing. The primitive Christians conducted their devotions in a kneeling posture during six days of the week, but in a standing attitude on the Lord's day. Justin Martyr accounts for the difference thus, "Forasmuch as we ought to remember both our fall by sin, and the grace of Christ, by which we rise again from our fall; therefore we pray kneeling six days as a symbol of our fall by sin; but our not kneeling on the Lord's day is a symbol of the resurrection, whereby, through the grace of Christ we are delivered from our sins, and from death, that is mortified thereby." The standing attitude, instead of the kneeling, was adopted also during the time of Pentecost. The practice, however, of refraining from kneeling on the Lord's day, and the time of Pentecost, seems not to have been uniformly observed by all the churches, for we find the council of Nice decreeing, "Because there are some who kneel on the Lord's day, and in the days of Pentecost; that all things may be uniformly performed in every parish or diocese, it seems good to the holy synod that prayers be made to God standing." Hilary also speaks of it as an apostolical practice, neither to fast nor worship kneeling on the Lord's day, or the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost. Jerome reckons it among the traditions of the universal church. Cassian says of the Egyptian churches, that from Saturday night to Sunday night, and all the days of Pentecost, they neither kneeled nor fasted. On all other occasions kneeling was a common and ordinary posture of devotion, so that prayer was often termed bending the knees. It is the almost universal practice of Christians to kneel in private prayer, and even in the public devotions of the sanctuary; some churches prefer the kneeling, while others prefer the standing attitude.

KNIGHTHOOD (ECCLESIASTICAL ORDERS OF). During the time of the CRUSADES (which see), a spirit of chivalry developed itself in various parts of Europe, which accounted it the highest of all deeds of piety to do battle with the infidels. The warlike spirit came to be combined with the monastic, and from this apparently incongruous union arose the several Orders of Christian Knighthood.

In A. D. 1119, nine knights of Jerusalem first constituted themselves into an ecclesiastical order, under Hugh de Payens as grand-master. This new order of knighthood attracted the notice and the approval of St. Bernard, who quickly spread their fame throughout the western world; and in 1128 they received the sanction of the church through a decree of the synod of Troyes. This of course led to their rapid increase in numbers, wealth, and influence. Their example was speedily followed by the brethren of the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem. Both orders having been invested with special privileges by the Pope, were not long in attaining property and power. A spirit of jealousy, however, arose between them, and they showed themselves to be more zealous for the honour and advantage of their respective orders, than for the Holy Land. Complaints, accordingly, began to arise in all quarters on the immorality, faithlessness, and pride of these knights, particularly the Templars. After the conquest of Ptolemais in 1291, they first withdrew to Cyprus. Then the Hospitallers in 1309 settled in Rhodes. The Templars, however, repaired to the west, and took up their abode chiefly in Paris.

In the twelfth century, other lesser orders of ecclesiastical knighthood sprung up, which were for the most part connected with the order of the CISTERCIANS (which see). During the siege of Ptolemais, in A. D. 1190, the Order of German or Teutonic knights came into existence; but having, in 1226, withdrawn into Prussia to conquer the Pagan inhabitants of that country, they joined in 1237 with the Order of the Brethren of the Sword against the infidel Livonians. Another minor order of knights was formed, under the direction of the Dominicans, for conducting the war against the Albigenses in the south of France. Afterwards, this order settled in Northern Italy, and was known by the name of the Rejoicing Brothers. The three principal orders of Christian knighthood, however, which were formed in the twelfth century for the defence of Christianity against the infidels, were, 1. The Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, whose primary object was to relieve and assist the crowds of pilgrims who visited the Holy Land. 2. The Knights Templars, who were a strictly military order, intended to guard the roads, and to protect the Christians from the assaults of the Mohammedans. 3. The Teutonic Knights of St. Mary, whose office it was to care for and specially tend the soldiers wounded in the holy wars. The two latter orders have been long extinct, the Templars having been abolished by Pope Clement in 1311; but the Knights of St. John have found an asylum in the island of Malta, where they still exist.

KNIPPERDOLINGS, a section of the ANABAPTISTS (which see) who appeared in Germany in the sixteenth century, deriving their name from their leader, Bertrand Knipperdoling. They are alleged to have denied original sin, and justification by faith, and to have rejected infant baptism. They are also accused of having alleged the right of every Christian to preach and administer the sacraments, and to have held that all things ought to be in common.

KODESH, a certain prayer in the daily morning service of the Jewish synagogue, so efficacious, in the opinion of the modern Jews, that when the son says it publicly, he delivers his father and his mother out of hell. Hence, in the case of a Jewish funeral, when the relatives return home, and the prayers for the dead have been repeated, the sons of the deceased, or his nearest male relatives, repeat the Kodesh. This prayer, which is supposed to be possessed of the most wonderful efficacy, runs as follows:—"O may the mighty power of the Lord be now magnified, as thou hast declared, saying, O Lord! remember thy tender mercies and thy loving kindnesses, for they have been of old. May his great name be exalted and sanctified throughout the world, which he hath created according to his will. May he establish his kingdom in your lifetime, and in the lifetime of the whole house of Israel; soon, and in a short time, and say ye Amen—Amen. May his great name be blessed and glorified for ever and ever. May his hallowed name be praised, glorified, exalted, magnified, honoured, and most excellently adored: blessed is he, far exceeding all blessings, hymns, praises, and beatitudes, that are repeated throughout the world; and say ye Amen. May our prayers be accepted with mercy and kindness. May the prayers and supplications of the whole house of Israel be accepted in the presence of their Father who is in heaven: and say ye Amen. Blessed be the name of the Lord, from henceforth and for evermore. May the fulness of peace from heaven, with life, be granted unto us and all Israel: and say ye Amen. My help is from the Lord, who made heaven and earth. May he who maketh peace in his high heavens, bestow peace on us and on all Israel: and say ye Amen."

KODOM (SOMMONA), another name for BUDHA GOTAMA (which see).

KOLATHITES, a division of the Levites, who were of the family of Kolath. Their special duty, as laid down in Num. iv. 1—15, was to carry the ark and sacred vessels of the Tabernacle during the marches of the Israelites. See LEVITES.

KOIVE, the high-priest of the Pagan inhabitants of ancient Prussia. When it thundered, they believed that their Koive was conversing with their god PERUN (which see), and hence they fell down in adoration of that deity, and implored of him to send them more propitious weather.

KORAN (AL, Arab., the Reading), the sacred book of the Mohammedans, which probably derives its name from the passage which the angel Gabriel is said to have first revealed to the prophet: "Read! in the name of thy Lord who hath created thee, who hath created man of congealed blood—read! for thy Lord is most bounteous. He it is who has taught by the pen, who has taught man what he did not know." The Koran claims to be possessed of a higher inspiration than the Christian Scriptures, inasmuch as in their case the inspiration was conveyed through the medium of holy men, while in the Koran God himself is the only speaker. This book is said to have been delivered not all at once, but in successive portions, extending over a period of twenty-three years. To account for this, it has been alleged that the Koran had existed from eternity with God, and had been conveyed from the preserved table in the divine presence to the lowest heaven, from which it was communicated in greater or less portions, as needed, by the angel Gabriel. In one passage, indeed, the Koran professes to have been sent down in a night, the blessed night of Al Kadr; but the numerous contradictions which occur in the book, afford ample proof that it must have been written at different times, if not by different persons. Thus in prayer the faithful are ordered in one passage to turn towards Jerusalem, and in another passage they are commanded to turn towards Mecca, while in a third they are taught that it is of no importance in what direction they turn in prayer. Idolaters are ordered in one passage to be tolerated, and in another to be exterminated. But passing from the internal evidence, which the book itself affords, that it is not eternal, but must have been created, some Mohammedan doctors are accustomed to argue against its eternity, on the ground that there cannot be two eternal Beings, the Deity and the Koran; and the Caliph Almanun held this opinion so firmly, that he persecuted those who declared the Koran to be uncreated and eternal. After a protracted controversy on the subject, both parties came to acquiesce in the opinion of Algazali, which he thus expressed:—"The Koran is pronounced with the tongue, written in books, and kept in the memory, and yet is eternal, subsisting in the Divine essence, and not separate from it."

In the preparation of this sacred book, it has been generally alleged that while the uniformity of style which characterizes it, and the frequent recurrence of the same identical terms and phrases, show it to have been the production of one man, it is not unlikely that for many of the facts and ideas, at all events, Mohammed was indebted to other persons. Hence the Mohammedan authors mention several assistants, and in particular Salman, a Persian, who communicated to him from the Zend Avesta some of the Zoroastrian doctrines, such as the description of heaven and hell, but more especially of the narrow bridge AL SIRAT (which see), and of the houris or black-eyed damsels which enhance the joys of the

Mohammedan Paradise. The early Christian writers again speak of a Nestorian monk called Sergius as lending Mohammed valuable assistance in the composition of the Koran. There is no satisfactory evidence, however, that Mohammed received aid in his great work, but there is every reason to believe that he was its sole author. When the prophet died, the record was left in the utmost confusion. Not being able himself to write, he was under the necessity of employing a secretary or amanuensis. Of these he is said to have had in the course of his life no fewer than fifteen, the most eminent of them being Abubekr and Othman, both sons-in-law, and both in succession reaching the Caliphate. It would appear that even while Mohammed lived, the faithful were allowed to make copies for their own use, while many people committed them to memory. When the prophet, accordingly, had closed his earthly career, the Koran consisted simply of scattered leaves, which had never been brought together, and many passages existed only in the memories of some of the faithful. Abubekr was the first who collected the scattered fragments into a volume, without regard to date, but putting only the long chapters first. It was soon discovered, however, that other copies, at least of portions, were in circulation, having a variety of different readings. To secure an accurate text, therefore, Othman, in the thirtieth year of the Hegira, ordered all the versions to be submitted to a committee of learned men, who were directed, whenever they differed about a word, to translate it into its equivalent in the Koreishite dialect of the Arabic, which was the original language in which the book was written. Having thus secured a perfect text, Othman published a new and standard edition of the Koran, ordering all others to be destroyed. Hence there are no various readings of any consequence, though some minor discrepancies are still found, in consequence of the text having been anterior to the use of vowels and signs.

Mohammedan doctors have in many cases been puzzled to account for the evident inconsistencies and direct contradictions which occur occasionally throughout the Koran. Unless satisfactorily explained, these must necessarily militate against the alleged character of the book as being directly inspired. To obviate this serious objection, accordingly, an ingenious theory has been devised, which is termed the doctrine of abrogation. Learned Mussulmans have alleged three kinds of abrogation, to which all passages in the Koran may be referred:—1. Where the letter is abrogated, though the sense remains. 2. Where the sense is abrogated, but the letter remains; and, 3. Where both the letter and the sense are in palpable contradiction to some other letter and sense in some other chapter, or else to the known practice of the faithful. A convenient doctrine of this kind enables a commentator on the Koran to reduce its most contradictory passages to complete order and consistency; not, however, by explaining, but by explaining away the difficulties; not by unloosing, but by summarily cutting the knot.

The Koran consists of 114 portions or chapters, some very long, others containing no more than two or three sentences. The introductory chapter, called the "Opening," consists of seven verses, and is used by Mohammedans as frequently as the Lord's Prayer by Christians. The rest of the volume is arranged according to the length of the chapters, which, as a whole, are called Asicar. Each chapter is designated by a name drawn from the subject, or from a prominent word. The title of each chapter states where it was revealed to the prophet; and thus we learn that eighty-three of these chapters were revealed at Mecca, twenty-eight at Medina, and three are doubtful. There is a marked difference between the first class of these chapters and the second. Those revealed at Mecca are full of admonitions; those at Medina are full of commands, evidently dictated with the authority of a sovereign.

The literary merit of the Koran is undoubtedly of a high order, considering the time of its production, and the circumstances of its author. The materials have been drawn from a variety of sources, Jewish, Christian, and Zoroastrian, and the style is somewhat obscure from its elliptical character; but many of those skilled in Arabic literature have not hesitated to regard it as on the whole a work of wonderful merit. To the English reader, who has access only to the translation of Sale, much of its beauty disappears from the foolish legendary stories and the tiresome repetitions with which it abounds. Even Gibbon declares, speaking of the Koran, "The European infidel will peruse with impatience the endless incoherent rhapsody of fable and precept and declamation which seldom excites a sentiment or an idea, which sometimes crawls in the dust, and is sometimes lost in the clouds. The Divine attributes exalt the fancy of the Arabian Missionary, but his loftiest strains must yield to the sublime simplicity of the book of Job." From the pen of the sceptical historian, this estimate has at all events the merit of impartiality. The Koran, indeed, can never, even as a literary composition, stand a comparison with the Scriptures, whether of the Old or the New Testament. Yet the matchless beauty of the Koran is regarded by the followers of the Prophet of Arabia as an article of faith, which it is heresy to deny or even to doubt.

The Mohammedan looks upon the Koran as the Word of God, and therefore he regards it with a reverence which degenerates into superstition. The Faithful consider it not only as containing a sacred message, but as in itself a sacred object. They dare not touch it with unwashed hands, and the warning is generally written upon the cover, "Let none touch it but those who are purified." They hold it with great care and respect while they read, keeping it above their girdles. All of them who understand the Arabic language are in the habit of reading it.

In the schools it is the schoolbook which they learn to read, and a title equivalent to "Rememberer" is given to those who have committed it wholly to memory. It is a high religious act to transcribe the entire book; and sovereigns have accounted it an honourable and sacred employment to perform this laborious task. On festivals, at funerals, and other public occasions, its recital by hired readers is esteemed an act of piety, beneficial alike to the living and the dead. For the guidance of public reciters, it is divided into sixty portions, or into thirty sections, each of which is subdivided into four.

The Koran is often used or rather abused for superstitious purposes. Thus the whole volume is sometimes transcribed in a very small character, put in a case, and hung round the neck as a charm. Some favourite chapters are worn about the person, and considered to carry good fortune with them, as well as to deliver from diseases and calamities of every kind. Fourteen chapters when recited require prostration. Two are recommended on the authority of Mohammed, according to the Traditions, as the best for repeating in prayer, namely the 113th and the 114th chapters; both of which the commentators say were revealed to free Mohammed from the incantations of a Jew and his daughters. The 112th chapter, that on the unity of God, is said to be worth a third of the Koran.

Mohammed admitted that there had been divine revelations before his time, among which were the Law given to Moses, the Psalter to David, and the Gospel to Jesus; but all former communications from God to men are considered by the Faithful as having been abrogated by the Book given to the Arabian Prophet. The contest is still carried on among Mohammedan theologians as to the origin of the Koran, whether it was eternal like God himself, or created at the moment of its revelation; and the very continuance of such a controversy clearly shows the high estimation in which the Book is held, not only among the great mass of illiterate Moslems, but even among the learned portion of the Mohammedans, who have made the study of the Koran the object of their lives. See MOHAMMED, MOHAMMEDANS.

KOUNBOUM (Thibetian, ten thousand images), a place in the country of Amdo in Thibet, where grows a wonderful tree, known by the name of the Tree of Ten Thousand Images. According to a legend which is credited by the people, this wonderful tree sprung from the hair of Tsong-Kaba, a celebrated Buddhist reformer, who founded the great monastery of Khal-dan, near Lhassa, in 1409, and by whose influence a number of changes was effected both in the administration and the ritual system of Thibetian Buddhism. (See LAMAISTS.) The Tree of Ten Thousand Images is thus described by M. Hue, who personally visited it: "At the foot of the mountain on which the Lamasery stands, and not far from the principal Buddhist temple, is a great square enclosure, formed by brick walls. Upon entering this we were able to examine at leisure the marvelous tree, some of the branches of which had already manifested themselves above the wall. Our eyes were first directed with earnest curiosity to the leaves, and we were filled with an absolute consternation of astonishment at finding that, in point of fact, there were upon each of the leaves well-formed Thibetian characters, all of a green colour, some darker, some lighter than the leaf itself. Our first impression was a suspicion of fraud on the part of the Lamas; but, after a minute examination of every detail, we could not discover the least deception. The characters all appeared to us portions of the leaf itself, equally with its veins and nerves; the position was not the same in all; in one leaf they would be at the top of the leaf, in another, in the middle; in a third, at the base, or at the side; the younger leaves represented the characters only in a partial state of formation. The bark of the tree and its branches, which resemble that of the plane tree, are also covered with these characters. When you remove a piece of old bark, the young bark under it exhibits the indistinct outlines of characters in a germinating state, and, what is very singular, these new characters are not unfrequently different from those which they replace. We examined everything with the closest attention, in order to detect some trace of trickery, but we could discern nothing of the sort, and the perspiration absolutely trickled down our faces under the influence of the sensations which this most amazing spectacle created. More profound intellects than ours may, perhaps, be able to supply a satisfactory explanation of the mysteries of this singular tree; but as to us, we altogether give it up. Our readers possibly may smile at our ignorance; but we care not, so that the sincerity and truth of our statement be not suspected.

"The Tree of the Ten Thousand Images seemed to us of great age. Its trunk, which three men could scarcely embrace with outstretched arms, is not more than eight feet high; the branches, instead of shooting up, spread out in the shape of a plume of feathers, and are extremely bushy; few of them are dead. The leaves are always green, and the wood, which is of a reddish tint, has an exquisite odour, something like that of cinnamon. The Lamas informed us that in summer, towards the eighth moon, the tree produces large red flowers of an extremely beautiful character. They informed us also that there nowhere else exists another such tree; that many attempts have been made in various Lamaseries of Tartary and Thibet to propagate it by seeds and cuttings, but that all these attempts have been fruitless.

"The Emperor Khang-Hi, when upon a pilgrimage to Kounboun, constructed, at his own private expense, a dome of silver over the Tree of the Ten Thousand Images; moreover, he made a present to the Grand Lama of a fine black horse, capable of travelling a thousand li a day, and of a saddle adorned with precious stones. The horse is dead, but the saddle is still shown in one of the Buddhist temples, where it is an object of special veneration. Before quitting the Lamasery, Khang-Hi endowed it with a yearly revenue, for the support of 350 Lamas."

The Lamasery of Kounboun, in which there are nearly 4,000 Lamas, is so famous, that the worshippers of Budha resort thither in pilgrimage from all parts of Tartary and Thibet, so that not a day passes in which there are not pilgrims arriving and departing. On the four great festivals, particularly the Feast of Flowers, which takes place on the fifteenth day of the first moon, the congregation of strangers is immense.

KOURÉN OF THE THOUSAND LAMAS, a celebrated Lamasery in Tartary, which dates from the invasion of China by the Manchous. When the founder of the now reigning dynasty in China was on his way to Peking, he met a Thibetian Lama who encouraged him in his warlike enterprise by predicting his success, whereupon the Manchou chief invited the friendly Lama to visit him when he should be installed in the imperial palace at Peking. The result of the war was, as the Lama had foretold, favourable to the Manchous, and in token of gratitude the new Emperor presented the Thibetian priest with a large extent of land on which to construct a Lamasery, and revenues sufficient for the maintenance of a thousand Lamas. The Lamasery has made such progress in prosperity, however, from the time of its erection that it now contains more than four thousand Lamas. The Grand Lama of this Lamasery is also the governor of the district, who makes laws, administers justice, and appoints magistrates. When he dies his subjects go in search of him in Thibet, where he is understood to pass into another person who is to be his successor.

KRISHNA, the eighth of the AVATARS (which see), or incarnations of Vishnu. His name does not occur in the Rig-Veda, the earliest of the Vedas, so that he cannot be considered as a deity of the Vaidic period. The first appearance of Krishna-worship is in the BHAGAVAT-GITA (which see), a work which Mr. J. C. Thomson, its recent editor and translator, is disposed to place no farther back than between B. C. 100 and A. D. 300. In this poem, which chiefly consists of a conversation between two friends, Arjuna and Krishna, the latter of them plainly declares concerning himself, "I am the cause of the production and dissolution of the whole universe. There exists no other thing superior to me. . . . On me is all the universe suspended, as numbers of pearls on a string;" adding also, that he was the mystic syllable ATM (which see) in all the Vedas." Arjuna, recognizing the divinity of Krishna, offers up to him the following remarkable prayer: "The universe, O Krishna! is justly delighted with thy glory, and devoted to thee. The Rakshasas [evil spirits] flee, astounded, to the divers quarters of heaven, and all the multitudes of the Siddhas [demi-gods] salute thee. And, indeed, why should they not adore thee, O great one! thee, the first creator, more important even than Brahmā himself? O infinite king of gods! habitation of the universe! thou art the one indivisible, the existing and not existing [spirit and matter], that which is supreme. Thou art the first of the gods, the most ancient person. Thou art the supreme receptacle of this universe. Thou knowest all, and mayest be known, and art the supreme mansion. By thee is this universe caused to emanate, O thou of endless forms. . . Thou All! Of infinite power and immense might, thou comprehendest all; therefore thou art All. As I took thee merely for a friend, I beseech thee without measure to pardon whatever I may, in ignorance of this thy greatness, have said from negligence or affection, such as, O Krishna! O son of Yada! O friend! and everything in which I may have treated thee in a joking manner, in recreation, repose, sitting, or meals, whether in private, or in the presence of these, eternal One! Thou art the father of the animate and inanimate world."

In the earlier avatars, Vishnu had only exhibited a portion of his godhead, but Krishna was a full manifestation, an actual incarnation of the preserving deity. But although the Bhagavat-Gita plainly acknowledges Krishna as Vishnu in human shape, and claiming all the attributes of Supreme Deity, being even called "the Lord of the world," "the Creator," "the Lord of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva," yet ages elapsed before Krishna-worship became a prominent feature in the Hindu system. Lassen thinks it was introduced in the hope of counterbalancing the influence of Buddhism at a time when that system was threatening to overspread the whole of Hindustan; and this view coincides with that of Elphinstone, who refers this and all the other forms of worship addressed to particular incarnations, to a period later than the beginning of the eighth century of our era. Even then indeed Krishnaism, if we may so speak, was in a comparatively undeveloped form, and it was not till several centuries after, that the legend of Krishna came to exhibit the fullness and completeness in which it appears in the Hindu Purāṇas.

Several Orientalists of high name have been struck with the remarkable coincidences of the legend of Krishna and the narratives of Holy Scripture. To account for these, Sir William Jones advances the supposition that "spurious Gospels which abounded in the first age of Christianity had been brought to India, and the wildest part of them repeated to the Hindus, who engrafted them on the old fable of Cæsa, the Apollo of Greece." This theory has been adopted by other writers, who have pointed out the Gospel of St. Thomas, better known as the "Gospel of Infancy," which was circulated at an early period on the coast of Malabar. And when we reflect that the Bhagavat-Gita in which Krishna is set forth in his highest aspect, as an incarnation of and identical with the Supreme Being, is generally believed to be a production of an age long posterior to the publication of the Sacred Volume, it is quite possible that some of the ideas of the Hindu legend may have been borrowed from the narratives of the Christian Scriptures.

Krishna-worship prevails to a great extent among the Hindus of the Vaishnava sects, particularly among the wealthy and the women. Another form of this worship, however, which is more popular still is the Bala Gopala, the infant Krishna, the worship of whom is very widely diffused among all ranks of Indian society. This species of worship is called from the title of its teachers, the religion of the Gokulashtha Gosains; and in their temples and houses the image of Krishna represents a chubby boy of the dark hue of which Vishnu is always represented, and eight times a-day the homage of the votaries of this god is paid to the image. The eight daily ceremonies are thus described by Professor H. H. Wilson: "1. Mangala: the morning levee. The image being washed and dressed, is taken from the couch, where it is supposed to have slept during the night, and placed upon a seat, about half an hour after sunrise: slight refreshments are then presented to it, with betel and Pan: lamps are generally kept burning during this ceremony. 2. Sringāra: the image having been anointed and perfumed with oil, camphor, and sandal, and splendidly attired, now holds his public court: this takes place about an hour and a half after the preceding, or when four Gheris of the day have elapsed. 3. Gwala: the image is now visited, preparatory to his going out to attend the cattle along with the cow-herd; this ceremony is held about forty-eight minutes after the last, or when six Gheris have passed. 4. Raja Bhoga: held at midday, when Krishna is supposed to come in from the pastures, and dine; all sorts of delicacies are placed before the image, and both those, and other articles of food dressed by the ministers of the temple, are distributed to the numerous votaries present, and not unfrequently sent to the dwellings of worshippers of some rank and consequence. 5. Uthāpan: the calling up. The summoning of the god from his siesta: this takes place at six Gheris, or between two and three hours before sunset. 6. Bhoga: the afternoon meal: about half an hour after the preceding. 7. Sandhya: about sunset: the evening toilet of the image, when the ornaments of the day are taken off, and fresh unguent and perfume applied. 8. Sayan: retiring to repose: the image, about eight or nine in the evening, is placed upon a bed, refreshments and water in proper vases, together with the betel-box and its appurtenances, are left near it, when the votaries retire, and the temple is shut till the ensuing morning."

On each of these occasions similar rites are gone through, flowers, perfumes, and food being presented before the image, while the praises of Krishna are repeated in Sanskrit stanzas, accompanied with a variety of prostrations and obeisances.

KRITA, or SATYA AGE, the age of truth, according to the Hindu system, being the earliest in the history of the human race, in which man sprung from the hand of his Creator, pure and sinless, not divided into conflicting orders, and with all his faculties working together in harmony.

KSHATTRYA, the military caste of the Hindus, sprung from the arm of Brahma, whose office it is to defend their fellows from internal violence and outward assault. The duties of this caste as laid down in the Code of Menu are to defend the people, give alms, and read the Vedas; and at any age up to twenty-two and twenty-four, they must be invested with the mark of the caste. The Kshatrya caste is extinct, or in other words, it is no longer found as a distinct division of society. But the whole country of Rajputana claims to be inhabited by Kshatryas, although they want the sacrificial thread with which the members of this caste were originally invested.

KTISTOLATRÆ. See APITHARTODOCITES, CREATICOLÆ.

KULIKA, one of the chiefs of the Nagas or serpents (see SERPENT WORSHIP), in the Hindu mythology, who complained to the Lord of the universe that for no fault of his he was continually tormented by the Suras or inferior gods. In answer to the prayer of Kulika, or Kulikêtu, as he is sometimes termed, Brahma is said to have enjoined that he should henceforth receive adoration like the devas from each human being, and that mortals who refused to pay such worship to him, should be cut off by some unnatural death, and deprived of the power of rising higher in the scale of created beings. In regard to the right interpretation of this myth, Mr. Hardwick, in his 'Christ and other Masters,' ingeniously remarks: "It directs us to behold in Kuliketu an emblem of the earth before it had been subjected to human culture, when it felt itself tormented by the Suras, or, in other words, assaulted by the armies of the firmament—the rain, the lightning, and the tempest. In the midst of this disorder, man, who had been hitherto regardless of the soil on which his lot is cast, and the material out of which his body is constructed, was bidden by the Lord of creation to render homage to the powers and processes of nature, to propitiate the ungenial elements, and welcome in all forms around him the immediate presence of Divinity. According, therefore, to this myth, the serpent was not absolutely and directly charged with the origination of all evil; yet suspicions of such agency were nevertheless implied from first to last in the conception of the story. There was lurking under its fantastic imagery an idea that matter, in the whole compass and duration of it, was intrinsically evil, and might therefore be identified with that which was the recognized embodiment of the evil principle."

KUMANO-GOO, a species of ordeal in use among the Japanese for the detection of crime. The Goo is a piece of paper, formally sealed with the signet of the JAMMAOS (which see), whereon are drawn several mysterious characters, and the figures of ravens as well as other ill-omened birds. This charm, they imagine, defends them against the attacks of all malicious spirits; and for this reason every householder nails one of them upon the street door. All Goos, however, have not an equal efficacy. The most powerful, and those which are most dreaded by the demons, come from a place called Kumano. The ordeal of Kumano-Goo consists in making the party accused swallow a small piece of Goo in a certain quantity of water. If he be really guilty, the Goo twinges and gripes him in the most violent manner, till he is obliged to confess his guilt.

KUSA, the sacred grass of the Hindus. On the Kusa, the Yogi, or Hindu ascetic, whose business is the restraining of his passions, must sit, with his mind fixed on one object alone, keeping his head, his neck, his body, steady without motion, his eyes fixed upon the point of his nose, looking at no other place around.

KUSALA, merit among the Buddhists, which is included in KARMA (which see). "There are three principal meanings," says Mr. Spence Hardy, "of the word kusala, viz., freedom from sickness, exemption from blame, and reward; but as used by Budha, its primary idea is that of cutting, or excision. It has a cognate use in the word kusa, the sacrificial grass that cuts with both its edges the hand of him who lays hold of it carelessly. That which is cut by kusala is klêsha, evil desire, or the cleaving to existence. Akusala is the opposite of kusala. That which is neither kusala nor akusala is awyâkrata; it is not followed by any consequence; it receives no reward, either good or bad."

KUTUCHTA, the chief priest of the Calmuc Tartars and Western Mongols. In former times he was subject to the DALAI-LAMA (which see) of Thibet, but in course of time, being far distant from his superior, he made a schism among the Lamaists, and established himself as an independent ecclesiastical ruler, on an equal footing with the Dalai-Lama himself. The chief magistrates and persons of distinction are alone allowed to approach his sacred presence; and when he gives them his blessing, he lays his hand upon their foreheads, having a chaplet in it at the same time, similar to those carried by the Lamas. The Kutuchta never exposes himself to public view, but on some particular days when he comes forth surrounded with the utmost pomp and ceremony. He is carried in procession to a tent, covered with Chinese velvet, where he sits cross-legged on a throne, erected on a large square eminence, surrounded with a large number of cushions on which are seated the subordinate Lamas. On either side of the chief pontiff are placed two idols, which represent the Divine essence. As soon as the Kutuehta has taken his seat upon the throne, the music with which he was ushered into the tent ceases, and the whole assembly first prostrate themselves on the ground, and then burst forth into loud acclamations of praise to the Deity, and lofty eulogiums upon the Kutuehta. The Lamas now throw odoriferous herbs into their censers, and with these they perfume the idols, the pontiff, and the whole congregation. As soon as this ceremony is over, each Lama deposits his censer at the feet of the pontiff, and the leading one of their number takes seven separate cups filled with different ingredients, such as milk, honey, tea, or brandy, presenting them as an offering to the idols. Then he takes seven other cups, filled with the same ingredients, and presents them to the Kutuehta. During this part of the ceremony, the crowd of people present rend the air with their cries in praise of the sovereign pontiff, who first tastes the oblations, and then distributes the remainder to the heads of the several tribes. The Kutuehta now withdraws with the same pomp and pageantry as he entered. "To the idea of immortality," says Picart, "which these people entertain of their Kutuehta, another is added, which is altogether as whimsical and extravagant, and, no doubt, as deeply imprinted on their imaginations as the former; viz. that after the Kutuehta is grown old with the decrease of the moon, he renews his youth at the change of the same planet. The whole mystery of this fantastical notion consists in the holy father suffering his beard to grow from one new moon to another, and never shaving himself, but at her first appearance; at which time he dresses himself in all his splendour, paints his face; and besmears it all over with white and red, as is customary among the Moscovites. As to the notion of this grand pontiff's immortality, the origin and foundation of it is this. All these Tartars hold the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls; and this received opinion induces them to imagine, that the soul of the expiring Kutuehta enters, immediately after his decease, into the body of his successor; or, at least, that the soul of the latter receives all the operations, and is endowed with all the powers and faculties of the soul of the deceased. For which reason, he who is intended to be the old pontiff's successor, must constantly attend him, that the soul of the holy father may qualify the young one, if I may be allowed the expression, for his approaching godhead; that the young soul may every day have familiar converse with the old one, possess all her qualities, and become, as it were, the very same."

KWAMBAK, the first officer at the court of the DAIRI (which see) in Japan, and represents that pontiff when the dignity devolves on a woman or a child.

KWAN-SHI-IX, one of three divinities unknown to the original Buddhists, but worshipped in China as scarcely inferior to Gautama Budha himself. He is also known by the name of Padma-pani, or lotus-bearer, and he is considered as the author of all joy and happiness in the family circle, and has even been deputed to administer the government of the whole earth. In many districts of Thibet he is incarnate, under the name of Padma-pani, in the person of the DALAI-LAMA (which see), and no cry so often meets the ear of the traveller in that country as Om! Mani-Padme! Hum.—"Glory to the lotus-bearer, Hum!" Both in Thibet and in Mongolia this deity is represented sometimes with innumerable eyes and hands, and sometimes with as many as ten heads, all bearing crowns, and rising conically one above another. Throughout China Kwan-shi-in is exhibited with a female figure, and decorations usually worn by females.

KYRIE ELEISON (Gr., O Lord, have mercy), a response made by the people, and an earnest supplication for mercy, introduced at an early period into the Christian church. According to Augustin, it was in use in the Syriac, Armenian, and other Oriental languages. The Council of Vaisen, A.D. 492, ordered its introduction into the churches of France in both the morning and evening prayer and the communion service; and in the preamble of the decree, it is declared to be a very useful and agreeable custom in the Roman Church, and all the provinces of Italy and the East. Gregory the Great introduced a threefold form: 1. O Lord; 2. Lord, have mercy; 3. Christ, have mercy. And each, it would seem, was to be thrice repeated with reference to the sacred Trinity.

KYRKO-HANDBOK, the ritual of the Swedish Church, revised and published in 1811. It is divided into fifteen chapters, containing the Psalms; the morning prayer and communion service; the evening prayer and the holy-day service; the Litany; the forms of baptism, confirmation, marriage, and churching of women; the funeral service; the forms of consecration of churches and of bishops; the form of ordination of priests, &c.

KYRKO-ORDNINGEN, a work first published in 1686, containing the laws regulating the government and discipline of the Church of Sweden.

KYRKO-RAD (Swed. church council), a church court in Sweden, inferior to the diocesan consistories, and nearly answering to a presbytery. It is composed partly of laymen, who are elected by the parishioners. See SWEDEN (CHURCH OF).

LABADISTS, a sect which arose in Holland in the seventeenth century, originated by John Labadie, a Frenchman, of an ardent and enthusiastic temperament. Originally reared in connection with the Church of Rome, he entered the order of the Jesuits, from which, however, he was dismissed in 1639. He now joined the Reformed church, and became a devoted and exemplary pastor, performing the ministerial functions with reputation in France, Switzerland, and Holland. At length he began to preach and to propagate new and peculiar opinions, which resembled in many points the doctrines of the MYSTICS (which see). He speedily gathered around him a number of followers, who were called Labadists, and who resided first at Middleburgh, in Zealand, and afterwards at Amsterdam. In 1670 the sect settled at Herwerden, in Westphalia, under the special patronage of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of the Elector Palatine. After a time, Labadie was compelled to remove his establishment to Altona, in South Holland, where its founder died in 1674, when the community finally removed to Wiewert, in North Holland, and soon after sunk into oblivion.

The Labadists agreed with Schwenkfeld and the Anabaptists in attaching great importance to internal revelation, by which the external revelation is rendered intelligible, and from which it receives its authority. They also entertained very strong views as to the purity of the visible church, maintaining that it ought not to consist of professing disciples of Christ, but of really sanctified Christians, striving after perfection in holiness.

LABARUM, the military standard of the first Christian Emperor, Constantine. The circumstances which led to his adoption of the Labarum are detailed by Eusebius, and are in substance as follows. Constantine had resolved to make an attempt to deliver Rome from the tyranny of Maxentius, but feeling that he needed a higher than human aid, he prayed earnestly to God that he would assist him in the difficult enterprise in which he was engaged. About mid-day, when crossing the country with his army, he offered up this prayer, and immediately there appeared in heaven near the sun a bright shining cross, on which was inscribed these words in the Greek language: "By this sign, Conquer." This sign, which was seen in the sky both by the soldiers and their leaders, was followed by a secret vision, in which the Son of God appeared to the Emperor, holding in his hand the symbol of the cross, and commanded him to form a standard on the same model, under which his soldiers would march to victory. Constantine hastened to obey the solemn command, and forthwith a standard was framed by the most skilful artificers, under the immediate direction of the Emperor himself. It was in the form of a long spear, overlaid with gold, and having a cross beam towards the top. Upon the summit there was a golden crown, enclosing the two first letters of the name Christ intersecting each other. From the cross beam was suspended a silken veil, in which were wrought images of the Emperor and of his children.

The name given to this standard was Labarum, a word the literal meaning and correct derivation of which are unknown. The monogram containing the two initial letters of the name of the Messiah, and which were so formed as also to represent a cross, was afterwards engraved upon the shields of the soldiers, and fixed upon their helmets. Fifty men, chosen for their strength, valour, and piety, were appointed to the care of the Labarum, which long continued to be carried at the head of the Roman army, and to be considered the sure token of victory. It is only right to state that the account of the miraculous sign is related by Eusebius alone, and that the information of the historian was derived from the testimony of Constantine himself, confirmed by an oath. Eusebius considers the testimony of the Emperor as satisfactory, but at the same time he states that if the narrative had been given by any other person, he would not easily have been believed.

LABIS, the name which the modern Greeks give to the spoon used in administering the consecrated bread and wine to the laity.

LABORANTES, a name sometimes applied in the early Christian writers to the COPIATÆ (which see).

LABRADOR AND GREENLAND (RELIGION OF). These remote countries, bordering on the Arctic regions, are deeply interesting in a religious aspect, being the seats of two missions of the United Brethren, which have been maintained in these cold inhospitable regions for more than a hundred years. Hans Egede, a Danish missionary, who is often styled the Apostle of Greenland, first took up his abode in that country in 1721; and from that time down to the present day, have the Moravians continued to send thither laborious and self-denying missionaries, who, amid the severest privations, and almost insuperable difficulties, have carried on the work of evangelization among the benighted natives of these desolate regions. It would appear that so early as the end of the tenth century, a colony from Iceland, headed by Eirek, surnamed the Red, settled in Greenland. Leif, the son of Eirek, having made a voyage to Norway, was there persuaded to embrace Christianity, and on his return he was accompanied by a priest to convert the new colony. The settlements in Greenland adopted Christianity, and continued to increase and flourish. They were divided into the East and the West Bygd or inhabited districts, the uninhabited country being termed Ubygd. At a later period the West Bygd contained ninety farms, with four churches; the East Bygd, one hundred and ninety farms, and two towns, with one cathedral, eleven churches, and three monasteries. The first bishop was ordained in A. D. 1121, the seventeenth and last in 1404. After this nothing more is known of the first Greenland colonies. "The learned men of the seventeenth century," says Mr. Blackwell in his valuable edition of Mallet's 'Northern Antiquities,' "when they recalled to mind that a Christian community had existed on these remote shores for upwards of four centuries, could only account for its extinction by a sudden catastrophe. Some supposed that the settlements had been ravaged by the pirates who infested the north seas at the close of the fourteenth century; others, that the great pestilence of 1348, called the Black Death, had swept off the greater part of the population, and that the survivors had been massacred by the Esquimaux. But it seems very unlikely that pirates would have directed their marauding expeditions to such a poor country as Greenland, and although the colony may probably have been visited by the terrible scourge so graphically described by Boccaccio in the introduction to his Decameron, we believe there is no documentary evidence to show that this was actually the case. We know at least that upwards of half a century later there was still a bishop at Gardar, and may therefore conclude that the colonists were able to resist the attacks of the Esquimaux, with whom they appear to have been in constant hostility. The real cause of the gradual decay and final extinction of these settlements was, no doubt, the pernicious system of commercial policy pursued by the mother country."

Along with the first colonies their religion seems also to have disappeared, for when Egede settled on the West coast of Greenland in 1721, he found the people in a state of darkness and heathenism, having no other priests but *angekok*s, who were little better than sorcerers. The Greenlanders, when Egede came among them, held that there was a spiritual Being, whom they called Torngarsuk, to whom they ascribed a supernatural power, though not recognizing him as the Creator. The *angekok*s were divided in the ideas which they entertained of this great Being. Some alleged that he is without form or shape; others gave him the form of a bear; others pretended that he had a large body and only one arm; while others still considered him so small that he was no larger than the finger of a man's hand. Some considered him as immortal, while others believed that a puff of wind could drive him out of existence. They assigned him his abode in the lower regions of the earth, and they said also that he lived in the water. They maintained that a spirit resided in the air, which they named Inuerrirsok; and another called Er-loersotok, who fed upon the intestines of the dead, and was said to have a ghastly, haggard countenance, with hollow eyes and cheeks. Each element they believed had its governor or president, which they called Innuur, and from these the *angekok*s received their torngak or familiar spirits, which again in the case of others were simply their own deceased parents.

The angekok or conjuring priest is thus described by Egede:—"If one aspires to the office of an angekok, and has a mind to be initiated into these mysteries, he must retire from the rest of mankind, into some remote place, from all commerce; there he must look for a large stone, near which he must sit down and invoke Torngarsuk, who, without delay, presents himself before him. This presence so terrifies the new candidate of *angekok*ism, that he immediately sickens, swoons away, and dies; and in this condition he lies for three whole days; and then he comes to life again, arises in a newness of life, and betakes himself to his home again. The science of an angekok consists of three things. 1. That he mutters certain spells over sick people, in order to make them recover their former health. 2. He communes with Torngarsuk, and from him receives instruction, to give people advice what course they are to take in affairs, that they may have success, and prosper therein. 3. He is by the same informed of the time and cause of any body's death; or for what reason any body comes to an untimely and uncommon end; and if any fatality shall befall a man." These impostors persuaded the poor ignorant people that with their hands and feet tied they can mount up to heaven, or descend to the lower regions of the earth, where the fierce Torngarsuk holds his court. A young angekok can only undertake this journey in the fall of the year, because at that time the rainbow, which they believe to be the lowermost heaven, is nearest to the earth. This wonderful feat is thus performed: "A number of spectators assemble in the evening at one of their houses, where, after it is grown dark, every one being seated, the angekok causes himself to be tied, his head between his legs and his hands behind his back, and a drum is laid at his side; thereupon, after the windows are shut and the light put out, the assembly sings a ditty, which, they say, is the composition of their ancestors; when they have done singing the angekok begins with conjuring, muttering, and brawling; invokes Torngarsuk, who instantly presents himself, and converses with him (here the masterly juggler knows how to play his trick, in changing the tone of his voice, and counterfeiting one different from his own, which makes the too-credulous hearers believe, that this counterfeited voice is that of Tornarsuk, who converses with the angekok). In the meanwhile he works himself loose, and, as they believe, mounts up into heaven through the roof of the house, and passes through the air till he arrives into the highest of heavens, where the souls of angekok poglit, that is, the chief angekoks, reside, by whom he gets information of all he wants to know. And all this is done in the twinkling of an eye."

The angekoks pretend to cure all kinds of diseases, simply by muttering inarticulate sounds or blowing upon the sick. One mode in which they exercise their medical power is, by laying the patient upon his back, and tying a ribbon or string round his head, having a stick fastened to the other end of the string with which they lift up the sick person's head from the ground and let it down again; and at every lift the angekok communes with his Torgak or familiar spirit about the state of the patient whether he shall recover or not; if the head is heavy, it is a sign of death, and if light, of recovery. These absurd conjurers actually persuade sick persons, in some cases, that they have the power to create within them new souls, provided they are sufficiently remunerated for their trouble. The heathen Greenlanders are very credulous, and therefore much addicted to the use of amulets or charms, which they wear about their arms and necks. These potent spells consist of some pieces of old wood, stones or bones, bills and claws of birds, or anything else which they suppose to be efficacious in preserving them from diseases and other calamities, or in bringing them success in their fishing expeditions.

Strange notions as to the origin and creation of all things are entertained by the inhabitants of these northern regions. Their own people they believe to have sprung from the ground, but foreigners, whom they call Kablunat, they suppose to have descended from a race of dogs. The dead, as they imagine, pass into the land of souls; some go to heaven, and others to the centre of the earth, which last they regard as a delightful country, where the sun shines continually and the inhabitants are supplied with an inexhaustible stock of all sorts of choice provisions. The centre of the earth, besides, being the residence of Tornarsuk, is also inhabited by a notorious female personage, whom the missionary Egede thus describes, along with the mansion in which she holds her residence: "She is said to dwell in the lower parts of the earth under the seas, and has the empire over all fishes and sea animals, as unicorns, morses, seals, and the like. The basin placed under her lamp, into which the train oil of the lamp drips down, swarms with all kinds of sea fowls, swimming in and hovering about it. At the entry of her abode is a corps de garde of sea dogs, who mount the guard, and stand sentinels at her gates to keep out the crowd of petitioners. None can get admittance there but angekoks, provided they are accompanied by their Tornak, or familiar spirits, and not otherwise. In their journey thither they first pass through the mansions of all the souls of the deceased, which look as well, if not better, than ever they did in this world, and want for nothing. After they have passed through this region, they come to a very long, broad, and deep whirlpool, which they are to cross over, there being nothing to pass upon but a great wheel like ice, which turns about with a surprising rapidity, and by the means of this wheel the spirit helps his angekok to get over. This difficulty being surmounted, the next thing they encounter is a large kettle, in which live seals are put to be boiled; and at last they arrive, with much ado, at the residence of the devil's grandame, where the familiar spirit takes the angekok by the hand through the strong guard of sea dogs. The entry is large enough, the road that leads is as narrow as a small rope, and on both sides nothing to lay hold on, or to support one; besides that, there is underneath a most frightful abyss or bottomless pit. Within this is the apartment of the infernal goddess, who offended at this unexpected visit, shows a most ghastly and wrathful countenance, pulling the hair off her head: she thereupon seizes a wet wing of a fowl, which she lights in the fire, and claps to their noses, which makes them very faint and sick, and they become her prisoners. But the enchanter or angekok (being beforehand instructed by his Tornak how to act his part in this dismal expedition) takes hold of her by the hair, and drubs and bangs her so long, till she loses her strength and yields; and in this combat his familiar spirit does not stand idle, but lays about her with might and main. Round the infernal goddess's face hangs the aglerrutit, which the angekok endeavours to rob her of. For this is the charm by which she draws all fishes and sea animals to her dominion, which no sooner is she deprived of, but instantly the sea animals in shoals forsake her, and resort with all speed to their wonted shelves, where the Greenlanders catch them in great plenty. When this great business is done, the angekoks with their Tornak, proud of success, make the best of their way home again, where they find the road smooth, and easy to what it was before.

"As to the souls of the dead, in their travel to this happy country, they meet with a sharp-pointed stone, upon which the angekoks tell them they must slide or glide down, as there is no other passage to get through, and this stone is besmeared with blood; perhaps, by this mystical or hieroglyphical image, they thereby signify the adversities and tribulations those have to struggle with who desire to attain to happiness."

It was to a people whose whole religion thus consisted of a mass of absurd superstitions that the apostolic Egede devoted twenty-five years of active missionary work. For ten weary years, after first entering upon his work, he persevered in his labours, with very little apparent success. But at length a new era began to dawn upon benighted Greenland. In 1731, two baptized Greenlanders, who had been taken to Denmark, gave such interesting information as to the state of their countrymen, that a little band of devoted Christian brothers was sent from the congregation at Herrnhut as a reinforcement to the Danish mission to Greenland. On reaching their destination, they fixed upon a place of settlement, to which they afterwards gave the name of New Herrnhut. Having made all necessary preparations, they engaged in their missionary work with the utmost diligence and assiduity. Nor did they labour in vain. By the Divine blessing, they soon succeeded in gathering around them a small company of Christian converts, who, feeling the power of the truth on their own hearts, sought to communicate the glad tidings of salvation to others also. Thus the mission prospered more and more. From time to time, the hands of the missionaries were strengthened, and their hearts encouraged, by the arrival of other brethren, who came to aid them in their glorious work. Two settlements were in course of time formed, where a goodly company of Christian Greenlanders composed the church. In the winter of 1768, an aged angekok renounced his mode of life, and confessed that he and the other sorcerers had deceived the people. This unexpected event gave a new impulse to the good cause, and so extensive was the awakening among the natives, that in little more than twelve months 200 Greenlanders were added to the church by baptism. From this period the work was carried on with redoubled energy. In 1774, a third settlement was formed in the south of Greenland, at a place which they termed Lichtenau. Here the labours of the missionaries met with remarkable success, so that in the course of a few years the numbers of church members exceeded those at either of the other stations.

In 1801, so great had been the progress made in the work of the mission at all the stations, that the people on the western coast of Greenland had nearly all embraced Christianity, and of the women, the last one that remained in heathenism was baptized in January of this year. Numbers were now added to the membership of the church from time to time. The year 1823 was rendered remarkable by the printing and circulation of the first complete New Testament in the Greenland language. At this time the three congregations under the care of the Brethren consisted of 1,278 persons. In the following year a new Moravian settlement was formed at the most southern extremity of Greenland, at a place called by the missionaries Fredericksdal. Of this station the missionary had the gratification of writing, under date October 1825—"Since our arrival here in June 1824, 101 heathens have been baptized." Thus four Moravian settlements are now in successful operation in Greenland. The missionaries, however, have been not a little discouraged by the conduct of the Danish government, in repeatedly issuing prohibitions to the Greenland converts against their residing in communities near the Moravian settlements. The obstacle thus put by the government in the way of the success of the mission has, in the good providence of God, been overruled for good. It has led to the formation, in 1851, of a seminary at New Herrnhut for training native assistants. The most recent report of the Greenland Moravian mission conveys the gratifying statement that there are in all twelve missionaries, and that the churches contain 842 communicants, while the number of persons under instruction amounts to 2,001.

The mission to Labrador commenced at a considerably later period than that to Greenland. An attempt was made, indeed, in 1752 to establish a settlement in the country, but it proved unsuccessful, and it was not until 1769 that George III. presented 100,000 acres of land to the Moravian brethren to aid them in commencing a mission on the coast of Labrador. The same year a society was established in London to assist in the prosecution of the same important object. The enterprise was headed by Jens Høven, who had previously laboured as a missionary in Greenland. The spot on which the settlement was established received the name of Nain, and is situated on the east coast of Labrador. The Esquimaux showed themselves uniformly friendly to the missionaries from the date of their first arrival in the country. The angekoks here, as in Greenland, possessed great influence over the people, who were, in fact, ferocious savages, habituated to the gratification of the most brutal passions. But no sooner did the missionaries commence operations, than, to their agreeable surprise, they found the people ready and even eager to receive instruction. In the course of a few years two additional settlements were established, one at Okkak, about 150 miles north of Nain, and another at Hopedale, some distance to the south of Nain. The cause now made rapid progress among the Esquimaux, and in the spring of 1804, the hearts of the devoted missionaries were refreshed by the manifestation of a decided revival of religion, which commenced at Nain, and soon spread to the other stations. This work of grace continued several years, and many, both old and young, were added to the church of Christ. Early in 1811, the northern coast of Labrador was explored, with a view to the formation of a settlement in that quarter; but, after five months spent in minutely examining the country, the idea was abandoned, and has never since been revived. About the year 1820, portions of the New Testament were translated and printed in the Esquimaux language by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and so highly was the gift prized by the people, that they began, of their own accord, to collect seals' blubber, by way of making up a small contribution towards the expenses of that society.

In Labrador, as in Greenland, the labours of the missionaries have, from the beginning, been carried on amid many discouragements and privations; but their trials have been borne with patience and resignation, while their hearts are cheered by the ample tokens which they are from time to time receiving that they are not labouring in vain, nor spending their strength for nought or in vain. From recent accounts, the state of the mission is very encouraging. There are fifteen missionary brethren carrying on their operations in these inhospitable regions. The communicants in the churches amount to 394, and those under instruction to 1,357 persons.

LACE OF BLUE, or SACRED FRINGE. No small importance, both among the ancient and the modern Jews, has been attached to the hem or border of the upper garment. On turning to the law of Moses, we find, in Num. xv. 38—40, the command given, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a ribband of blue: and it shall be unto you for a fringe, that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; and that ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go a whoring: that ye may remember, and do all my commandments, and be holy unto your God." In Exodus xxviii. 28, in the directions for the dress of the high-priest, it is said, "They shall bind the breastplate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breastplate be not loosed from the ephod." The Pharisees were blamed by our blessed Lord for ostentatiously making broad the borders of their garments. Among the modern Jews, every male is obliged to have a garment with fringes at the four corners; and every morning when he puts on this garment, he must take the fringes in his hands, and say, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe! who hath sanctified us with his commandments, and commanded us the commandment of the fringes." Our Lord, in fulfilling all righteousness, wore also the garment with the fringes, and this being the part of the dress which more peculiarly marked out the Israelite, the sick often sought to touch it, that they might be healed.

LACERATIONS. See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH.

LACHESIS (from Gr. lanchano, to allot), one of the FATES (which see) among the ancient Greeks and Romans. The office of Lachesis was supposed to be to turn the wheel of fate, and thus to determine the fortune of life.

LACHRYMATORIES, small glass or earthen vessels, in which, among the ancient heathen, were put the tears which surviving friends or relatives wept for the dead. These, with their contents, were buried with the urns and ashes of the deceased.

LACINIA, a surname of JUNO (which see), under which she was worshipped in the neighborhood of Croton, where she had a sanctuary.

LACTURCIA, a goddess among the ancient Romans, who preserved the tender plants with their milky juice.

LACTURNUS, an ancient Roman divinity, who was believed to protect the young fruits of the field. Some have considered Lacturnus to be a surname of Saturn.

LADY-DAY. See ANNUNCIATION.

LAFS-AL-JEMIN (Heb. the thief on the right hand), a festival observed by the Syrian Christians in commemoration of the penitent thief. This falls upon the Octave of their Easter.

LAG, the name given by the modern Jews to the festival of the thirty-third of Omer, the Hebrew word Lag representing the number thirty-three. See OMER (FESTIVAL OF THE THIRTY-THIRD OF).

LALIA, a tablet suspended in a Buddhist WIHARA (which see) in Ceylon, upon which any matter might be written, about which it was intended that the priests should be informed.

LAITY (Gr. laos, people), a term used, from an early period in the history of Christianity, to denote the body of the church in contradistinction from the clergy. The word is not found in the New Testament, but it occurs in ancient Christian writers. According to Rheinwald and Gieseler, the distinction between laity and clergy was unknown till the second century. Previous to this, all performed the office of priests as they had occasion, and even after that time laymen were sometimes heard in the public assemblies. See CLERGY.

LAKSHANA, characteristic beauties or signs of a supreme Budha. These were divided into three kinds: 1. The 216 Mangalya-lakshana, of which there were 108 on each foot. 2. The 32 Mahapurusha-lakshana or superior beauties. 3. The 8 Ananyanjana-lakshana or inferior beauties.

LAKSHMI, a Hindu female divinity, one of the many consorts of VISHNU, and therefore worshipped by the Vaishnava sects, but particularly the followers of Ramanuja. In the Mahabharat, all divine beings are alleged to proceed from Krishna, and among these Lakshmi comes from his mind; but in one of the Puranas, Ganesa is represented as calling her the great Lakshmi, the mother of the world, who was made from the left side of Rudha, the favourite consort of Vishnu. This goddess is usually described as possessed of singular beauty and grace, and she is considered as the goddess of wealth.

LAMAISM, the name which Budhism has assumed in Thibet. It seems to have found its way into that country at nearly the same date,—the first century of our era,—as it was introduced into China, where it is known by the name of Foism. In Thibet, however, the divinities, which were worshipped before the entrance of Buddhism, namely, the genii of the hills and valleys, and woods and rivers, are still adored by the poorer classes with the express sanction of the Lamas; but while these remnants of the ancient religion are still tolerated, Buddhism, which found a ready acceptance at an early period among the great mass of the Thibetans, has, since the middle of the seventh century, continued with scarcely a single interruption to be recognized as the religion of the whole country. Hence the extensive prevalence in Thibet of a system of religious mendicants.

Lamas or monks are to be found swarming in every town and district. In their official ceremonies they wear silken vests, adorned with images, and have a lettered border of sacred texts woven into the scarf. At every turn the traveller meets some of these Buddhist priests, each of them carrying in his hand the Tchu-chor or prayer-cylinder, a single revolution of which is considered to be equivalent to a roll of prayers. In every family, one at least of the children is trained up to the priestly office. And the peculiar modification which Buddhism has assumed in passing into the form of Lamaism, fully accounts for the enormous increase in the number of Thibetan and Tartar Lamas over those of other Buddhist countries. In Tartary we learn that, with the exception of the eldest son of each family, all the rest of the children are reared as Lamas, and accordingly the Lamaseries of that country are built so large as to contain ten, twenty, and even thirty thousand of these mendicant monks. In consequence of the enormous number of priests which are found in Thibet and Tartary, the ordinary law of Buddhism in Ceylon and elsewhere, which prohibits mendicants from earning their bread by any manual employment, is totally abandoned in both these countries, so that the Lamas are allowed to follow various trades even while residing in the convents.

The most important of all the modifications which have been introduced into Buddhism in Tartary and Thibet is the doctrine of the Grand or DALAI-LAMA (which see). This high official ruler, who in former times was the sole depositary both of temporal and spiritual power, is believed to be an incarnation of Gautama Budha, whose spirit still wanders about in successive births and deaths from Lama to Lama. While each of the ordinary priests is a chaberon or incarnate Budha (see BUDHA, LIVING), this is more especially and in a still higher sense true of the Dalai-Lama, who sits in the shrine of the temple and is worshipped as a deity, while his supremacy is acknowledged by all the other inmates of the Lamaseries in Thibet, Tartary, and China. This notion of hereditary incarnations seems to have existed several centuries before it was introduced into these countries. Thus Major Cunningham, in his work on the History and Statistics of Ladak, tells us of one Ugyan Rinpoche, who, in the eighth century, was invited into Thibet, and founded the confraternity of red Lamas, and who, the Major alleges, was believed to have been an incarnation of the Budha Amitabha or O-me-to, the fourth of the celestial Budhas of that region. We have no mention of any other incarnation until the commencement of the fifteenth century, when Tsong-Kaba, the Buddhist reformer, appeared, who was regarded as an incarnation either of O-me-to, or of Manjusri. It was not, however, till the latter half of the same century that the idea of perpetual incarnations was fully matured. "Then it was," says Mr. Hardwick, in his 'Christ and other Masters,' "that one chief abbot, the 'perfect Lama,' instead of passing, as he was entitled, to his ultimate condition, determined for the benefit of mankind to sojourn longer on the earth and be continuously new-born. As soon as he was carried to his grave in 1473, a search was instituted for the personage who had been destined to succeed him. This was found to be an infant, who established its title to the honour by appearing to remember various articles which were the property of the Lama just deceased, or rather were the infant's own property in earlier stages of existence. When the proofs of such identity were deemed irrefragable, the new candidate was formally promoted to the vacant chair: and in the fifth abbot of this series originated the famous hierarchy of the Dalai-Lamas (in 1640). So fascinating grew the theory of perpetual incarnations, that a fresh succession of rival Lamas (also of the yellow order) afterwards took its rise at Teshu-lamby, while the Dalai-Lamas were enthroned in Lhasa; and at present every convent of importance, not in Tibet only, but in distant parts of Tatar, is claiming for itself a like prerogative. Each confraternity believes that the departed abbot is still actually present with his subjects though enshrouded in a different body. Conscious of the dark malignity of demons, quivering at the thought of men who practise demoniacal arts and lead astray by their enchantments, these Tibetians are 'in bondage to fear;' their only refuge is the presence and superior holiness of one who, by his mastery over all the adverse forces of creation, is believed to rescue his true followers from the rage of their oppressor. The religion of Tibet is thus from day to day assuming all the characteristics of man-worship. Anxious cravings after some invincible protector, there impel the human spirit to fashion for itself a novel theory of salvation; and the sight of one who styles himself incarnate deity excludes all living faith in God and in the things invisible."

The Buddhism of Thibet in the form of Lamaism is not the Buddhism of CHAKIA-MOUNI (which see), nor is it the Buddhism of the earliest race of its disciples as it is seen in Ceylon. The doctrine of an ADI-BUDHA (which see), or a Supreme Creator, evidently a modern graft upon the ancient system of Buddhism, which is essentially atheistic, is found in Nepal and portions of Thibet, borrowed probably from the adjacent Brahmanism of India. And this origin of the theistic notion of an Adi-Budha is still further confirmed by the fact that other ideas have been derived from the mystical system of the Hindu Tantrists, such as the theory of the Buddhist Saktis, or the female energies of the Dhyāni Budhas. From the essence of the Adi-Budha are believed to have spontaneously emanated five intelligences of the first order, called celestial Budhas, which in turn give origin to other five intelligences of the second order called BODHISATWAS (which see). These last, which are called in China Pusas, and are esteemed by the ordinary Foists as gods, are simply links connecting the Supreme Being or Adi-Budha with the lower orders of created beings.

The Chakya-Mouni of the Mongolian Tartars has indeed his votaries in Thibet, not only as the Shakya-Thubba of Ladak, but as the Sommona-Kodom or Gautama of other regions. The Thibetan sacred books, which extend to one hundred volumes, are called Ká-gyur, that is, translation of Commandment, on account of their being translated from the Sanskrit, or from the ancient Indian language, by which may be understood the Pracrita or dialect of Magadha, the principal seat of the Buddhist faith in India at that period. These sacred books were imported into Thibet, and translated there between the seventh and thirteenth centuries of our era, but mostly in the ninth. They are in substance the same as the sacred books of Ceylon, though the account of their origin is widely different.

There is undoubtedly a nearer approximation to the truth in regard to the nature of the Divine Being, in the Lamaism of Tartary and Thibet than in the Buddhism of Ceylon. Another peculiar feature of Lamaism, is that there are innumerable living Budhas, at the head of which is the Dalai-Lama. Budha is, nevertheless, the sole sovereign of the universe, with a body, a spiritual substance, without beginning and without end. But while there is thus evidently at the foundation of the system of Lamaism a firm belief in the existence of one Supreme Being, invisible and incorporeal, it is mixed up in the doctrine of living Budhas with a strange species of man-worship, which is so prevalent and so engrossing, as to make the great mass of the people lose sight of all higher notions of the Divine Being.

Among the Lamaists of Thibet, the doctrine of metempsychosis occupies a prominent place in their religious creed; so that in their opinion to kill any living creature whatever is to incur the danger of homicide, since the smallest insect may happen to be the transmigration of a man. But while the Thibetan Lamaists are thus strict in this matter, the Foists of China have little or no scruple on the subject of destroying animal life; and yet to show some regard for the great Buddhist principle, they now and then dedicate some pigs to Budha, which are permitted to live their usual term, and die a natural death.

A remarkable analogy has sometimes been pointed out in rites and customs between the Lamaism of Thibet and the Christianity of the Middle Ages. This has been particularly noticed, and partly accounted for by M. Hue, himself a Romanist missionary, in his 'Travels in Tartary and Thibet : ' " Upon the most superficial examination," says he, " of the reforms and innovations introduced by Tsong-Kaba into the Lamanesque worship, one must be struck with their affinity to Catholicism. The cross, the mitre, the dalmatica, the cope, which the Grand Lamas wear on their journeys, or when they are performing some ceremony out of the temple; the service with double choirs, the psalmody, the exorcisms, the censor, suspended from five chains, and which you can open or close at pleasure; the benedictions given by the Lamas by extending the right hand over the heads of the faithful; the chaplet, ecclesiastical celibacy, spiritual retirement, the worship of the saints, the fasts, the processions, the litanies, the holy water, all these are analogies between the Buddhists and ourselves. Now, can it be said that these analogies are of Christian origin? We think so. We have indeed found, neither in the traditions nor in the monuments of the country, any positive proof of their adoption, still it is perfectly legitimate to put forward conjectures which possess all the characteristics of the most emphatic probability.

"It is known that, in the fourteenth century, at the time of the domination of the Mongol emperors, there existed frequent relations between the Europeans and the peoples of Upper Asia. We have already, in the former part of our narrative, referred to those celebrated embassies which the Tartar conquerors sent to Rome, to France, and to England. There is no doubt that the barbarians who thus visited Europe must have been struck with the pomp and splendour of the ceremonies of Catholic worship, and must have carried back with them into the desert enduring memories of what they had seen. On the other hand, it is also known that, at the same period, brethren of various religious orders undertook remote pilgrimages for the purpose of introducing Christianity into Tartary; and these must have penetrated at the same time into Thibet, among the Si-Fan, and among the Mongols on the Blue Sea. Jean de Montcorvin, Archbishop of Peking, had already organized a choir of Mongol monks, who daily practised the recitation of the psalms, and the ceremonies of the Catholic faith. Now, if one reflects that Tsong-Kaba lived precisely at the period when the Christian religion was being introduced into Central Asia, it will be no longer matter of astonishment that we find, in reformed Buddhism, such striking analogies with Christianity."

It is not a little remarkable that these striking points of similarity between Lamaism and Romanism are confined to the countries of Tartary and Thibet. Lamaism, it must be borne in mind, is not older than the thirteenth century of the present era. Buddhism was, no doubt, unknown in Thibet 600 years before; but it was only under Kublai-Khan, A. D. 1260, that the adherents of that system were reduced under the dominion of a regular hierarchy, by the appointment of the first Grand Lama. At this very time, when the introduction of the new hierarchy was likely to be accompanied with other changes and modifications, the Thibetians were brought into communication with Christianity, more especially in the form of Romanism. The Khans had at their court not only Jews, Mohammedans, and Budhists, but Roman Catholic and Nestorian missionaries; and in the fourteenth century, the arrival of a strange Lama from the far west is said to have made great changes in the aspect of religious worship in Thibet. Hence in all probability those peculiar analogies, which have been so distinctly noticed by the Abbé Hue. M. Abel-Rémusat, in his 'Mélanges Asiatiques,' thus explains the processes by which the innovations referred to may have been introduced into Lamaism. "At the time," he says, "when the Budhist patriarchs established themselves in Thibet, the portions of Tartary which adjoined that country were full of Christians. The Nestorians had founded cities there, and converted whole nations. At a later period the conquests of the followers of Ginghis-Khan collected there strangers from all countries; Georgians, Armenians, Russians, French, Mussulmans, sent thither by the caliph of Bagdad; Catholic monks, charged with important missions by the sovereign Pontiff and by St. Louis. These last carried with them church ornaments, altars, and relics, 'to see,' says Joinville, 'if they could attract those people to our faith.' They celebrated the ceremonies of their religion in the presence of the Tartar princes. These gave them an asylum in their tents, and permitted them to rear chapels, even within the precincts of their palaces. An Italian archbishop, established in the imperial city by order of Clement V., had built a church there, in which three bells summoned the faithful to worship, and he had covered the walls with pictures representing religious subjects. Syrian Christians, Roman Catholics, Schismatics, Mussulmans, Idolaters, all lived mingled and confounded together at the court of the Mongol emperors, who were always ready to receive new modes of worship, and even to adopt them, provided that they demanded on their part no belief, and more especially provided that they imposed upon them no constraint. We know that the Tartars passed willingly from one sect to another, embraced a new faith with the utmost ease, and just as readily renounced it to relapse again into idolatry. It was in the midst of these changes that the new seat of the Budhist patriarchs was founded in Thibet. Is it at all wonderful, then, that interested in multiplying the number of their followers, anxious to impart more splendour to their worship, they should have appropriated to themselves some liturgical practices, some of those foreign pompous ceremonies which attracted the crowd; that they should have even introduced some of those institutions belonging to the West, which the ambassadors of the caliph and of the sovereign Pontiff united in praising so highly, and which circumstances disposed them to imitate. The coin-vidence of places and times authorizes this conjecture, and a thousand peculiarities, which I cannot mention here, would convert it into demonstration."

The Lamaists of Thibet are strict in their attention to religious observances of all kinds. Pilgrimages, noisy ceremonies in the Lamaserics, prostrations on the tops of their houses, are favourite exercises; and even when engaged in ordinary business, they carry about with them rosaries, which they are ever turning and twisting while they are incessantly murmuring prayers. Hue mentions that at Lha-Ssa, where the Dalai-Lama resides, the people are in the habit of gathering together in groups in the evening in the principal parts of the town, and in the public squares, where they kneel down and chant prayers, which vary according to the seasons of the year. The prayer, however, which they repeat on the rosary is always the same, and consists only of six syllables, Om! Mani-Padme, Hūm, or as it is generally called by way of abbreviation MANI (which see). This sacred formula is regarded as of such importance that it is in every one's mouth, and inscribed on the walls and public places, as well as in the houses.

LAMAS, the Budhist priests of Tartary and Thibet. They are regarded as incarnations of Budha or living Budhas, and are presided over by the Dalai-Lama, who possesses a readily acknowledged spiritual authority over the whole priesthood, and until a recent period was possessed of large tracts of country, over which he exercised undisputed temporal sovereignty. Formerly, indeed, the Dalai-Lama was the supreme ruler of the nation, but at length one of the royal family, at the death of the principal Lama, declared that the spirit of the deceased ecclesiastic had entered into his body, and by this means he regained the power which had been usurped by the priests. The dress of the Grand Lama is yellow, and that of other Lamas of inferior rank is red. The Lamas of Chinese Tartary are so numerous, that they amount to about a third of the entire population; and being under a law of celibacy, the Chinese government readily encourage their increase by gifts and endowments of every kind to check the growth of the population of the Mongolian Tartars from a natural fear that, as formerly, they may yet again revolutionize the empire. The Lamas reside in convents called Lamaseries, which are built round about the Budhist temples, like the wiharas of Ceylon; and their time is chiefly spent in prayers for the people, which are generally conducted by the Tenue-chor (which see) or prayer cylinder, and in pursuing the occupation of mendicants to increase the revenues of the Lamasery. These convents, which generally contain thousands of priests, are so liberally endowed, that nearly two-thirds of the productive lands of Thibet are said to be appropriated to the support of the priesthood.

M. Hue represents the Lamas as generally distinguished by their skill in the decorative arts both of painting and sculpture. On this subject he says: "The Lamas are the only artists who contribute to the ornament and decoration of the temples. The paintings are quite distinct from the taste and the principles of art as understood in Europe. The fantastical and the grotesque predominate inside and out, both in carvings and statuary, and the personages represented, with the exception of Buddha, have generally a monstrous and satanic aspect. The clothes seem never to have been made for the persons upon whom they are placed. The idea given is that of broken limbs concealed beneath awkward garments."

"Amongst these Lama paintings, however, you sometimes come across specimens by no means destitute of beauty. One day, during a visit in the kingdom of Gechekten to the great temple called Altou-Somné (Temple of Gold), we saw a picture which struck us with astonishment. It was a large piece representing, in the centre, Buddha seated on a rich carpet. Around this figure, which was of life size, there was a sort of glory, composed of miniatures, allegorically expressing the Thousand Virtues of Buddha. We could scarcely withdraw ourselves from this picture, remarkable as it was, not only for the purity and grace of the design, but also for the expression of the faces and the splendour of the colouring. All the personages seemed full of life. We asked an old Lama, who was attending us over the place, what he knew about this admirable work. 'Sir,' said he, raising his joined hands to his forehead in token of respect, 'this picture is a treasure of the remotest antiquity; it comprehends within its surface the whole doctrine of Buddha. It is not a Mongol painting; it came from Thibet, and was executed by a saint of the Eternal Sanctuary.'

"The artists here are, in general, more successful in the landscapes than in the epic subjects. Flowers, birds, trees, mythological animals, are represented with great truth and with infinitely pleasing effect. The colouring is wonderfully full of life and freshness. It is only a pity that the painters of these landscapes have so very indifferent a notion as to perspective and chiaro-oscuro.

"The Lamas are far better sculptors than painters, and they are accordingly very lavish of carvings in their Buddhist temples. Everywhere in and about these edifices you see works of this class of art, in quantity bespeaking the fecundity of the artist's chisel, but of a quality which says little for his taste. First, outside the temples are an infinite number of tigers, lions, and elephants crouching upon blocks of granite; then the stone balustrades of the steps leading to the great gates are covered with fantastic sculptures representing birds, reptiles, and beasts, of all kinds, real and imaginary. Inside, the walls are decorated with reliefs in wood or stone, executed with great spirit and truth."

The Lamas are considered as of two parties, which are known by the names of Red Cap Lamas and Yellow Cap Lamas. The former are by far the most ancient of the confraternities, having originated as early as the eighth century after Christ; while the latter did not exist until the middle of the fourteenth century, when they arose under the auspices of the great Buddhist reformer Tsong Kaba. By degrees the Yellow Caps became the predominant sect, and the reforms proposed by Tsong Kaba were adopted throughout Thibet, and afterwards became, by imperceptible degrees, established in all the kingdoms of Tartary. The Bonzes of China still retain the ancient rites, with the exception of some innovations which belong to particular localities; but the distinction between the two classes of Lamas is retained in China, those who adhere to the reformed faith of Tsong Kaba being known as the Yellow, while those who cleave to the old worship are termed the Grey Lamas. These two sects were at one time, doubtless, violently opposed to each other, but now they live together in perfect harmony.

From the immense numbers of Lamas found in Tartary and Thibet, the traveller cannot fail to be struck with the difficulty of meeting the expenses of such a large staff of priests by public endowments. In addition to the lands which go towards their maintenance, the authorities make a distribution of meal every third month to all the Lamas without distinction, but the quantity is altogether inadequate; and, accordingly, this government grant is supplemented by the voluntary offerings of the pilgrims, which, however, are divided among the Lamas according to the position which each holds in the hierarchy, and, accordingly, there are many who receive nothing at all from this source. In addition to the offerings which are made, either in tea or money, the Lamas earn a subsistence for themselves by some handicraft trade or by engaging in commerce; and some of them by printing and transcribing the Lamanesque books. The art of medicine, also, is wholly in the hands of the Lamas, chiefly from an impression which prevails among the Tartars, that every disease is caused by the visitation of a demon, who must, therefore, be expelled by a priestly exorcism before the patient can possibly recover.

The Materia Medica of the Lamas is almost wholly limited to pulverized vegetables, either in the form of infusion or pills; but if no medicine should happen to be at hand, the Lama, not in the least disconcerted, simply writes the names of a few remedies upon scraps of paper, which having moistened he rolls up into the form of pills, administering them to the patient, who confidently swallows them, believing that to swallow the name of a remedy is equally efficacious with swallowing the remedy itself. Having acted the physician, the Lama next proceeds to act the priest, repeating prayers suited to the rank of the Tchutgour or demon to be expelled. If the patient be poor, the exorcism is a brief offhand process, but if he be rich, the process is lengthened out by numerous prayers and ceremonies. M. Iluc mentions the case of a wealthy chief's aunt, who having fallen sick, a Lama was sent for, who instantly declared that the patient was under the influence of a demon of considerable rank, who must be forthwith expelled at whatever cost. Eight other Lamas were called in, who set about constructing from dried herbs, a large figure which they called the Demon of Intermittent Fevers, and which when completed they placed on its legs by means of a stick in the patient's tent.

"The ceremony," says M. Hue, "began at eleven o'clock at night; the Lamas ranged themselves in a semicircle round the upper portion of the tent, with cymbals, sea-shells, bells, tambourines, and other instruments of the noisy Tartar music. The remainder of the circle was completed by the members of the family, squatting on the ground close to one another, the patient kneeling, or rather crouched on her heels, opposite the Demon of Intermittent Fevers. The Lama doctor-in-chief had before him a large copper basin filled with millet, and some little images made of paste. The dung-fuel threw, amid much smoke, a fantastic and quivering light over the strange scene.

"Upon a given signal, the clerical orchestra executed an overture harsh enough to frighten Satan himself, the lay congregation beating time with their hands to the charivari of clanging instruments and ear-splitting voices. The diabolical concert over, the Grand Lama opened the Book of Exorcisms, which he rested on his knees. As he chanted one of the forms, he took from the basin, from time to time, a handful of millet, which he threw east, west, north, and south, according to the Rubric. The tones of his voice, as he prayed, were sometimes mournful and suppressed, sometimes vehemently loud and energetic. All of a sudden, he would quit the regular cadence of prayer, and have an outburst of apparently indomitable rage, abusing the herb puppet with fierce invectives and furious gestures. The exorcism terminated, he gave a signal by stretching out his arms, right and left, and the other Lamas struck up a tremendously noisy chorus, in hurried, dashing tones; all the instruments were set to work, and meantime the lay congregation, having started up with one accord, ran out of the tent, one after the other, and tearing round it like mad people, beat it at their hardest with sticks, yelling all the while at the pitch of their voices in a manner to make ordinary hair stand on end. Having thrice performed this demoniac round, they re-entered the tent as precipitately as they had quitted it, and resumed their seats. Then, all the others covering their faces with their hands, the Grand Lama rose and set fire to the herb figure. As soon as the flames rose, he uttered a loud cry, which was repeated with interest by the rest of the company. The laity immediately rose, seized the burning figure, carried it into the plain, away from the tents, and there, as it consumed, anathematized it with all sorts of imprecations; the Lamas meantime squatted in the tent, tranquilly chanting their prayers in a grave, solemn tone.

"Upon the return of the family from their valorous expedition, the praying was exchanged for joyous felicitations. By-and-by, each person provided with a lighted torch, the whole party rushed simultaneously from the tent, and formed into a procession, the laymen first, then the patient, supported on either side by a member of the family, and lastly, the nine Lamas, making night hideous with their music. In this style the patient was conducted to another tent, pursuant to the orders of the Lama, who had declared that she must absent herself from her own habitation for an entire month.

"After this strange treatment, the malady did not return. The probability is, that the Lamas, having ascertained the precise moment at which the fever-fit would recur, met it at the exact point of time by this tremendous counter-excitement, and overcame it."

The Lamas are invited also to officiate at funerals, not, however, in every case, but only when the deceased is wealthy, and in consequence the process of burning the corpse is conducted with great solemnity. On such occasions the Lamas surround the tomb during the combustion and recite prayers. The process of burning being completed, they destroy the furnace, and carry the bones to the Grand Lama, who reduces them to a fine powder, and having added to them an equal quantity of meal, he kneads the whole with care, and constructs with his own hands cakes of different sizes, which he places one upon the other in the form of a pyramid. These cakes thus prepared by the Grand Lama are conveyed with great pomp to a little tower which has been built beforehand to receive them.

In the ordinary prayers in the Buddhist temples, the Lamas having been summoned by the loud sound of a sea-conch, enter barefooted and in solemn silence, and after three prostrations to the living Budha, take their seats on a divan cross-legged and always in a circle. The whole service consists of prayers, which are murmured with a low voice, and psalms which are sung in a grave, melodious tone, interrupted, however, at certain intervals by instrumental music, so loud and harsh and dissonant as to be altogether out of keeping with the rest of the exercises.

The Lamas, though all of them possessing a sacred character, and held in great reverence by the people, are by no means uniform in their mode of life. Some of them, under the name of Domestic Lamas, either settle in the small Lamaseries, or live at home with their families, retaining little more of their priestly office than its red and yellow dress. Another class consists of Wandering Lamas, who travel from place to place all over their own and the adjacent countries, subsisting on what provisions they may pick up on their journey. A third class is composed of the Lamas who live in community, and pay more attention than the other Lamas to prayer and study. These form the inmates of a LAMASERY (which see). In Tartary the Lamas do not embrace the profession of the priesthood from intelligent and deliberate choice, but are destined to it from birth by their parents. As they grow up they become accustomed to the life of a Lama, and in course of time they come generally to prefer it to every other. Some are found to retire to places of seclusion, and pass their days in contemplation and devotion. Such contemplative Lamas, however, are by no means numerous.

LAMASERY, a collection of small houses built around one or more Buddhist temples in Tartary and Thibet as a residence for the Lamas. Its size and elegance is wholly dependent on the means of the proprietor. In Tartary the Lamaseries are all constructed of brick and stone. Only the poorest Lamas build their dwellings of earth, and even these are so well whitewashed that it is difficult to distinguish them from the rest. In some cases grants are made from the public treasury to assist in the erection of Buddhist temples, with their accompanying Lamaseries, but the greater part of the expense is defrayed by voluntary subscription. Lama collectors go forth properly attested to gather the necessary funds, carrying with them a sacred basin for the purpose. "They disperse themselves throughout the kingdom of Tartary, beg alms from tent to tent in the name of the Old Buddha. Upon entering a tent and explaining the object of their journey, by showing the sacred basin in which the offerings are placed, they are received with joyful enthusiasm. There is no one but gives something. The rich place in the 'badir' ingots of gold and silver; those who do not possess the precious metals, offer oxen, horses, or camels. The poorest contribute according to the extent of their means; they give lumps of butter, furs, ropes made of the hair of camels and horses. Thus, in a short time, are collected immense sums. Then, in these deserts, apparently so poor, you see rise up, as if by enchantment, edifices whose grandeur and wealth would defy the resources of the richest potentates."

Some of the Tartar Lamaseries are so large—for example the Great Kouren—that they are capable of accommodating 30,000 Lamas. The plain unassuming residences of the Lamas contrast strongly with the elegance of the temples around which they are placed. The houses of the superior, however, differ from those of the other Lamas, by having each of them a small pagoda or tower, at the top of which flies a triangular flag of some gay colour, with the rank of the inmate inscribed upon it in letters of gold. Blue Town in Tartary is more particularly noted for its Lamaseries, there being within its walls, five great buildings of this kind, each inhabited by more than 2,000 Lamas, besides fifteen lesser establishments, connected with the former. In that single city reside no fewer than 20,000 regular Lamas, not to speak of a multitude in different quarters of the town engaged in commerce. The finest of all the Lamaseries in Blue Town, is that which is termed the Lamasery of the Five Towers, in which the Hobilgan lives, that is, a Grand Lama, who after having been identified with the substance of Buddha, has already undergone several times the process of transmigration.

The Lamaseries in Tartary have generally endowments from the public funds, and at certain seasons of the year the revenues are divided among the Lamas according to their ecclesiastical dignity. The Chabérons or Living Buddhas are generally placed at the head of the most important Lamaseries, and to receive the benediction of one of these incarnations of Buddha, is imagined to convey so many advantages, that the convent in which he resides soon becomes a place of great resort, and rapidly rises to fame in the country. "There is no Tartar kingdom," says M. Huc, the only authority on the subject, "which does not possess, in one of its Lamaseries of the first class, a living Buddha. Besides this superior, there is always another Grand Lama, who is selected from the members of the royal family. The Thibetian Lama resides in the Lamasery, like a living idol, receiving every day the adorations of the devout, upon whom in return he bestows his blessing. Everything which relates to prayers and liturgical ceremonies, is placed under his immediate superintendence. The Mongol Grand Lama is charged with the administration, good order, and executive of the Lamasery; he governs whilst his colleague is content to reign.

"Below these two sovereigns, are several subaltern officers, who direct the details of the administration, the revenues, the sales, the purchases, and the discipline. The scribes keep the registers, and draw up the regulations and orders which the governor Lama promulgates for the good keeping and order of the Lamasery. These scribes are generally well versed in the Mongol, Thibetian, and sometimes in the Chinese and Mantchou languages. Before they are admitted to this employment, they are obliged to undergo a very rigorous examination, in presence of all the Lamas and of the principal civil authorities of the country.

"After this staff of superiors and officers, the inhabitants of the Lamasery are divided into Lamanasters and Lama-disciples or Chabis; each Lama has under his direction one or more Chabis, who live in his small house, and execute all the details of the household. If the master possesses cattle, they take charge of them, milk the cows, and prepare the butter and cream. In return for these services, the master directs his disciples in the study of the prayers, and initiates them into the liturgy. Every morning the Chabi must be up before his master; his first task is to sweep the chamber, to light a fire and to make the tea; after that he takes his prayer-book, presents it respectfully to his master, and prostrates himself thrice before him, without saying a single word. This sign of respect is equivalent to a request that the lesson he has to learn in the course of the day may be marked. The master opens the book, and reads some pages, according to the capacity of his scholar, who then makes three more prostrations in sign of thanks, and returns to his affairs.

"The Chabi studies his prayer-book, when he is disposed to do so, there being no fixed period for that; he may spend his time, sleeping or romping with the other young pupils, without the slightest interference on the part of his master. When the hour for retiring to bed has arrived, he recites the lesson assigned him in the morning, in a monotonous manner; if the recitation is good, he is looked upon as having done his duty, the silence of his master being the only praise he is entitled to obtain; if, on the contrary, he is not able to give a good account of his lesson, the severest punishment makes him sensible of his fault. It often happens, that under such circumstances, the master, laying aside his usual gravity, rushes upon his scholar, and overwhelms him at once with blows and terrible maledictions. Some of the pupils, who are over maltreated, run away and seek adventures far from their Lamasery; but in general they patiently submit to the punishment inflicted on them, even that of passing the night in the open air, without any clothes and in full winter. We often had opportunities of talking with Chabis, and when we asked them whether there was no means of learning the prayers without being beaten, they ingenuously, and with an accent manifesting entire conviction, replied, that it was impossible."

Among the Buddhists, a devotee acquires peculiar merit by making the circuit of a Lamasery, prostrating himself with his forehead to the ground, at every step he takes. This ceremony must be performed without intermission, so strictly that the pilgrims are not permitted, on pain of losing all spiritual benefit, to pause for even a single moment. Each prostration must be perfect, so that the body shall be stretched flat along the ground, and the forehead touch the earth, while the arms are spread out in front, and the hands joined as if in the exercise of prayer. Before rising the pilgrim describes each time a semicircle on the ground by means of a goat's horn, which he holds in either hand, the line being completed by drawing the arm down to the side. All devotees, however, do not subject themselves to this difficult and even painful exercise. Sometimes, instead of prostrating themselves while they are performing the circuit, they carry with them instead, a load of prayer-books, and in this case, when they have completed the circuit with their heavy burden, they are considered to have recited all the prayers contained in the books they have carried. Another mode of performing the pilgrimage round a Lamasery is by simply walking the circuit, while the devotee employs himself in counting the beads of his long chaplet, or turning the wheel of his Tchu-Chor or prayer-cylinder.

Lha-Ssa in Thibet is the chief seat of Buddhist worship, being the residence of the Dalai-Lama. In this district alone there are counted more than thirty large Lamaseries, the principal of which, those of Khaldan, of Preboug, and of Sera, contain each of them nearly 15,000 Lamas. The last mentioned of these convents is remarkable for three large temples of several stories high, all the rooms of which are entirely gilt. Hence the name Sera, which in Thibetian signifies golden. In the chief of these three temples is contained the famous TORTCHE (which see), or sanctifying instrument, which is held in great veneration, and at the New Year's festival is carried in procession with great pomp to Lha-Ssa to be adored by the people.

LAMLÆ, evil spirits, believed by the ancient Greeks and Romans to assume the form of beautiful women, and to entice away young children for the purpose of devouring them. The notion was thought to have had its origin in an ancient legend, which represented Lamia, a Libyan queen of singular beauty, to have attracted the regards of Zeus, and thus brought upon herself the jealousy of Hera, who in revenge robbed her of her children. Lamia, in revenge and despair, robbed others of their children, and cruelly devoured them. Hence arose the story of Lamiae or cruel spirits, who excited great alarm. Horace mentions them in his Art of Poetry.

LAMMAS-DAY, a festival celebrated in the Romish church on the 1st of August, annually, in memory of the imprisonment of the Apostle Peter.

LAMPADARY, an officer in the Greek church, whose duty it is to light up the church as occasion requires, and supply the lamps with oil.

LAMPADEPHORIA, (Gr. lampas, a torch, and phero, to carry), games among the ancient Greeks, which consisted in carrying an unextinguished torch through certain distances by a successive chain of runners, each taking it up at the point where another left it. The first, after running with it a certain distance, handed it to the second, and the second, in like manner, to the third, those who let the torch go out, losing the game. It is difficult to ascertain what was the precise origin of these games; but in all probability they were connected with the worship of Prometheus, who was alleged to have been the first who brought fire down from heaven for the use of man. But as the race-course extended from the altar of the three gods, who were the patrons of fire, namely, Prometheus, Athena, and Hephaistos, to the Acropolis, the Lampadephoria were, no doubt, intended to do honour to these three deities, who had given and taught men the use of fire.

LAMPADON HEMERA (Gr. the day of torches), the name given to the fifth day of the ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES (which see), because on that day the initiated marched two and two in procession, each with a torch in his hand, into the temple of Ceres at Eleusis. In this procession the Daduch with a large torch led the way. The torches were passed from hand to hand, and the smoke and flames which they caused were believed to impart a purifying influence upon all around. The use of torches on this occasion is supposed to have originated from the circumstance that Ceres, while wandering through the earth in search of her lost child, lighted her path by torches.

LAMP (THE), a ceremony practised by the MARONITE CHURCH (which see), by way of anointing for the sick. They make a cake somewhat larger than the consecrated wafer of the Romanists, and put upon it seven pieces of cotton twisted with little pieces of straw, and put all together into a bason with some oil. Having read a portion of one of the gospels and epistles, with some prayers, they set fire to all the cottons. They now anoint with this oil the forehead, breast, and arms of every one present, and particularly of the sick person, saying at each unction, "May the Almighty, by this sacred unction, pardon all thy sins, and strengthen thy limbs as he did those of the poor man who was troubled with the palsy." Then they let the lamp burn till all the oil is exhausted. This rite is administered not to the dying, as in the case of the extreme unction of the Romish church, but to those who are sick, even though not mortally.

LAMPS. In all ages we find lamps used in the religious rites and customs of various nations. A burning lamp is mentioned at a very early period in connection with the ratification of the covenant made with Abraham. Thus Gen. xv. 17, "And it came to pass, that when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces." In illustration of this very ancient mode of ratifying a covenant, Roberts remarks, "It is an interesting fact, that the burning lamp or fire is still used in the East in confirmation of a covenant. Should a person in the evening make a solemn promise to perform something for another, and should the latter doubt his word, the former will say, pointing to the flame of the lamp, 'That is the witness.' On occasions of greater importance, when two or more join in a covenant, should the fidelity of any be questioned, they will say, 'We invoke the lamp of the Temple.' When an agreement of this kind has been broken, it will be said, 'Who would have thought this, for the lamp of the Temple was invoked.'"

The Jews were accustomed in ancient times to light lamps at their festivals, and particularly at the feast instituted by Judas Maccabæus, which, from that circumstance, received the name of the Feast of Lights. Herodotus, the father of profane history, mentions a feast under this name, which was celebrated among the ancient Egyptians. "They also meet," he says, "at Sais to offer sacrifice during a certain night, when every one lights in the open air a number of lamps around his house. The lamps consist of small cups filled with salt and oil, having a wick floating in each, which burns all night. This is called the 'Feast of the burning of Lamps.'" In the Maduwas of the Singhalese Budhists, where the sacred books are read, lamps and lanterns are suspended in great profusion and variety, and it is accounted an act of merit for the people to hold lamps in their hands or upon their heads while the priests are reading. In many ancient nations the sepulchres were wont to be lighted up with lamps, which were kept constantly burning. This is still the custom in Japan, where, in the case of a wealthy man who has died, 150 lamps are kept constantly burning in his tomb. Lamps, indeed, have in all ages been a common ornament in the temples of the heathen, especially on festivals. Tertullian and Lactantius both of them speak of this custom as prevailing among the heathen. The Christians, also, seem to have learned this custom from the idolaters around them. Hence we find one of the Apostolical canons forbidding Christians to carry oil to any heathen temple, or Jewish synagogue, or to set up lights on their festivals under penalty of excommunication. In a canon also of the council of Eliberis, Christians are prohibited from setting up lamps in public under the same penalty. It is plain, therefore, from the very existence of such canons, that some tendency must have been shown by the Christians to imitate the heathen in the use of lamps as an essential part of certain religious rites.

LAMPS (FESTIVAL OF), celebrated annually in Rajast'han, in honour of the Hindu goddess LAKSHMI (which see). This brilliant festival is called the Dewali, when every city, village, and encampment exhibits a most brilliant spectacle. For weeks before workmen are busy night and day in the manufacture of lamps for the occasion, and all ranks, from the palace to the cottage, provide themselves with these means of illumination in a form more or less costly. Stuffs, pieces of gold, and sweetmeats, are carried in trays, and consecrated at the temple of Lakshmi, to whom the day is consecrated. The Rana, on this occasion, honours his prime minister with his presence at dinner, and this chief officer of state, who is always of the mercantile caste, pours oil into a terra cotta lamp, which his sovereign holds; the same libation of oil is permitted by each of the near relations of the minister. On this day it is incumbent upon every votary of Lakshmi to try the chance of the dice, and from their success in the dewali, the prince, the chief, the merchant, and the artisan foretell the state of their coffers for the ensuing year.

LAMPETIANS, an early Christian sect who maintained that the Sabbath ought to be held as a fast. Another sect, bearing this name, was founded in the seventeenth century by Lampetius, a Syrian monk, who seems to have embraced opinions unfavourable to monastic vows. He held that as man is born free, no Christian ought to do any thing compulsorily or by necessity. Hence he denied the lawfulness of all vows, even those of obedience.

LAMPFER, the torchbearer, a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Pellene, in Achaia, where a festival called Lamperia was celebrated in honour of this god.

LANTHO, a demon of the air, worshipped among the inhabitants of the Molucca islands.

LANTERNS (CHINESE FEAST OF), a festival observed on the first full moon of the New year. Its chief characteristic seems to be, that it affords a display of ingenuity and taste in the construction and mechanism of an infinite variety of lanterns made of silk, varnish, horn, paper, and glass, some of them supplied with moving figures of men galloping on horseback, fighting or performing various feats, together with numerous representations of beasts, birds, and other living creatures, the whole in full motion. The moving principle is a horizontal wheel turned by the draught of air created by the heat of the lamp. The circular motion is communicated in various directions by fine threads attached to the moving figures. The following is a graphic description of the gay spectacle which a Chinese town presents on this strange festival: "The scene by night was sufficiently gay and exciting. Thousands upon thousands of large transparent lanterns of all colours, and covered with figures and large black Chinese characters, lined the sides of the street, in which men, women, and children were walking to and fro, dressed in their gayest and best holiday suits. Here Chinese music broke on the ear as some merry parties went by in hired carriages, and here a stationary orchestra sent forth still louder and more joyous strains. Here was a theatre, quite open in front and on both its flanks, on which grotesquely attired actors were performing popular comedies and farces; and here a highly excited group was listening attentively to a street-reader or itinerant story-teller, who was reciting some great and marvellous incident that occurred thousands of years ago. Other groups of Chinamen were listening with eager ears to inventive fortune-tellers, who were promising wealth, health, long life, and unalloyed happiness, to all such as could afford to pay well for the predictions. Children belonging to the upper classes, decked out in the gayest-coloured and most fantastic clothing, were slowly drawn about in little low carts, and increased the universal hubbub with their shrill voices. Here an immense crowd was amused with the tricks of a lad dressed up as a tiger, with a monstrous head and two glaring lamps for eyes, who crouched, sprang, and jumped about like the real wild beast, to the accompaniment of a most unearthly music; and here a still greater crowd was collected round several men, who had their bodies painted like tigers, a tail stuck on behind, and a chain round the waist, which was held by other men supposed to be their keepers. This was the true Chinese 'game of tigers.' The fellows, muscular and exceedingly nimble, imitated the movements of the wild beast admirably, and some of them so fully entered into the character and worked themselves up to such a pitch of excitement, that they seized and tore to pieces with their teeth a live kid that was thrown among them. The profession is hereditary: there are whole families that bear the soubriquet of 'Tigers,' and in which the boys, as soon as they are strong enough to bear the fatigue, are taught by their fathers to personate the animal, and imitate its every action or movement.

"The brilliantly illuminated junks were gliding over the tranquil bosom of the lake, and innumerable kites, with small bright lanterns appended to them, were flying in the calm blue heavens, now surmounting and now crossing each other like so many gigantic fire-flies; and as kite-flying is not in China solely a juvenile amusement, many of these toys or playthings were put up and held by men of mature age and with portentous pig-tails. In a sort of amphitheatre, lighted up with lanterns and torches, other men, young and old, were busily engaged in shuttle-cock, using, not their hands and battledores as we do, but their feet.

"In another enclosure were quail fights and cock fights, with people betting desperately on the issue. But gambling of some kind or other was rife in nearly every quarter, as was also the noxious practice of opium-smoking. On either side of the streets were low stalls, illuminated with coloured lamps, behind which were seated the retailers of all manner of sweets and confectionery, who, to attract the passers-by, knocked two pieces of wood together, and proclaimed with stentorian voice the excellence of their commodities; and from the pathway on this side and on that, merry parties were seen in the open shops, enjoying themselves with cards, dice, songs, instrumental music, frolics and games, and other amusements. Unhappily, besides the opium-smoking and the gambling, other vices were exhibited in the most barefaced manner, and scenes occurred which made the good missionary thrill with horror, and feel more than ever how blessed a thing it would be to instil into these benighted profligate people the precepts of the gospel and the saving spirit of Christianity."

The Chinese ascribe the origin of this strange festival to a misfortune which befell a certain mandarin whose daughter, as she was walking one evening on the bank of a river, accidentally fell into the water and was drowned. The disconsolate father ran to her assistance, attended by all his domestics. In order to discover the body of his child, he put out to sea along with the inhabitants of the place, bearing each in his hand a lighted lantern. The whole night was spent in search of the corpse, but in vain. The year following, on the same day of the month, the banks of the river were again lighted up with numberless lanterns, and from that time the custom was annually observed, of holding a Feast of Lanterns. The classical reader, in perusing the account of this Chinese festival, will probably call to mind the Cerealia of the ancient Romans, when women ran up and down with lighted torches in memory of the mode in which Ceres wandered in search of her daughter Proserpine. It has been supposed, however, that the Chinese borrowed the notion of this festival from a similar practice adopted by the ancient Egyptians in honour of Isis. (See LAMPS.) Another Chinese legend gives a different origin to the feast, deriving it from an extravagant project of one of their emperors, who shut himself up with his concubines in a magnificent palace, which he purposely erected, and lighted up with immense lanterns suspended from the roof, that he might always have a serene and luminous sky over his head, which might, in course of time, make him forget the various revolutions of the old world. The subjects of the foolish emperor, enraged at his conduct, rose in rebellion, and demolished his splendid palace. In order to transmit to posterity this event in their history, the Chinese instituted the Feast of Lanterns, which has been ever since recognized as an established festival.

LANTERNS (JAPANESE FEAST OF), the fifteenth day of the seventh Japanese month is set apart as a festival devoted to the honour of parents and ancestors. Every Japanese, whose parents are still alive, considers this a happy day. On the evening of the thirteenth, the IFAYS (which see), are taken from their cases, and a repast set before them of vegetables and fruits. In the middle is set a vase in which perfumes are burnt, and other vases containing flowers. Towards evening lanterns suspended from long bamboos, are lighted before each gravestone, and a supply of provisions laid down for the refreshment of the spirits of the dead. The same ceremony is repeated on the fifteenth day of the month. Before daylight on the sixteenth, the articles placed at the graves are packed into small boats of straw, provided with sails of paper or cloth, which are carried in procession with vocal and instrumental music to the water-side, where they are launched by way of dismissing the souls of the dead who are supposed now to return to their graves. "This festival," says Titsingh, speaking of its celebration at Nagasaki, "produces a highly picturesque effect. Outside the town, the view of it from the island Desima is one of the most beautiful. The spectator would almost imagine that he beheld a torrent of fire pouring from the hill, owing to the immense number of small boats that are carried to the shore to be turned adrift on the sea. In the middle of the night, and when there is a brisk wind, the agitation of the water causing all these lights to dance to and fro, produces an enchanting scene. The noise and bustle in the town, the sound of gongs and the voices of the priests, combine to form a discord that can scarcely be conceived. The whole bay seems to be covered with ignes fatui. Though these barks have sails of paper, or stronger stuff, very few of them pass the place where our ships lie at anchor. In spite of the guards, thousands of paupers rush into the water to secure the small copper coin and other things placed in them. Next day, they strip the barks of all that is left, and the tide carries them out to sea. Thus terminates this ceremony."

LANTHILA, a malignant deity worshipped by the inhabitants of the Molucca Islands. To this evil being all the Nitos or wicked spirits are subject.

LAOSYNACTES, officers in the Greek church, whose duty it is to collect together the deacons and the people.

LAO TSE, the founder of the Chinese sect of the TAUISTS (which see).

LAPHRÆUS, a surname of Apollo at Calydon.

LAPHRIA, a surname of Artemis at Calydon. It was also a surname of Athena.

LAPHRIA, a festival celebrated every year at Patre in Achaia, in honour of Artemis. Pausanias gives a minute description of the mode of its celebration. Around the altar of the goddess were placed a number of pieces of green wood, each sixteen yards long, and steps were made to lead up to the altar. The festival opened with a gorgeous procession, which marched to the temple of Artemis, followed by the priestess, who rode in a chariot drawn by stags. On the second day animals of different kinds were sacrificed, by being thrown alive on a pile of dry wood, which had been previously laid upon the altar, and was now set on fire. Thus the animals were consumed.

LAPHYSTIUS, a surname of Zeus, and also of Dionysus, probably derived from a mountain in Bœotia.

LAPIS (Lat. a stone), a surname of Jupiter at Rome, a stone being sometimes set up as a symbol of the god, and in several representations of this deity he was made to carry a stone in his hand instead of a thunderbolt.

LAPLANDERS (RELIGION OF). This country is the most northerly part of Europe, bordering indeed upon the Arctic Ocean. Both the Lapps and the Finns appear to have occupied a much larger portion of Scandinavia than they at present possess. These two people, however, are supposed to belong to distinct races, characterized by different physiological and psychological peculiarities. The Lapp is remarkable for his obstinacy, suspicion, and child-ishness, while the Finn is noted for his energy and austere earnestness. The Lapps consider it an honour to belong to the Finns, but the Finns look upon the Lapps with the most contemptuous disdain. It is not unlikely that the Lapps were the aboriginal inhabitants of Finland and Esthonia; and that at some remote period they had been conquered by the Finns. The whole country of Lapland is divided into three parts, bearing the name of Russian, Swedish, and Norwegian Lapland and Finmark.

The religion of the Lapps approaches at various points to that of the Finns. (See FINNS, RELIGION OF.) They seem to have had the same Supreme Deity, under the name of Jumala, who was probably the same with Thor, whom they worshipped in conjunction with Storjunkare and Baieu, the latter being considered as the god of the sun or fire. They worshipped also Ajeka, whose image was of wood, and Stourra Passe, who was always represented under the figure of a stone. Ajeka was adored as the author of life, and the supreme ruler of the human race. His image was usually kept in a sort of rustic temple, formed of branches of fir and birch, and raised in the rear of their huts. A rude table placed in the middle of the sanctuary served at once for an altar and a pedestal for the idol, which was the trunk of a birch-tree. In selecting the special tree for the purpose, a birch with a round root was sought as being best adapted to represent a human head. For the convenience of the deity, a nail with a small flint was put into the hand of the idol that he might strike a light whenever he chose. Behind him, and round the edge of the table, the horns of the deer that had been sacrificed to his honour were arranged in heaps, and immediately in front was placed a box filled with small pieces of flesh, taken from every part of the victim, with melted grease poured over them.

The Laplanders held Stourra Passe as a favourite household deity, every family having an image of him in the form of a rough stone, which they might happen to have found in the mountains, with a resemblance, however remote, to a human figure, which they imagined to have been impressed upon it by the god himself. The stone, which was usually large, was placed upon a little mound with a pile of reindeer's horns behind it; other smaller stones were ranged around the large one, that which was nearest in size to it being called the wife of the god, the third in degree his son or daughter, and the rest his servants. Regnard, a Frenchman, who travelled in Lapland in 1681, mentions having seen such stones as those now described, which he alleges were still secretly worshipped by the Laplanders, though at that time they were avowedly Christians. It was plain to Regnard that they regarded these stones with reverence, from the alarm which they manifested on his attempting to carry them away. They expressed great dread of the vengeance of the offended god, and their fears were instantly quieted when the traveller desisted from his threatened spoliation.

The Laplanders usually sacrificed to their deities at the fall of the year, and none but men were allowed to officiate or even be present on such occasions. It was usual at these sacred times to erect a new statue to Ajeka, who was allowed one every year. Before sacrificing a deer to the deity, they inquired by means of the magic drum (see DRUM, SACRED), whether the intended victim would be acceptable or not to the god. The mode of solving this important question was by fastening to one of their magic rings a few hairs taken from the neck of the victim, and by laying them upon the head of the drum, which was then beaten by one of the party. If, in consequence of the concussion, the magic ring should turn and point to the figure of the god who was to be propitiated, such a movement was regarded as an infallible sign that he would be well pleased with the oblation. But if, notwithstanding the violent concussion made by beating the drum, the magic ring remained motionless, it was considered to be an unfavourable omen in so far as that particular deity was concerned. The offering, therefore, was devoted to another deity, and the same ceremony was renewed, with the hope of better success.

In their sacrifices the Laplanders presented the horns of the reindeer as an oblation to the deity, and the mouth of the idol was smeared with fresh blood. When the image was placed on the top of an inaccessible height, the victim was sacrificed at the foot of the mountain, and a stone dipped in its blood was thrown as far as possible towards the image. By this ceremony they imagined that they had fully acquitted themselves of their duty to the god. Another peculiar custom was to place branches of trees upon the consecrated stones twice a-year, pine branches in the summer, and birch branches in the winter. While thus engaged, they were in the habit of judging of the disposition of the god by the weight of the stone which represented him. If it was light, the god was thought to be propitious, but if it was so heavy as to be immovable, the god was imagined to be angry, and his vengeance was dreaded. The spots where these idols of stone were found were called holy mountains, a name which some of them retain to this day. The Laplanders seem to have had no official priesthood, but any one who wished to propitiate a deity, consulted the drum, and performed the sacrifice himself. Reindeer were their principal offerings, but in some cases dogs were also used as sacrificial victims. Divine honours were anciently paid in Lapland to the sun, and also to the spirits of the dead, but neither the one nor the other was worshipped under any material representation. When victims were destined to be sacrificed to Baieu or the sun, they were distinguished by a white thread; and when they were destined to be devoted to the spirits of the dead, they were marked by a string of black wool. In most cases it appears that a part of the deer offered in sacrifice was eaten by the worshippers; sometimes it was buried, but little seems to have ever been given to the gods except the bones and horns, and occasionally a portion of the entrails.

Besides the spirits of the dead, the Laplanders believed in the existence of Juiles (which see), or aerial spirits, and paid them a sort of adoration. Scheffer supposes that the idea of these spirits is connected with the appearance of the angels to the shepherds of Bethlehem at the birth of our blessed Lord. At Christmas Eve, the Juhles are supposed to float in the air in greater numbers, and the remainder of the articles of food used on that occasion are put into baskets and suspended on the branches of trees for the refreshment of these spirits.

LAPSED CHRISTIANS, a name given to those among the early Christians who, amid the severe persecutions to which they were exposed, lost their courage, and resorted to measures which were regarded as a virtual denial of the faith, and which actually excluded them from the communion of the church. Many of these were afterwards seized with strong feelings of remorse, and made earnest application for restoration to the fellowship of the faithful. Hence numerous cases of this kind came under the consideration of the church, which from their novelty and delicacy led to considerable difference of opinion. The state of the controversy in the third century on the subject of the restoration of the lapsed is thus clearly stated by Neander: "The question now arose, whether their wishes should be complied with:—was their petition to be absolutely rejected, or should a middle course be pursued, by holding out to them, indeed, the hope of being restored to the fellowship of the church; but before the privilege was actually granted them, by subjecting their conduct to a longer probation, and requiring evidence of continued penitence? Should the same course be pursued with all the lapsed, or should the treatment be varied according to the difference of circumstances and the character of the offences? The Church at this time was still without any generally acknowledged principles of Church penance in cases of this sort. There was one party who were for refusing to grant absolution, on any conditions, to such as had violated their baptismal vow by one of the so-called mortal sins. Following that Jewish principle which did not allow all duties to be regarded alike as duties to God, and all sins alike, as sins against God, men made an arbitrary distinction,—for which they cited as their authority the passage 1 Samuel ii. 25,—between sins against God and against man; and to the former was reckoned every act of denying the faith, though the degree of guiltiness, if the denial was simply a yielding to the weakness of sense, might be far inferior to that involved in some of the so-called sins against man. Cyprian, who was in the habit of calling Tertullian especially his teacher, might perhaps, from the study of that father's writings, have received a bias towards the principles of the more rigid party with regard to penance.

"But if Cyprian was an advocate of this principle when he first entered on the episcopal office, yet, cherishing as he did the heart of a father towards his church, he could not fail to be shaken by the great multitude of the lapsed, who, sometimes with bitter tears of repentance, entreated him to grant them absolution. Must all these, many of whom, as for example, the libellatici, had fallen only from defect of knowledge, and others from simply yielding to the flesh under the severity of their tortures, remain for ever excluded from the blessed community of their brethren, and, in Cyprian's view, from that Church in which alone was to be found the way to heaven? The paternal heart of the bishop revolted at the thought, but he dared not act here upon his own responsibility. In this state of indecision he declared that the fallen should be received and exhorted to repentance; but that the decision of their fate should be reserved to that time when, on the restoration of peace, the bishops, clergy, and churches, in joint and cautious deliberation, after having examined the question in all its bearings, should be able to unite on some common principles, in relation to a matter where every Christian was so deeply interested. Besides, there was a great difference between the offences of these fallen brethren. While some, merely to avoid the sacrifice of their worldly possessions, had, without a struggle, even hastened up to the altars of the gods; others had fallen only through ignorance, or under the force of torture. The disorders of the times made it impossible to examine carefully into the difference of offences, and the difference of moral character in the individuals. Moreover, those that had fallen should, by practical demonstration of their penitence, render themselves worthy of re-admission to the fellowship of the Church,—and the persecution itself presented them with the best opportunity for this. 'He who cannot endure the delay,' says Cyprian, 'may obtain the crown of martyrdom.'"

While some pastors were disposed to adopt very severe measures in the case of the lapsed, the great majority agreed in following a uniform course of discipline which subjected the lapsed penitents to a term of probation, shorter or longer according to the aggravation of their fall. Those who had been compelled against their will to engage in idolatrous practices were restored immediately on application. Those who apostatized as soon as they were brought before a heathen tribunal, or who after boldly avowing their belief in Christianity, lapsed into idolatry while confined in prison, were subjected to a probation varied according to circumstances. Those, however, who deceived the magistrates by purchasing an indulgence, or by allowing their slaves to be tortured instead of them, were visited with a heavier discipline. But those of the lapsed who underwent the most rigorous treatment were the Traditores, as they were called, who had given up their Bibles to be burned by the heathen. This was accounted a most heinous offence, and such as were convicted of it were excluded from the church for ten, twenty, and even thirty years; nay, some were not admitted to the fellowship of the faithful till they had reached their dying bed. It sometimes happened that lapsed Christians, who had been sentenced by the church to a protracted probation, became impatient under the infliction, and procured testimonials in their favour from faithful confessors who had boldly confronted martyrdom in the cause of Christ, and whose certificate would naturally carry great weight with it in the estimation of their fellow-Christians. This practice, in course of time, gave rise to great abuse, exciting in the minds of the confessors themselves a feeling of spiritual pride, which was deeply injurious to their progress in the divine life, and leading some of them to indulge the unscriptural notion, that by their sufferings they had expiated their sins. Some of them, accordingly, in their certificates to the lapsed, expressed themselves with a tone of authority as if their word was sufficient to exculpate and discharge their fallen brethren.

Cyprian took a determined stand against the exaggerated reverence paid to these confessors, and the false confidence which men put in their intercession. But while thus faithfully protesting against the undue respect shown to the confessors, Cyprian was so inconsistent as himself to yield to the prevailing spirit of the multitude, which was not a little encouraged by the countenance received from the Roman church. In A. D. 251, a council was held of the North African church, to which Cyprian belonged, and the vexed question of the lapsed having been carefully considered, it was resolved to adopt a middle course between that excessive severity which cut them off from all hope, and a lax indulgence in complying with their wishes. In regard to those, however, who evinced no signs of repentance in their conduct, but who first expressed a desire for the communion when on their sickbed, the synod declared that such a desire should not be granted. The guilt of the Lapsed Christians was more or less heinous according to circumstances. Hence the distinction into the Thurificati, the Sacrificati, and the Libellatici, whose different characters led to disputes upon the subject of discipline in the early Christian church.

In the case of clergymen who lapsed in time of persecution, it was laid down as a rule that they might on repentance be restored to the peace of the church as laymen, but they were not allowed to officiate or communicate as ecclesiastics any longer. Cyprian says, that this was the rule at Rome and over all the world, if bishops or any other lapsed in time of persecution, to admit them to do penance in the church, but withal to remove them from the function of the clergy and honour of the priesthood. It was accounted a heinous crime in any minister to refuse to receive and reconcile penitent lapsers after they had made canonical satisfaction. The clergyman who was guilty of such a manifest abuse of ministerial authority was to be deposed, because he was thereby guilty of grieving Christ, who said, "There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." See APOSTASY, CENSURES (ECCLESIASTICAL).

LARARIUM, that part in the interior of an ancient Roman house which was appropriated to the Lares or household gods, and where the morning devotions were wont to be offered up.

LARENTALIA, a festival among the ancient Romans, which was held in honour of ACCA LARENTIA (which see), the nurse of Romulus and Remus. It was also observed in honour of the Lares generally.

LARENTIA (ACCA). See ACCA LARENTIA.

LARES, the household gods of the ancient Romans. The word is most probably derived from lar, friendly, because families regarded them as specially watching over their interests. The Lares, as tutelary spirits, were sometimes confounded with the souls of deceased persons. Thus Apuleius considers the private or domestic Lares to have been the spirits of the dead who had acquitted themselves well in this world; while the spirits of the unhonoured dead wandered about, frightening people under the name of Larva or Lemures. The Lares were believed to watch over the interior of every man's household, and to preserve from injury both his family and his property. Yet they were not regarded as divinities like the Penates, but as guardian spirits, whose place was the chimney-piece, and whose altar was the domestic hearth, on which each individual made offerings of incense to them in his own house. Ovid speaks of only two Lares, and these, like the Penates, were worshipped in the form of little figures or images of wax, earthenware, or terra cotta, and of metal, especially silver. Their dress was short, to indicate their readiness to serve, and they held a sort of horn of plenty in their hands, as the emblem of hospitality and good housekeeping. Tatius, king of the Sabines, is said to have built a temple to the Lares. Plutarch distinguishes them, like the genii, into good and evil; and they were also divided into public and private. The public Lares were placed at the intersection of roads, and on the highways, being esteemed the patrons and protectors of travellers. There were Lares of the cities, and Lares of the country. When the Roman youth laid aside the bull, which was a heart-shaped ornament worn till they were fourteen years of age, they dedicated it to the Lares. Slaves, also, when they had obtained their freedom, hung up their chains to these deities. At an early period the Romans offered young people in sacrifice, both to the Lares and Penates; but in course of time human sacrifices were abolished, and animals substituted, particularly hogs, in the case of public offerings; while in private, wine, incense, poppy-heads, woollen bandages, and images of straw were presented. The Lar familiaris was regarded as an essential part of the household furniture, and was carried with the family wherever they went. Servius Tullius is said to have instituted the worship of the public Lares, and though for a time it declined in importance, it was renewed by Augustus. There was a temple to the Lares at Rome in the Via Sacra, in which there were two images, supposed to be those of Romulus and Remus, with the stone figure of a dog placed in front of them. The apartment in a wealthy house where the images of the Lares stood, was called the LARARIUM (which see). Pious people prayed to them every day, but they were more especially worshipped on the Kalends, Nones, and Ides of every month. When a Roman household sat down to meals, a portion of the food was offered to the Lares. On any joyful occasion wreaths of flowers were tastefully thrown around their images. When a bride entered the house of her husband for the first time, she made a solemn sacrifice to the Lares, invoking them to be propitious to her throughout her married life.

That the practice of having household gods or Lares existed in early times is plain from the teraphim, which were in the possession of Laban in Mesopotamia, as we find noticed in Gen. xxxi. 19, "And Laban went to shear his sheep: and Rachel had stolen the images that were her father's." These teraphim, which are mentioned frequently in the Old Testament, are alleged by the Jewish writers to have been images in the shape of men, or at least with a human head, and to have been placed in niches in the wall with lamps burning before them. See TERAPHIM.

LAT (AL). The deity having this name, which means in Arabic, "the goddess," was worshipped by the ancient Arabian tribe of Thakif, who dwelt at Taif to the eastward of Mecca. The temple of Lat was at a place called Naklah.

LATERANUS, a deity mentioned by Arnobius as presiding over hearths made of bricks. Some have supposed him to be identical with Fulcan.

LATIALIS, a surname of Jupiter, as the presiding deity of Latium. In his honour the Latin Feriae were annually observed on the Alban Mount.

LATIN CHURCH (EASTERN). In those parts of the East where the Latin tongue was spoken, Christianity had many of its early converts, and Caesarea, which was the Roman capital of Palestine, gradually rose in ecclesiastical importance until it asserted a superiority even over Jerusalem. In the fourth century, when Christianity became the established religion of the Roman Empire, multitudes of devout pilgrims resorted to the Holy Land, that they might visit the hallowed scenes of Bible history; and when monasticism was introduced from Egypt into Syria, various establishments of monks were formed in different parts of the country. These institutions were available both for the Eastern and the Western churches. But when the Monophysite controversy, toward the end of the sixth century, divided the inmates of these Syrian monasteries into different religious parties, and the eager contest for superiority was commencing between the bishop of Constantinople and the Pope of Rome, Gregory VIII. raised a hospice at Jerusalem for the special accommodation of the Western pilgrims. One effect of the crusades was to advance the interests of Rome in the East, while the professed object of these expeditions was to liberate the Christians of the Greek or Eastern church. Thus has the Latin church ever maintained a branch in close communion with her in the East, but in comparison of the Orthodox Apostolic or Greek church, it has always been a feeble remnant. The only remains, indeed, of the church of the crusades are the monasteries of the Terra Santa, whose inmates are Franciscan monks, to whom are intrusted both the guardianship of the holy places, and the spiritual superintendence of that small part of the population which adheres to the Latin ritual. The superior of these monks, who bears the title of the "Most Reverend Warden," holds his appointment directly from Rome. The support of the monasteries, which are twenty-two in number, is derived from the Society de Propaganda Fide, as well as from the gratuities bestowed by the travellers who avail themselves of the hospitality which these institutions afford. Besides these monks of the Terra Santa, there are other monastic establishments in different parts of Palestine. On Mount Carmel is found the convent of Elias, which is among the largest, most substantial, and best regulated in the land, and the high altar of the chapel is reared over the reputed cave where Elijah dwelt. The former building was recently destroyed by Abdallah Pasha, but it has been reconstructed on a more magnificent scale. The Carmelite friars have had an institution on this mountain from time immemorial. The Capuchins, also, have missions at Beirut, Tripoli, Damascus, Aleppo, and on Mount Lebanon, where also the Jesuits have long had a residence. Besides all these, the Lazarites have four missions in Palestine, and there is an apostolic vicariate of Aleppo. The Jesuits, in various parts of the East, aware of the unpopularity which attaches to their name, assume to themselves the denomination of Lazarists, and other titles, which may conceal their real character. Since the origin of the Society, the Jesuits have had missions among the Eastern Christians, where, by the establishment of schools and other means, they have succeeded in gaining over large numbers to Rome.

Dr. Wilson, in his 'Lands of the Bible,' gives an account of the state of the Eastern Latin church at Smyrna: "There are in Smyrna one Roman Catholic bishop (archbishop) and sixty-seven priests. Of the latter, forty are secular or parish clergy, nine are Capuchins, seven are Zocalonti, ten are Lazarists, and one is a Dominican. . . . There are also twelve 'Sisters of Charity.' In Smyrna there are three large churches and two chapels. One of the latter is in the French Seamen's hospital. There is also a church at Bujah, and another at Barnabât. The churches in Smyrna are usually known by the names of French, Austrian, and Lazarist. The regularly officiating clergy in the French church are the Capuchins; in the Austrian, the Zoecalonti; and in the Lazarist, the Lazarist priests. The Capuchins and the Zoecalonti have each a monastery. The Lazarite priests have an elementary school of about three hundred boys. The 'Sisters of Charity' have a school of about three hundred girls. . . . The college of the Propaganda is under the direction of the bishop, and contains about two hundred pupils, fifty of whom board in the establishment. Most of the professors are of the secular clergy. Among them are three Armeno-Catholic priests. Languages are chiefly taught in the Propaganda. . . . Few conversions to the Roman Catholic faith, as far as we know, occur in Smyrna and the vicinity. The system is principally aggressive, we apprehend, by means of the schools. Considerable numbers of youth, even Protestant youth, are thus brought under the influence of the Roman priesthood; and the result will probably be, either that they will become papists, or be indifferent to all religions. Among the Protestants there are few who are decidedly anti-Roman Catholic. Of the papal population in Smyrna and the adjacent villages, we cannot speak with certainty. There are probably from eight to ten thousand. This estimate does not include a few papal Armenians and Greeks."

At Antioch there are Maronite, United Greek, and Syrian patriarchs, and elsewhere an Armenian and a Chaldean patriarch, all in communion with Rome, and it is calculated that in Asiatic Turkey alone there are not fewer than 1,000,000 who acknowledge the supremacy of Pope Pius IX. The adherents of the Latin church at Constantinople are under the apostolic vicar of that place, and enjoy the civil protection of the European ambassadors, not being considered as direct subjects of the Porte. The converts from the Greek to the Latin church form a distinct religious community under the name of the Greek-Catholic or MELCHITE CHURCH (which see).

LATITUDINARIANS, a term applied to those divines in England, who, in the seventeenth century, endeavoured to bring Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Independents into one communion, by compromising their differences. Among these may be mentioned the highly respected names of Chillingworth, Cudworth, Tillotson, and Stillingfleet. These men, and others who agreed with them, were zealous supporters of the Church of England, without, however, regarding the Episcopal form of Church government as essential to the constitution of the Christian church. They were not disposed, therefore, to exclude from the communion of the church those who simply preferred other forms of worship and discipline. Attaching less importance than many of their brethren to a strict adherence to creeds and confessions, they were ready to merge the Arminianism which then prevailed in the Church of England, and the Calvinism which prevailed among the Presbyterians and Independents, in the wider and more comprehensive designation of Christians. Hence the rise of the name Latitudinarians, which was applied to those men who, lamenting the divisions which existed among Christians, were disposed to extend the hand of Christian brotherhood to all who held those points which they regarded as essential to salvation.

LAUDISTI, a society which was instituted in Florence A. D. 1316, for the performance of religious lauds. This society still exists, and is in active operation.

LAUDS, the name which was given to the service which followed next after the nocturn before the Reformation. The Lauds are now merged in the Matins. The term Lauds is also frequently applied to hymns in church music. In the Church of Rome Lauds are appointed for cock-crowing, or before break of day. (See CANONICAL HOURS.)

LAURA, a name given to a cluster of small cells in which monks in ancient times lived together in a desert, each monk occupying a separate cell. The most celebrated Lauras mentioned in ecclesiastical history were situated in Palestine.

LAUREL, a plant which was sacred to Apollo the god of prophecy, and much used by those who pretended to inspiration. The heads of ancient seers were usually adorned with laurel wreaths, while they carried in their hand a laurel branch by way of a magic wand.

LAURENCE (ST.), REGULAR CANONS OF, a Romish Order of Religious in the province of Dauphiné in France. It is said to have been founded by St. Benedict, in the sixth century, and to have continued to flourish for a considerable time. At length the irruption of the Vandals destroyed the monastery, but it was rebuilt in the middle of the eleventh century, and granted by Odo, Count of Savoy, to a monk of the name of Gerard, and his canons. This donation was confirmed in 1065 by Humbert, bishop of Turin, who added to it above forty additional churches. By this means the Order was considerably enlarged, and it speedily became so important that the Popes and the Counts of Savoy bestowed upon it various special privileges. It had formerly thirty priories.

LAVACRUM. See FONT.

LAYER, one of the vessels of the ancient Jewish tabernacle, used by the priests to wash their hands and feet before entering upon their holy ministrations. No detailed account is given in Sacred Scripture of its form or dimensions, but reasoning by analogy from the brazen sea in the temple, it has been generally supposed that the laver was of a circular form. It stood between the table of the congregation and the altar, and is described by Moses as having had a foot, that is a basis or pediment upon which the laver rested. This vessel was constructed from the brazen ornaments which the women had presented for the use of the tabernacle. It is generally believed that the laver stood upon another basin more wide and shallow, like a cup on a saucer; and that the latter received from several spouts in the upper basin the water which was allowed to escape when the priests washed themselves with the water which fell from the upper basin. How the priests washed their hands and their feet at the laver is uncertain. "That they did not wash," says the Editor of the Pictorial Bible, "in either the laver or its base seems clear, because then the water in which they washed would have been rendered impure by those who washed before or with them; and as we know that Orientals do not like to wash in a basin, after our manner, in which the water with which we commence washing is clearer than that with which we finish, but at a falling stream, where each successive affusion is of clean water, we incline to think that the priests either washed themselves with the stream as it fell from the spouts into the base, or else received in proper vessels so much water as they needed for the occasion. The Orientals, in their washings, make use of a vessel with a long spout, and wash at the stream which issues from thence, the waste water being received in a basin which is placed underneath. This seems to us to illustrate the idea of the laver with its base, as well as the ablutions of the priests. The laver had thus its upper basin, from which the stream fell, and the under basin for receiving the waste water; or it is quite compatible with the same idea and practice to suppose that, to prevent too great an expenditure of water, they received a quantity in separate vessels, using it as described, and the base receiving the water which in washing fell from their hands and feet. This explanation, although it seems to us probable, is, necessarily, little more than conjectural. The Jewish commentators say that any kind of water might be used for the laver; but that the water was to be changed every day. They also state that ablution before entering the tabernacle was in no case dispensed with. A man might be perfectly clean, might be quite free from any ceremonial impurity, and might even have washed his hands and feet before he left home, but still he could by no means enter the tabernacle without previous ablution at the laver."

In the temple of Solomon there was a very large laver of brass, called the molten sea, which was ten cubits in diameter, five deep, and thirty in circumference. In addition to the brazen sea, there were ten smaller lavers of brass, which were situated five on the north side, and five on the south side of the court. The flesh of the victims that were sacrificed was washed in these smaller lavers, which were each four cubits in circumference, and rested on bases and wheels of brass.

In the second temple the laver stood between the altar and the porch, not directly before the altar, but removed towards the north. The size and measure of this vessel is not described in the Sacred Writings, but the Jewish Rabbis have professed to give a minute account of it. The mode in which the process of bathing in the laver was conducted is thus described. The priest laid his right hand upon his right foot, and his left hand upon his left foot, and while the water ran from the spout he stood in a stooping posture and washed his hands and feet. He that went about the service with unwashed hands and feet in the morning was liable to death by the hand of God; and if a priest was clean before, yet he durst not officiate before he had bathed. During the service he must stand upon the bare pavement; his body must be bathed in cold water before he entered; then he was to wash his hands and feet, and stand in thin linen and on the cold pavement all the time of his ministration.

The typical design of the laver was obviously to teach the necessity of the inward purification of the soul, under the outward emblem of the washing of the body; and if this inward purity was necessary to all who would serve God faithfully, more especially was the cultivation of it incumbent upon those who were officially engaged in the ministrations of the sanctuary. Thus while the altar on which the victims were offered was a symbol of justification, the laver with its purifying fountain was a symbol of sanctification.

LAVER OF REGENERATION, a name sometimes given in the early Christian church to the ordinance of BAPTISM (which see).

LAVIPEDIUM. See PEDILAVIUM.

LAW, a term which is used in the Sacred Writings under a variety of different significations. Sometimes it is employed, as in the Book of Psalms, to denote the whole of the revealed will of God as contained in the Bible. On some occasions it implies the whole religion of the Jews, and on other occasions it is limited to their ritual or ceremonial observances, and also in a still more restricted sense to the Decalogue or Ten Commandments. In some passages, however, it signifies the Law of Nature inscribed on the consciences of men, and therefore binding upon them by the authority of their Creator.

LAW (JOY OF THE). See JOY OF THE LAW.

LAW (ORAL). See ORAL LAW.

LAW (WRITTEN). See BIBLE.

LAWYERS, a term applied by the Jews to those who interpreted and expounded the Mosaic Law, more especially the Traditionary or Oral Law. A lawyer and a scribe were evidently synonymous words, as is evident from a comparison of Mat. xxii. 35, and Mark xii. 28, the same person being styled in the former passage a lawyer, and in the latter a scribe. Basnage regards the lawyers as identical with the modern CARAITES (which see), inasmuch as they adhered closely to the text of the Law, and totally disregarded all traditions. Dr. Macknight, however, alleges that the duty of the Jewish lawyers, strictly so called, was to give themselves up to the private study of the Law, while the employment of the scribes was to expound the Law in public.

LAY BAPTISM. In the early Christian church it was required that none should dispense the ordinance of baptism in ordinary cases, except the regular ministers, but in cases of extremity, where an ordained minister was not at hand, and the candidate was thought to be near death, a layman was allowed to baptize. This doctrine is still maintained in the Church of Rome, and even a midwife is allowed, where a priest is not within reach, to baptize an infant in its dying moments. Considerable difference of opinion exists in the Church of England on the subject of Lay Baptism.

LAY BROTHERS. See BROTHERS (LAY).

LAY COMMUNION. See COMMUNION (LAY).

LAZARITES, an order of monks instituted in France in the seventeenth century by M. Vincent. They have a seminary in the suburbs of Paris. The Jesuits assume this name in various parts of the Continent to conceal their real character.

LAZARUS (ST.), DAY OF, a festival of the Church of Rome, observed on the 21st day of February, in memory of Lazarus a painter, who lived in the fourteenth century, in the reign of Theodosius Leonoclastes. This saint was distinguished as a painter of images, and on this account he incurred the resentment of the Emperor. No sufferings, however, could deter him from his favourite employment, and in spite of persecution, therefore, he persisted in painting images. On this account his memory is held in veneration by Romanists.

LE, the ultimate immaterial element of the universe, according to the philosophical system of Confucius, the Chinese sage. It is the Absolute regarded in association with material essences, and manifesting itself in virtue of such association as the cause of organization and of order. With this principle the spirit of man is strictly one and consubstantial. The Le therefore is identical with the Tao-keih, the Absolute or literally the Great Extreme. Beyond it as the highest pinnacle of heaven, the one ultimate power, the entity without an opposite, no human thought whatever is capable of soaring. Itself incomprehensible, it girdles the whole frame of nature animate and inanimate. From it alone, as from the fountainhead of being, issued everything that is. Creation is the periodic flowing forth of it. "The Absolute is like a stem shooting upwards; it is parted into twigs, it puts out leaves and blossoms; forth it springs incessantly, until its fruit is fully ripe; yet even then the power of reproduction never ceases to be latent in it. The vital juice is there; and so the Absolute still works and works indefinitely. Nothing hinders or can hinder its activity until the fruits have all been duly ripened and activity gives place to rest."

LEADER (CLASS), a lay-officer among the Wesleyan Methodists. Every person connected with the denomination is a member of some class over which there is a Leader, whose duty it is to see each person in his class at least once a-week, in order to inquire into their spiritual condition, and to give such exhortations, consolations, warnings, or reproofs, as may be suited to their peculiar condition and circumstances. He must also receive what each is willing to give to the poor, or to the support of gospel ordinances. The Leader is required to meet the minister and stewards of the society once a-week, in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reproofed. It is his business also to pay to the stewards every week what he has received from his class in the week preceding, and to show his account of what each person has contributed. The Class-Leaders being the most numerous officers in the whole communion, have great influence, more especially from their permanent residence, not being liable to removal as the ministers are. No person can be admitted into the Wesleyan Society if he is objected to by the Class-Leaders; nor can any one be excluded from church-fellowship without their concurrence. Females are also in many cases Class-Leaders, the members of their class being females. See METHODISTS (WESLEYAN).

LEADERS' MEETING, the lowest of the inferior courts among the Wesleyan Methodists. It is composed of the travelling preachers stationed for the time being in the circuit, along with the Stewards and Class-Leaders whether male or female. In every chapel, congregation, and society, there is a Leaders' meeting. The consent of this court is necessary to the admission of a member into the society, or the appointment or removal of a Leader or Steward. Along with the Trustees of the chapel, the Leaders' meeting has the power of determining whether or not the sacrament of the Lord's Supper shall be dispensed there; and they have the charge of the fund for the relief of poor and distressed members of the society. See METHODISTS (WESLEYAN).

LEAGUE AND COVENANT (THE SOLEMN). See COVENANT (THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND).

LECANOMANCY, a species of divination performed by means of a bason with wedges of gold or silver marked with certain characters. The wedges were suspended over the water, and the demon formally invoked, when he gave the response in a low hissing sound passing through the fluid. See DIVINATION.

LECHEATES, a surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped at Aliphera. The name was applied to him as the father of Athena, and the protector of women in childbed.

LECTERN, the reading-desk in ancient churches in England. It was generally constructed of wood, but at a later period it was commonly made of brass, and formed in the shape of an eagle with outstretched wings.

LECTICARII, a name sometimes given to the COPIATÆ (which see).

LECTIONARIUM, a calendar of lessons to be read during Divine service in Christian churches. The most ancient work of this kind is generally thought to be Hippolytus's Canon Paschalis, which, however, points out only those lessons suited to the festivals. There exists a Lectionarium which has been attributed to Jerome, but is generally believed to have been the production of a much later writer. Some time after, however, there were several calendars composed for the use of the French churches, the oldest of which is the Lectionarium Gallicanum. See LESSONS.

LECTISTERNIUM, a ceremony observed by the ancient Greeks and Romans on occasion of extraordinary solemnities. It was performed by placing the images of the gods on couches, with a rich feast set before them. The most remarkable ceremony of this kind was the Epulum Jovis or Feast of Jupiter at Rome, which was celebrated in the Capitol where the image of Jupiter was made to recline on a couch, while the statues of Juno and Minerva were placed on chairs by his side.

LECTORS. See READERS.

LECTURERS, a term applied before the Reformation to persons who were appointed to read lectures before the universities. Afterwards the word was used to denote ministers in England who, deriving a stipend from a sum of money mortified by some wealthy individual, or from voluntary contributions under the license of the bishop, preached in parish churches at such times as not to interfere with the ministrations of the regular incumbent. The appointment of lectureships, both in London and throughout the country, was one of the modes by which the Puritans sought in the reign of Elizabeth, and that of James I., to supply the lack of ability and piety in the established churches. The High Church party looked upon these efficient lecturers with great contempt, and Archbishop Laud regarded them with feelings of jealousy and no little uneasiness, more especially as many of the nobles retained private lecturers in their mansions, and employed them to preach on their estates and in the neighbouring towns. At Laud's suggestion the king instructed the bishops to suppress lectures if preached in parish churches in the afternoon, and to substitute catechetical lectures in their place. Nay, the archbishop went farther, and procured an act to be passed in 1633, confiscating to the king's use the money which had been appropriated to the support of these lectureships. This enactment, however, did not succeed in abolishing these useful institutions, and in 1637 Laud persuaded the king to issue instructions prohibiting lecturers from preaching unless they would consent to say the Common Prayer in hood and surplice—a condition with which of course they refused to comply. During the Commonwealth, lecturers were favoured, and consequently increased in number. After the Restoration, however, the Act of Uniformity inflicted a heavy blow upon the system of lectureships, enacting as it did that no person should be allowed or received as a lecturer unless he declared his unfeigned assent and consent to the Thirty-Nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer, and to the use of all the rites, ceremonies, forms, and orders therein contained. The same act enjoined that prayers should always be read before a lecture was delivered. Lecturers of parishes in England are now generally chosen by the vestry or principal inhabitants, and are usually afternoon preachers. There are also lecturers in connection with most cathedral churches, and various lectureships have been founded by private individuals, such as the Boyle, the Bampton, and the Hulsean Lectures.

LEGATE, a cardinal or bishop whom the Pope sends as his ambassador to sovereign princes. He is the vicerent and representative of His Holiness, invested with plenary powers to act in his stead at a foreign court. There are three kinds of Legates. 1. Legates à latere, sent from his side, or directly from him, invested with most of the functions of the Pope himself. They can absolve excommunicated persons, call synods, grant dispensations in cases reserved to the Pope, fill up vacant dignities or benefices, and hear ordinary appeals. Cardinal Wolsey, and also Cardinal Pole were legates of this kind. 2. Legati Nati, such as hold their commission by virtue of office. Before the Reformation the Archbishop of Canterbury held this species of legatine authority in England. 3. Legati Dati, special Legates holding their authority from the Pope by special commission. For the time being they are superior to the other two orders. Such legates began to be appointed after the tenth century, and they often stretched their authority to a most unwarrantable extent. They held councils, promulgated canons, deposed bishops, and issued interdicts at their discretion. The functions of a Legate cannot be exercised until he is forty miles distant from Rome.

LEGENDS (ROMISH), wonderful narratives professing to treat of the lives and supernatural doings of the saints of the Romish calendar. The Legend was originally a book used in the Roman Catholic church, containing the lessons that were to be read at divine service. Hence the lives of saints and martyrs came to be called Legends, because chapters were to be read out of them at matins, and in the refectories of the religious houses. The Golden Legend is a collection of the lives of the saints, composed by John de Voragine, vicar-general of the Dominicans, and afterwards archbishop of Genoa, who died in 1208. The Breviary abounds in Legends of saints, which every Romish priest is bound daily to peruse. For the edition of the laity of the church of Rome, Alban Butler's laborious English work, entitled 'Lives of the Saints,' contains Legends of more than 1,500 saints, male and female. The grand treasury of Romish Legends is the gigantic work of the Bollandists in Latin, entitled 'Acta Sanctorum,' the Acts of the Saints, which has already reached more than fifty folio volumes, and will probably, before it is completed, contain at least 30,000 saints. This work was begun by a Jesuit of the name of Bollandus, and was continued at Brussels by a succession of editors, until the breaking out of the first French Revolution, towards the end of the last century, when it had reached its fiftieth volume. An additional volume has since been published. A recent addition has been made to the Legends of the Romish church by the publication, in 1846, of the lives of five saints who were canonized in 1839. This latest contribution to Romish Legends was the work of Cardinal Wiseman, who has thus employed himself in giving currency to stories which savour more of the literature of the Middle Ages than of the enlightened literature of the nineteenth century. See BREVIARY.

LEGION (THE THUNDERING), a name given to a legion of Christian soldiers in the army of Marcus Antoninus in his war against the Marcomanni, in A. D. 174. Eusebius, on the authority of Apollinarius and Tertullian, relates that the soldiers of this legion, being reduced to extremities by a severe and protracted drought, fell down upon their knees, and prayed to God, when immediately a violent thunder storm came on which dispersed the affrighted Germans, and the copious showers which fell refreshed the soldiers of the emperor. The result was, that the Roman army was victorious, and in commemoration of the event, the emperor conferred upon the Christian soldiers the name of the thundering legion, while he himself ceased to persecute the Christians. The miraculous event as recorded by Eusebius, has given rise to considerable difference of opinion among the learned, some attributing it to supernatural, and others to natural causes. The following view of this much-controverted subject is given by Neander: "In this account, truth and falsehood are mixed together. In the first place, it cannot be true that the emperor was led to put a stop to the persecution of the Christians by any event of this time; for the bloody persecution at Lyons did not take place till three years afterwards. Again, the 'thundering legion,' or 'the twelfth of the Roman legions,' had borne this name from the time of the Emperor Augustus. The fact at bottom, namely, that the Roman army, about that time, was rescued from a threatening danger by some such remarkable providence, is undeniable. The heathen themselves acknowledged it to be the work of Heaven; they ascribed it, however, not to the Christian's God, nor to their prayers, but to their own gods, to their Jupiter, and to the prayers of the emperor, or of the pagan army; to say nothing of the blind superstition which attributed the storm to the spells of an Egyptian necromancer. The emperor, it is said, stretched forth his hands, in supplication to Jupiter, with the words, 'This hand, which has never yet shed human blood, I raise to thee.' There were paintings in which he was represented in the attitude of prayer, and the army catching the rain in their helmets. The emperor has expressed his own conviction of the matter upon a medal, where Jupiter is exhibited launching his bolts on the barbarians, who lie stretched upon the ground; and perhaps, also, at the close of the first Book of the Monologues, where he mentions, among the things for which he was indebted, not to himself, but to the gods and his good fortune, what had happened among the Quades. It is certain, therefore, that this remarkable event can have had no influence in changing the disposition of the emperor towards the Christians. But it by no means follows that the latter are to be charged with making up a false story. The matter admits of a natural explanation. It is not impossible that, in the thundering legion, there were Christians; perhaps a large number of them; for it is certain that it was but a party among them who condemned the military profession. And although it was difficult for Christians at all times, and especially under an emperor so unfavourably disposed, to avoid participating, while connected with a Roman army, in the rites of paganism, yet they might succeed in doing so under particular circumstances. The Christian soldiers, then, resorted, as they were ever wont to do on like occasions, to prayer. The deliverance which ensued they regarded as an answer to their prayers; and, on their return home, they mentioned it to their brethren in the faith. These, naturally, would not fail to remind the heathen how much they were indebted to the people whom they so violently persecuted. Claudius Apollinaris, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, might have heard the story, soon after the event itself, from the Christian soldiers belonging to this legion, which had returned to its winter quarters in Cappadocia; and he introduced it, either in an apology addressed to this emperor, or in other apologetical works. Tertullian refers to a letter of the emperor, addressed probably to the Roman Senate, in which he owns that the deliverance was due to the Christian soldiers. But this letter, if it contained, in so many words, a statement of this sort, must, as appears evident from the above remarks, have been either a spurious or interpolated one. It may be a question, however, whether the letter contained any distinct affirmation of this sort,—whether the emperor may not have spoken simply of soldiers, and Tertullian explained it, according to his own belief of Christian soldiers. He expresses himself, at any rate, with some degree of hesitation. How the Christians might possibly sometimes interpret the religious profession of the heathens according to the principles of their own faith, is shown by another account of this event, which we find in Tertullian. It is in these words: 'Marcus Aurelius, in the German expedition also, obtained, through the prayers offered to God by Christian soldiers, showers of rain, during that time of thirst. When has not the land been delivered from drought, by our geniculations and fasts? In such cases, the very people, when they cried to the God of gods, who alone is mighty, gave our God the glory, under the name of Jupiter.'

LEGISTS. See DECRETISTS.

LEIBNITZ (PHILOSOPHY OF). This eminent German metaphysician was born at Leipzig in 1648, and died in 1716. His philosophy was throughout a system of pure idealism. (See IDEALISTS.) Spirit was divorced from matter, soul from body, and the sole principle of connection between the two was that of a pre-established harmony, which enabled them mysteriously to move in concert without influencing each other. Change, therefore, whether occurring in matter or in mind, is caused not by an influence from without, but by an internal moving influence from within. Thought, therefore, while it corresponds with external objects and events by a universal law of harmony, is simply a consciousness of changes which are taking place in the soul itself. At the head of the whole system of Monads, which constitute the material and spiritual worlds, Leibnitz placed the Deity, whom he termed the Monad of Monads. Each of these monads is in some degree a mirror of the universe; all of them are acting spontaneously, for it is the property of all beings to act, and yet they are all of them subordinate to the order of the best possible universe, for Leibnitz regarded optimism as essential to the very notion of God. Thus liberty is in this system combined with necessity.

While Leibnitz sought to invent a philosophical system which should harmonize all the apparent discordances of the universe, he aimed also at a reconciliation between philosophy and Christianity, in opposition to the sceptical dualism of Bayle, against whom he wrote his Theodicée. He held with Des Cartes and Spinoza, that clearness is the measure of truth. The true, he alleged to be that which does not contradict itself, and that for which a sufficient reason can be adduced. The first principle proves the possibility, and the second the reality. The first is the criterion of necessary matter, and the second of contingent matter.

Leibnitz, however, though he laid down several important principles, had been prevented from reducing the whole to a regular system. This task was reserved for Christian Wolff, his distinguished correspondent and friend, who, on the death of his master, was regarded as the most eminent expositor of the Leibnitzian philosophy. While professing to follow in the footsteps of his great predecessor,

Wolff considerably modified the system of monads, so as to establish a decided difference between matter and mind in their real essence; and while he retained the theory of pre-established harmony, he confined it to the mutual influence of soul and body. In conducting his philosophical researches, this distinguished commentator on Leibnitz adopted the geometrical method, and considered all truths as holding to each other relations analogous to those of numbers. Thus mathematical demonstration came to be applied to questions of pure metaphysics, and following the example of Wolff, a school arose which, though it flourished for a time, speedily gave way to a more rational method of handling metaphysical topics.

LE-KE, one of the Sacred Books of the Confucianists of China. It is the acknowledged guide to rites and manners, prescribing rules for all the relationships of life, and the established orders of society. See KING.

LEMURES, spirits of the dead, which were believed by the ancient Romans to return to the world, and annoy and torment the living, more especially in the darkness of the night. Certain ceremonies were resorted to annually on the 9th, 11th, and 13th of May, in order to avert the evils arising from the visits of these mischievous spectres. The master of the house rose at midnight, and going outside the door made certain signs. He then washed his hands in spring water, and turning round took black beans into his mouth, which he afterwards threw behind his back that the Lemures might gather them. He then uttered some words, again washed his hands, made a noise, and called to the spirits nine times to be gone. From this time they lost their power to do injury. On the three days set apart for these ceremonies, all the temples were shut, and it was accounted unlucky for women to marry not only during the three days of the Lemuralia, as they were called, but throughout the whole of the month of May.

LENÆA. See DIONYSIA.

LENÆUS, a surname of DIONYSUS (which see), as being the god of the Lenos or vintage.

LENT, a season of fasting which precedes the festival of Easter, and is supposed to have been introduced with the view of commemorating our Saviour's temptation, and his fasting forty days in the wilderness. At first it seems to have been a voluntary fast, continuing forty hours, corresponding to Friday and Saturday before Easter, and comprising the entire period during which our Redeemer lay in the grave. In process of time this fast underwent considerable changes, and from a voluntary it became a regularly prescribed fast, observed not by penitents and catechumens only, but by Christians generally. In the fifth and sixth centuries the fast was extended to thirty-six days. The four days which were afterwards added to make it forty days, were introduced either by Gregory the Great in the sixth century, or by Gregory II. in the eighth. This fast, styled the carnival, from caro vale, 'farewell desh,' began with Ash Wednesday, and ended with the Saturday before Easter, which was observed with great solemnity, and was denominated the great sabbath. The entire week before Easter was termed the Great week, and Passion week. The forty days of the Fast of Lent are sometimes accounted for by referring to the example of Moses, Elias, and our Lord, all of whom fasted forty days. The Fast of Lent does not include all the days between Ash-Wednesday and Easter, the Sundays not being counted because the Lord's Day has always been held as a festival, and not as a fast. See EASTER.

LEIPSIK CONFERENCE, a disputation which took place at Leipsic in 1631, between certain Lutheran and Reformed divines in Germany, with a view to the accomplishment of a union between the two churches. They discussed all the articles of the Augsburg Confession, to which the Reformed were ready to subscribe, and also set forth a formula of union, or rather an exposition of the articles in controversy. The Conference, however, led to no satisfactory result.

LEIPSIK DISPUTATION, a public discussion which was held at Leipsic in 1519, between John Eckius on the one side, and Carlstadt and Luther on the other. It began on the 27th of June, and continued till the 13th of July. During the first week Eckius and Carlstadt disputed respecting free-will. During the second week Eckius disputed with Luther respecting the primacy of the Pope. In the third week Eckius again disputed with Luther on repentance, purgatory, indulgences, and priestly absolution. The last three days were spent in disputations between Eckius and Carlstadt. The universities of Paris and Erfurt were proposed and accepted as judges of the disputation. Luther, however, reserved to himself the power of appeal from the universities to a council. But no decision was come to on the discussion, and every one commented on it according to his own feelings. "At Leipsic," said Luther, "there was great loss of time, but no seeking after truth." This important discussion, however, was not without fruit. The arguments of Luther, though they failed in convincing his opponent, sunk deep into the minds of not a few, who were simply present as hearers. Poliander, the secretary and friend of Eckius, was won over by this discussion to the cause of the Reformation. John Cellarius, a learned professor of Hebrew, who had been one of the most violent opponents of the Reformed doctrines, underwent a complete change in his religious views. Prince George of Anhalt, then only twelve years old, was so convinced by Luther's reasonings, that he fearlessly ranged himself on the side of the Gospel. The effect upon the minds of the students also was so strong, that great numbers of them repaired to Wittenberg that they might sit at the feet of Luther. The Leipsic disputation, however, accomplished, above all, a signal benefit to the cause of truth, in the holy impulse which it gave to Melancthon. "From that hour," says D'Aubigné, "his extensive learning bowed before the Word of God. He received the evangelical truth with the simplicity of a child; explained the doctrine of salvation with a grace and perspicuity that charmed all his hearers; and trod boldly in that path so new to him, for, said he, 'Christ will never abandon his followers.' Henceforward the two friends walked together, contending for liberty and truth,—the one with the energy of St. Paul, the other with the meekness of St. John. Luther has admirably expressed the difference of their callings. 'I was born,' said he, 'to contend on the field of battle with factions and with wicked spirits. This is why my works abound with war and tempests. It is my task to uproot the stock and the stem, to clear away the briars and underwood, to fill up the pools and the marshes. I am the rough woodman who has to prepare the way and smooth the road. But Philip advances quietly and softly; he tills and plants the ground; sows and waters it joyfully, according to the gifts that God has given him with so liberal a hand.'" The greatest effect of the discussion, however, was that which was produced on the mind of Luther himself. "The scales of scholastic theology," said he, "fell then entirely from before my eyes, under the triumphant presidency of Doctor Eck." The veil which the School and the Church had conjointly drawn before the sanctuary was rent for the reformer from top to bottom. Driven to new inquiries, he arrived at unexpected discoveries. With as much indignation as astonishment, he saw the evil in all its magnitude. Searching into the annals of the Church, he discovered that the supremacy of Rome had no other origin than ambition on the one hand, and ignorant credulity on the other. The narrow point of view under which he had hitherto looked upon the Church was succeeded by a deeper and more extended range. He recognised in the Christians of Greece and of the East true members of the Catholic Church; and instead of a visible chief, seated on the banks of the Tiber, he adored, as sole chief of the people of God, an invisible and eternal Redeemer, who, according to his promise, is daily in the midst of every nation upon earth, with all who believe in His name. The Latin Church was no longer in Luther's estimation the universal Church; he saw the narrow barriers of Rome fall down, and exulted in discovering beyond them the glorious dominions of Christ."

LEONES (Lat. lions), a name which, according to Porphyry, was given to the priests of Mithras among the ancient Persians.

LEONISTS, an appellation given sometimes to the WALDENSES (which see), because of their connection with Leona or Lyons in France.

LEOPARD-WORSHIP. The leopard is a formidable animal, and is held in great dread by the natives of different parts of Africa. It is all the more dreaded in consequence of a superstitious notion which prevails, particularly in Southern Guinea, that wicked men frequently metamorphose themselves into tigers, and commit all sorts of depredations without the liability or possibility of being killed. Large villages are sometimes abandoned by their inhabitants, because they are afraid to attack these animals on account of their supposed supernatural powers. In Dahomey this animal is accounted so sacred that if any one should kill it, he would be held to have committed sacrilege, and would be offered up in sacrifice to propitiate the offended god. The people of that country look upon the leopard as representing the supreme god, whom they call Seh, worshipping him with the utmost reverence. Should any man be killed by a leopard, his relatives, instead of lamenting over the event, rejoice that he has been taken, as they believe, to the land of good spirits; and in token of their satisfaction, they treat the animal with the utmost kindness. Leopards seem to have abounded in Egypt, as on the monuments the priests offering incense are usually clothed in a leopard's skin. Sir John G. Wilkinson tells us that this leopard-skin dress was worn on all the principal solemnities, and that the king himself adopted it on similar occasions.

LERNÆA, mysteries celebrated at Lerna in Argolis, in honour of DEMETER (which see).

LESSONS, portions of Scripture appointed in many churches to be read in the course of Divine service. In the ancient Jewish church the reading of the Old Testament Scriptures formed a most important part of the worship of the synagogue. The Books of Moses were divided for this purpose into fifty-four sections, corresponding to the Sabbaths in a year, one being allowed for their intercalated years in which there might be fifty-four Sabbaths. These sections were read successively one on each Sabbath. When a less number of Sabbaths occurred in a year, two sections were read together as one on the last Sabbath, so that the whole Pentateuch might be read in the course of a year. Selections were also made from the historical and prophetic books, which received the general name of the Prophets. One of these selections was read every Sabbath-day along with the corresponding portion of the Law. Hence in Acts xiii. 15, we find the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia reading the Law and the Prophets. In the early Christian church the reading of the Scriptures was an essential part of public worship, at which all persons were allowed to be present. The portions read were partly taken from the Old Testament, and partly from the New. Justin Martyr is the first who mentions the reading of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles together with the Scriptures of the Old Testament. This writer also mentions a special officer in the church called a Reader, whose duty it was to read the Scriptures, after which an exhortation or exposition bearing on the passages read was delivered by the minister.

The Apostolical Constitutions enjoin the reading of the Scriptures as an important part of public worship. At first there was no established order for the reading of them, but afterwards the bishop appointed the lessons. Even as late as the fourth and fifth centuries, instances occur of such appointments by the bishop. "The earliest division of the New Testament," says Coleman, "was into the gospels and the epistles, corresponding to the law and the prophets of the Jewish scriptures. This division appears in the writings of Tertullian and Irenæus, and must, accordingly, have been anterior to their time. The reading was directed according to this division, one lesson from each being read alternately. Between the reading of these Psalms were sung, or selections from the Old Testament were read. When there was nothing peculiar to direct the reading, the scriptures were read consecutively, according to their established order; but this order was interrupted on their festivals, and other occasions. At Easter the account of the resurrection was read from each of the evangelists successively. The season of Pentecost, from Easter to Whitsuntide, was set apart for the reading of the Acts of the Apostles. The Western church connected with this the reading of the Epistles and of the Apocalypse. During Lent Genesis was read; and as early as the third century the book of Job was read in Passion-week. In a word, though we have no complete order of the lessons read through the year, it is to be presumed that the reading was directed by an established rule and plan, especially on all the principal festivals and solemnities of the church."

At the close of the lesson in the ancient church, the audience knelt down and prayed in some such words as these, "Lord have mercy upon us." The reading began and closed with a set form. Cyprian alleges that the reader saluted the audience by saying, "Peace be with you." This, however, was afterwards used only by the presbyter or bishop at the commencement of public worship, and before the sermon. It was customary for the reader to awaken attention at the outset by saying, "Thus saith the Lord," in the Lesson from the Old Testament or from the Gospels, or "Beloved brethren, in the Epistles it is written." At the close of the Lesson the people frequently responded by saying, "Amen," or "We thank thee, Lord," "We thank thee, O Christ." This custom, however, gave rise to so many abuses, that the people were forbidden to respond, and the minister closed the reading of the Epistles by saying, "Blessed be God," and that of the Evangelists by saying, "Glory be to thee, O Lord." At first the reading was performed from the AMBO (which see), but afterwards the Gospel and the Epistle, out of reverence for these parts of Scripture, were read, the former on the right hand, and the latter on the left of the altar. It was the duty of the subdeacon to read or chant the Epistles; and of the deacon to rehearse the Gospels. The apostolical constitutions recom-

ment both minister and people to stand during the reading of the Gospels, while, during the reading of other portions of the Scripture, they sat. Particular Lessons from the Gospels and Epistles were read on certain Sabbaths and festival days. These special Lessons were termed Pericopæ. Their origin has been much disputed among the learned. Some have traced them to apostolic times; others allege that they originated in the fourth century; while others still trace them back no farther than the eighth century.

The arrangements of the Church of England, in reference to the Lessons appointed to be read in public worship, are thus described by Dr. Hook: "For all the first Lessons on ordinary days, she directs to begin at the beginning of the year with Genesis, and so continue till the books of the Old Testament are read over, only omitting Chronicles, which are for the most part the same with the books of Samuel and Kings; and other particular chapters in other books, either because they contain the names of persons, places, or other matters less profitable to ordinary readers. The course of the first Lessons for Sundays is regulated after a different manner: from Advent to Septuagesima Sunday, some particular chapters of Isaiah are appointed to be read, because that book contains the clearest prophecies concerning Christ. Upon Septuagesima Sunday Genesis is begun; because that book, which treats of the fall of man, and the severe judgment of God inflicted on the world for sin, best suits with a time of repentance and mortification. After Genesis follow chapters out of the books of the Old Testament, as they lie in order; only on festival Sundays, such as Easter, Whitsunday, &c., the particular history relating to that day is appointed to be read; and on the Saints' days the Church appoints Lessons out of the moral books, such as Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, &c., and also from the Apocrypha, as containing excellent instructions for the conduct of life. As to the second Lessons, the Church observes the same course both on Sundays and week-days; reading the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles in the morning, and the Epistles in the evening, in the order they stand in the New Testament; excepting on Saints' days and Holy-days, when such Lessons are appointed as either explain the mystery, relate the history, or apply the example to us." Thus the Scripture Lessons are arranged throughout the year with a view to the reading of all Scripture publicly or privately, according to the calendar, and the Lessons for Sabbath are such as to afford continuous Scriptural instruction, and to lead the worshipper to the personal reading of the Bible for his own edification.

In the Romish missal each mass has two Scripture Lessons; the one called 'the Epistle,' and the other 'the Gospel.' The Lessons from the apostolic epistles are generally much shorter than from the gospels. The Scripture Lessons of the church of Rome are, for the most part, taken from the Vulgate version, the version of Jerome. In the Breviary or Prayer-Book of the Romish priests, there are selections given from Scripture by way of Lessons, which, however, are neither continuous nor complete, though the theory of the Breviary, undoubtedly, is that all Scripture should be read through in the course of a year.

LETHE, the personification of oblivion among the ancient Greeks and Romans. They gave also the name of Lethe to a river in the infernal regions. See HELL.

LETHON, the goddess of childbearing, known by various names among ancient heathen nations. She was worshipped by the Greeks under the name of Artemis, while the Scythians termed her Tomyris, and at a later period she was admitted into the mythology of Egypt under the name of Lethon. She is supposed to have been identical with the Latona of the Romans. In Egypt this goddess was represented by a frog, probably on account of its prolific power; but soon afterwards she was worshipped under the name of Buto, and was thought to have the power of driving away frogs. On the monuments she is sometimes called Tene, and also Buto, and at other times, in a compound form, Tene-Buto. At first she appears with the head of a frog, and afterwards with the head of a vulture, and armed with a bow and arrows.

LETHIRA, now Leir, in the island of Zealand, the city of the gods among the ancient Danes. This was the holy place where the nation assembled to offer up their sacrifices, to present their prayers, and to receive the choicest blessings from the gods.

LETO, the wife of Zeus, by whom she was the mother of Apollo and Artemis. She was only worshipped in conjunction with her children. Hera being jealous of her, as being a favourite of Zeus, procured her expulsion from heaven, and having been changed into a quail, she found a resting-place in Delos, where her children were born, and she and they were afterwards worshipped.

LETTERS OF ORDERS. When a bishop in England ordains a clergyman, either as a priest or deacon, he gives him a certificate which is termed Letters of Orders. Churchwardens are entitled to demand a sight of these letters when any one offers to officiate in a parish church.

LEUCÆUS, a surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped at Lepreus in Elis.

LEUCOPETRIANS, a class of people in connection with the Greek church, who adopted the views of Leucopetrus, which proceeded on an allegorical interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures.

LEUCOPHRYNE, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at Leucophrys in Phry-gia, where she had a temple, as well as at Magnesia, on the Mæander.

LEVANA (from levare, to raise), a Roman goddess, who presided over the rearing of new-born children.

LEVIRATE, a law among the ancient Hebrews, in virtue of which, when a man died without issue, it became the duty of his next surviving brother to marry his widow, with the view of raising up a first-born son to succeed to the inheritance. Michaelis derives the name from an old Latin word levir, which is said to signify a husband's brother. The law was more ancient than the time of Moses, having been in operation in Palestine among the Canaanites and the ancestors of the Israelites. Moses indeed, in Lev. xviii. 16, explicitly forbids a man to marry his brother's wife, but he lays down an important exception to this law in Deut. xxv. 5—10, and the reason of this exception was, that families and inheritances might be preserved unbroken until the coming of Messiah. The law, as it previously existed, was not changed by Moses, but simply modified in various respects. Thus he expressly prohibited the marriage of a brother's widow, if there were children of his own alive. He, no doubt, allowed, and, indeed, enjoined the brother to marry the widow of his childless brother, but if he was disinclined to take such a step, he was not to be compelled to do so, but had only to declare in court that he had no inclination to marry his brother's widow, and then he was at liberty. But if the brother did not choose to marry her, she was not allowed to marry another man until he had first set her at liberty. This ceremony of giving a brother's widow leave to marry again is called CALIZA (which see), or the loosing of the shoe. When there were several brothers, the Mishna states, that if the eldest refused, application must be made to each of the younger brothers, and if none of them would comply, the eldest was to be compelled either to marry the widow, or to submit to the indignity involved in the Caliza. By the Gemara, both the obligation and the liberty of marrying the wife of a deceased brother, are restricted to the eldest of the surviving brothers. Among the modern Jews, the rabbies invariably enjoin their disciples to refuse compliance with the precept, and nothing remains of the original institution except the ceremony of releasing both parties from a connection which is never permitted to be formed.

LEVITES, the descendants of Levi, the son of Judah, and forming one of the twelve tribes of Israel. Not having joined in the worship of the golden calf, they received the high honour of being chosen by Jehovah to be the priests of the Hebrews instead of the first-born. From the tribe of Levi, Aaron and his posterity were consecrated to the office of the priesthood. The high-priest ranked as the head both of the priests and Levites. The other Levites discharged inferior religious duties, but for the more menial employments they were allowed servants.

It would appear from Numb. viii. 5—22, that in the first instance the Levites were solemnly separated from the rest of the Israelites, and set apart for their special sacred duties by a peculiar ceremony. Having washed and shaved the whole body, they brought a bullock, with a meat-offering and oil, to the altar for a burnt-offering, and another bullock for a sin-offering. Moses then sprinkled them with water, after which the chief of the Israelites laid their hands upon them, and thus consecrated them to the work of the Lord. The Levites, in the presence of the people, prostrated themselves before God in token of entire surrender of themselves to his service. Rising from the ground they laid hands upon the bullocks, and then slew them. Such were the ceremonies attending the consecration of the whole body of the Levites. They were not enjoined to wear any particular dress, but in the time of David those who removed the ark were dressed in white robes.

The duties of the Levites consisted in giving to the priests all necessary assistance in the discharge of their duties, and in keeping guard round the Tabernacle, and afterwards round the Temple. When journeying through the wilderness, it was the office of the Levites to carry the Tabernacle and all its sacred utensils. They had the charge of the sacred revenues, and purchased all needful supplies of wine, oil, frankincense, and other articles used for religious purposes. In the more recent periods of the Jewish state, they slew the victims for the altar, and after the time of David they seem to have acted as singers and players on instruments in the Temple. The Levites were divided into three families, the Kohathites, the Gershonites, and the Merarites, each of whom bore different parts of the Tabernacle and its furniture during the journey through the wilderness. The laborious duties which devolved upon the Levites were only discharged between the ages of thirty and fifty, while the lighter duties were performed between twenty five and thirty, or beyond the age of fifty. In later times they commenced the performance of the easier duties at twenty years of age.

From the date of the building of the Temple an entire change took place in the arrangements made as to the duties of the Levites. They were calculated to amount to 38,000, and were divided into four classes; 24,000 being set apart to assist the priests, 4,000 as porters, 4,000 musicians, and 6,000 judges and genealogists. On the division of the land of Canaan, the Levites had forty-eight cities assigned to them as places of residence, thirteen of which were appropriated to the priests, along with the tithes of corn, fruit, and cattle. The Levites paid to the priests the tenth part of all their tithes.

In the ancient Christian church the deacons were sometimes called by the name of Levites, to show the harmony which existed between the Jewish and Christian churches, the bishop corresponding to the high-priest, the presbyters to the priests, and the deacons to the Levites.

LHA-SSA-MOROU, a festival observed annually by the Lamas of Thibet on the third day of the first moon. It is thus described by the Abbé Hue: "All the Buddhist monasteries of the province of Oni open their doors to their numerous inhabitants, and you see great bodies of Lamas, on foot, on horse-back, on asses, on oxen, and carrying their prayer-books and cooking utensils, arriving tumultuously by all the roads leading to Lha-Ssa. The town is soon overwhelmed at all points, by these avalanches of Lamas, pouring from all the surrounding mountains. Those who cannot get lodgings in private houses, or in public edifices, encamp in the streets and squares, or pitch their little travelling tents in the country. The Lha-Ssa-Morou lasts six entire days. During this time, the tribunals are closed, the ordinary course of justice is suspended, the ministers and public functionaries lose in some degree their authority, and all the power of the government is abandoned to this formidable army of Buddhist monks. There prevails in the town an inexpressible disorder and confusion. The Lamas run through the streets in disorderly bands, uttering frightful cries, chanting prayers, pushing one another about, quarrelling, and sometimes having furious contests with their fists. Although the Lamas generally show little reserve or modesty during these festive days, it is not to be supposed that they go to Lha-Ssa merely to indulge in amusements incompatible with their religious character; it is devotion, on the contrary, which is their chief motive. Their purpose is to implore the blessing of the Talé-Lama, and to make a pilgrimage to the celebrated Buddhist monastery called Morou, which occupies the centre of the town. Hence the name of Lha-Ssa-Moron given to these six festive days."

LIBAMINA, a name given by the ancient Romans to denote the bunch of hair which was cut from the forehead of a victim about to be sacrificed, and which was thrown into the fire as a kind of first-fruits.

LIBANOMANCY (Gr. libanos, frankincense, and manteia, divination), a species of divination, which was performed by throwing a quantity of frankincense into the fire, and observing the manner of its burning, and the smell which it emitted. If it burned quickly and sent forth an agreeable smell, the omen was favourable, but if the reverse happened, it was unfavourable.

LIBATION, a practice followed from early times of pouring liquors, generally wine, upon sacrificial victims. The quantity of wine used among the ancient Hebrews for a libation was the fourth part of a hin, or rather more than two pints, which were poured upon the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of it were laid upon the altar ready to be consumed by the flames. (See MENCHA.) Libations have among all heathen nations also formed a part of the sacrificial ritual, and no true worshipper presumed to touch the cup with his lips before the presiding divinity had his share. In regard to the ancient Egyptians, Sir J. G. Wilkinson says: "A libation of wine was frequently offered, together with incense; flowers were often presented with them; and many sacrifices consisted of oxen or other animals, birds, cakes, fruit, vegetables, ointments, and other things, with incense and libation. Wine was frequently presented in two cups. It was not then a libation, but merely an offering of wine; and since the pouring out of wine upon the altar was a preliminary ceremony, as Herodotus observes, common to all their sacrifices, we find that the king is often represented making a libation upon an altar covered with offerings of cakes, flowers, and the joints of a victim killed for the occasion. The Egyptian artists did not bind themselves to one instant of time in their representations of these subjects. The libation, therefore, appears to be poured over the mass of offerings collected upon the altar; but the knowledge of their mode of drawing, and the authority of Herodotus, explain that the libation was poured out before the offerings were placed upon it; and instances are even found in the sculptures of this preparatory ceremony. Two kinds of vases were principally used for libation, and the various kinds of wine were indicated by the names affixed to them."

Among the ancient heathens bloody sacrifices were usually accompanied with libations, which were performed by throwing wine and incense upon the flesh of the animal, while it was burning upon the altar. In forming a treaty with a foreign nation, libations always accompanied the sacrifices which were offered on such occasions. But libations were sometimes made independently altogether of sacrifices. Thus at entertainments it was customary to pour out a portion of wine as an offering of thanksgiving to the gods. The wine used in libations was always unmixd with water, but sometimes they consisted of milk, honey, and other fluids, either pure or diluted with water.

LIBELLATICI. In the persecution of the Christians by Decius Trajan, an edict was issued A. D. 250, requiring Christians to conform to the ceremonies of the pagan religion, and if they declined to sacrifice to the gods, threats and afterwards tortures were to be employed to compel submission. Many heathen magistrates, either from avarice or a desire to spare the Christians, exempted them from sacrificing, provided they purchased a certificate or libel as it was called, attesting that they had satisfactorily complied with the requisitions of the edict. Those who procured such a certificate received the name of Libellatici. See LAPSED CHRISTIANS.

LIBELLI PACIS (Lat. certificates of peace). In the persecutions under the Roman Emperors, it too often happened that Christians through fear of man denied the faith of Christ. Many persons in these circumstances finding themselves excluded from the privileges of the church, were seized with remorse, and eagerly longed for restoration to the fellowship of the faithful. In order to facilitate their re-admission, some resorted to individuals who had earned a high Christian character by their readiness to endure martyrdom for Christ's sake, and sought from them certificates of church fellowship, which they imagined would lead to their speedier recovery of their lost position among their fellow-Christians. These certificates granted by confessors to lapsed Christians, were called by the name of libelli pacis, and gave rise to a keen controversy, in which Cyprian took an active part.

LIBELLI PŒNITENTIALES (Lat. certificates of penitence), documents which came to be frequently issued in the eighth century by the Romish priesthood, granting immediate absolution to those who confessed their sins to the priest, and declared themselves ready to fulfil the appointed penance, even though they were not prepared to partake of the communion. At the time when great efforts were made for the improvement of the church, as was especially the case in the age of Charlemagne, it was a main object with the church reformers of the period to abolish the libelli pœnitentiales, which had led to so many corruptions, and to restore the primitive laws of the church to their proper authority and force.

LIBENTINA, a surname of Venus among the ancient Romans, as the patroness of licentiousness.

LIBER, the name used by the Roman poets to denote the Greek Dionysus or the Bacchus of their own prose writers. The name, however, properly belongs to an ancient Italian divinity, who, along with the corresponding goddess, Libera, presided over vineyards and fruitful fields. The worship of these two deities was often combined with that of Ceres; and all three had a temple at Rome, near the Circus Flaminius. Libera was considered by the Romans as identical with Cora or Persephone, the daughter of Demeter.

LIBERA. See LIBER.

LIBERALIA, a festival observed annually by the ancient Romans on the 17th of March, in honour of LIBER (which see). It was much more innocent and simple in its character than the Bacchanalia; and, accordingly, it continued to be celebrated at Rome after that festival was suppressed. On the day on which the Liberalia were held, a procession of priests and priestesses wearing ivy garlands, marched through the city bearing wine, honey, cakes, and sweetmeats, along with a portable altar, having in the middle of it a firepan in which sacrifices were burnt. On this joyful occasion the Roman youths, who had reached their sixteenth year, were invested with the toga virilis, or dress of manhood. Augustin complains that in his time the Liberalia were celebrated with no little immorality and licentiousness.

LIBERATOR, a surname of Jupiter, under which a temple was reared to him by Augustus on the Aventine hill.

LIBERTAS, a personification of liberty, worshipped as a goddess by the ancient Romans. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus built a temple to her honour on the Aventine hill.

LIBERTINES. In Acts vi. 9, we find mention made of a synagogue at Jerusalem belonging to a class of persons who are called Libertines. The word Libertini among the ancient Romans, denoted those persons who had been released from legal servitude; and it is not unlikely that the Libertines who had a synagogue at Jerusalem may have been slaves of Jewish origin, or proselytes after manumission. By Grotius, Vitringa, and other writers, they are supposed to have been the descendants of Jewish captives carried to Rome by Pompey and others, but who had obtained their liberty. That large numbers of such people existed at that time in Judea, is rendered highly probable from a passage which occurs in the second book of the Annals of Tacitus, where the historian, while he describes a certain class of persons as being of the race of Libertines or freedmen, and infecte^d, as he calls it, with foreign, that is with Jewish superstition, tells us at the same time that they were so numerous in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius, that four thousand of them, who were of age to carry arms, were sent to the island of Sardinia; and that all the rest of them were ordered either to renounce their religion, or to depart from Italy before a certain day. This statement of Tacitus, confirmed by Suetonius, enables us to account for the number of Libertines in Judea, and also for their having had a synagogue in Jerusalem at the period of which Luke was speaking, which was about fifteen years after their banishment from Italy by the edict of Tiberius.

LIBERTINES, a sect which arose in Flanders in the sixteenth century, calling themselves Spirituals. It was founded by certain persons of extravagant views, headed by Poequet and Quintin. Though originated in Flanders, the sect made its way into France, where it found favour with many of the Reformed, and more especially with Margaret, the queen of Navarre, and sister of Francis I. They held that God works all things in all men, or is the cause and author of all human actions, and, therefore, they maintained that the distinction which is commonly alleged between good and bad actions is unwarranted, immorality or sin being impossible. They taught that true religion consists in the union of the soul with God, and if any man shall succeed in attaining this by means of habitual contemplation on spiritual and divine things, he may thereafter implicitly follow the instincts of his own nature, and whatever he may do he will be free from sin in this world, and united to God in the world to come. Mosheim supposes this sect to have been descended from the Beghards, or from the Brethren of the Free Spirit, both of which flourished in Flanders in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Calvin devoted a special treatise to the exposure of the errors of the Libertines, which were spreading rapidly among the Reformed both in Flanders and in France. By his faithfulness, in pointing out the erroneous nature of their opinions, Calvin gave great offence to the queen of Navarre, who, though she had neither imbibed their sentiments nor joined their sect, was favourably inclined towards the leaders, whom she regarded as good men. As soon as the Reformer understood that his exposure of the Libertines had offended the royal lady who had conferred so many benefits upon the Church of Christ, he replied to her with great meekness and moderation, at the same time frankly censuring her imprudence in hospitably receiving men whose opinions were opposed to religion and sound morality, and not only so, but in admitting them to be authorized ministers of Christ. The Treatise of Calvin was successful in checking the progress of the Libertines in France, and limiting their influence to the country which gave them origin.

The sect which we have thus briefly described has sometimes been confounded with the Libertines of Geneva, with whom Calvin maintained an almost uninterrupted warfare throughout the whole of his ministerial life. The Genevan Libertines were not, however, speculative heretics like the Libertines of Flanders; they were practical infidels, who disliked the strictness of Calvin's discipline, as much if not more than his sound theology. From such men the stern and uncompromising Reformer received violent opposition, and even bitter persecution.

LIBETHRIDES, a name given to the Muses, derived, as some suppose, from a well called Libethra in Thrace, or as others think, from a mountain in Thrace, where there was a grotto sacred to the Nine.

LIBITINA, a goddess among the ancient Italians who presided over funeral rites. In later times she seems to have been identified with Persephone, probably in consequence of her connection with the interment of the dead. The temple of Libitina at Rome, contained every kind of article that was required at funerals. Probably from this circumstance these articles were called Libitina, but particularly the bed on which the dead body was burned; and the undertakers at funerals were called Libitinarii. In the Roman poets the word Libitina is often used for death. At the temple of this goddess a register was kept of the names of all who died, and a small registration fee was demanded.

LIBRA (Lat. a pound), a name applied formerly to the suffragans of the Bishop of Rome, because they amounted in number to seventy, being the number of solidi in a Roman Libra. These assessors of the Roman bishop constituted his provincial council.

LIBRI CAROLINI, a celebrated treatise which appeared A. D. 790, by way of protest against the decrees of the Second Nicene council in favour of IMAGE-WORSHIP (which see). It was published in the name of Charlemagne, but it is generally supposed that he was assisted in the preparation of the work by various theologians of his time, particularly by the famous English monk, Alcuin.

LIFTERS, a small sect in the West of Scotland in 1783, which held that the "lifting" of the elements before the consecration prayer as an essential part of the ordinance. See SMYTONIAN CONTROVERSY.

LIGHT (FRIENDS OF). These Lichtfreunde, as they are called in Germany, are a few independent rationalistic congregations in the Saxon province of Prussia. They owe their origin to the excitement caused between 1841 and 1848, by Ulich of Magdeburg, a preacher of eloquence and talent, but of the lowest religious views. These Friends of Light assumed a completely political aspect, and were bitter in their opposition to the Prussian government, but at length they were entirely swept away by the Revolution of 1848.

LIGHT (INWARD). See FRIENDS (SOCIETY OF).

LIGHT (OLD) ANTIBURGHERS. See OLD LIGHT ANTIBURGHERS.

LIGHT (OLD) BURGHERS. See OLD LIGHT BURGHERS.

LIGHTS (FEAST OF), a name applied by Josephus to the Jewish Feast of DEDICATION (which see).

LIGHTS (FEAST OF), an appellation given by the Greek church to the festival of EPIPHANY (which see), because on that day Jesus was baptized, and the ordinance of baptism is with them often called an Illumination.

LIGHTS IN BAPTISM. In the ancient Christian church the practice seems to have existed of the baptized, after the ceremony was ended, carrying lighted tapers in their hands. Gregory Nazianzen mentions this among other ceremonies as following the administration of baptism. "The station," says he, "when immediately after baptism thou shalt be placed before the altar, is an emblem of the glory of the life to come; the psalmody with which thou shalt be received is a foretaste of those hymns and songs of a better life; and the lamps which thou shalt light are a figure of those lamps of faith wherewith bright and virgin souls shall go forth to meet the bridegroom." Others suppose it to be an emblem of the illumination of the Spirit in baptism, and designed to be an allusion to our Saviour's words, "Let your light so shine before men, that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father which is in heaven." In the baptism of persons of high rank, it sometimes happened that not only the baptized parties themselves, but the whole of their retinue and attendants, were clothed in white garments, and carried lamps in their hands.

LIGHTS OF WALTON, a class of enthusiasts who appeared in the seventeenth century at Walton-on-Thames, Surrey, England. The story of the rise of this people is curious. In the beginning of Lent 1649, Mr. Fawcett, then minister of Walton, having preached in the afternoon, when he had concluded, it was nearly dark, and six soldiers came into the church, one with a lighted candle in a lantern, and four with candles unlighted. The first soldier addressed the people, declaring that he had been favoured with a vision, and had received a message from God, which they must listen to and believe on pain of damnation. This message consisted of five lights: 1. The Sabbath is abolished; and here, said he, "I should put out my first light, but the wind is so high that I cannot light it." 2. Tithes are abolished. 3. Ministers are abolished. 4. Magistrates are abolished, repeating the same concluding words as he had uttered under the first head. Then taking a Bible from his pocket, he declared that it also was abolished, as containing only beggarly elements, which were unnecessary now that Christ was come in his glory with a full measure of his Spirit. Then taking the lighted candle from his lantern, he set fire to the pages of the Bible, after which, extinguishing the candle, he added, "and here my fifth light is extinguished." This closed the scene on the Lights of Upton.

LIGHTS ON THE ALTAR. An ancient custom, we learn on the testimony of Jerome alone, existed in the Eastern churches of carrying lights before the Gospel when it was to be read. They lighted candles, he tells us, partly to demonstrate their joy for the good news which the Gospel brought, and partly by an outward symbol to represent that light of which the Psalmist speaks when he says, "Thy word is a light unto my feet, and a lamp unto my path." Though Jerome declares that in his time no such custom existed in the Western Church, it came at length to be the universal practice of that church to have lighted candles on the altar, as well as before pictures or images of the Virgin and other saints. In the reign of King Edward VI., we find the injunction issued in 1547, that "all deans, archdeacons, parsons, vicars, and other ecclesiastical persons, shall suffer from henceforth no torches nor candles, tapers or images of wax, to be set before any image or picture. But only two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament, which for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still." In the reign of Elizabeth, however, injunctions were given to the ecclesiastical visitors of 1559 to remove from the parish churches in England all crucifixes, relics, and lighted tapers, although her Majesty long retained in her own chapel both the crucifix and lighted tapers. Lights, however, still continued to be used on the altar in many of the parish churches in England, notwithstanding the prohibition, and at this day they are found in some churches, while the Tractarian party defend the practice by alleging that as no Act of Parliament or Act of Convocation ever repealed the injunction of Edward VI. in 1547, to which we have referred, it is still in force, and therefore, the practice of having two lights upon the altar is enjoined by the laws and sanctioned by the usage of the Church of England.

LIKNON, a long basket in which the image of Dionysus was carried in the festivals of ancient Greece, which were called Dionysia. The Liknon was the winnowing van into which the corn was received after thrashing, and therefore being connected with agriculture, it was naturally used in the rites of both Bacchus and Ceres. It was also employed to carry the instruments of sacrifice, and the first-fruits or other offerings.

LIKNOPHOROS, the person whose duty it was to carry the LIKNON (which see), in the Dionysiac processions. See CANEPHOROS.

LILITH, the first wife of Adam, according to Rabbinical tradition among the Jews. The strange story is thus related in Jewish legends. "When the blessed God created the first man, whom he formed alone, without a companion, he said, It is not good that the man should be alone: and therefore he created a woman also out of the ground, and named her Lilith. They immediately began to contend with each other for superiority. The man said: It behoves thee to be obedient; I am to rule over thee. The woman replied: We are on a perfect equality; for we were both formed out of the same earth. So neither would submit to the other. Lilith, seeing this, uttered the Shem hamphorash," that is, pronounced the name Jehovah, "and instantly flew away through the air. Adam then addressed himself to God, and said: Lord of the universe! the woman whom thou gavest me, has flown away from me. God immediately dispatched three angels, Sennoi, Sansennoi, and Sammangeloph, to bring back the fugitive: he said to them: If she consent to return, well; but if not, you are to leave her, after declaring to her that a hundred of her children shall die every day. These angels then pursued her, and found her in the midst of the sea, in the mighty waters in which the Egyptians were to be afterwards destroyed. They made known to her the divine message, but she refused to return. They threatened, unless she would return, to drown her in the sea. She then said: Let me go; for I was created for no other purpose than to debilitate and destroy young infants; my power over the males will extend to eight days, and over the females to twenty days, after their birth. On hearing this, the angels were proceeding to seize her and carry her back to Adam by force: but Lilith swore by the name of the living God, that she would refrain from doing any injury to infants, wherever and whenever she should find those angels, or their names, or their pictures, on parchment or paper, or on whatever else they might be written or drawn: and she consented to the punishment denounced against her by God, that a hundred of her children should die every day. Hence it is that every day witnesses the death of a hundred young demons of her progeny. And for this reason we write the names of these angels on slips of paper or parchment, and bind them upon infants, that Lilith, on seeing them, may remember her oath, and may abstain from doing our infants any injury." Another rabbinical writer says: "I have also heard that when the child laughs in its sleep in the night of the sabbath or of the new moon, the Lilith laughs and toys with it; and that it is proper for the father, or mother, or any one that sees the infant laugh, to tap it on the nose, and say, Hence, begone, cursed Lilith; for thy abode is not here. This should be said three times, and each repetition should be accompanied with a pat on the nose. This is of great benefit, because it is in the power of Lilith to destroy children whenever she pleases."

To the modern Jews, Lilith is an object of great dread, more especially when a child is about to be born, because they imagine that she has been transformed into a female demon, and takes delight in injuring and even destroying young children. Hence when a Jewish woman approaches the period of her confinement, the husband inscribes on each of the walls or partitions around the bed, along with the names of Adam and Eve in Hebrew characters, the words Chuts Lilith, that is, "begone Lilith." (See BIRTH.) On the inside of the doors also he writes the names of three angels, which it is believed will defend the child from the injuries which it might otherwise receive from Lilith.

LILY (SACRED). See LOTUS.

LIMA, a goddess among the ancient Romans, who protected the threshold of their houses.

LIMBUS INFANTUM, a place to which, according to some Romish divines, the souls of those children go who die without having been baptized, and where they endure the eternal punishment of loss, though not of sense. As no unbaptized child, according to their view, can enter heaven, this place will never be evacuated.

LIMBUS PATRUM, a place in which Roman Catholic divines allege the souls of the ancient patriarchs remained until the advent of Christ, who before his resurrection appeared to them, and opened for them an access to heaven. It is the same with paradise or Abraham's bosom. "It is in Scripture called 'hell,' or 'the lower parts of the earth.' (Psalm xvi. 10; Eph. iv. 9.) The Rhemish annotators, on Luke xvi. 22, describe it as follows:—"The bosom of Abraham is the resting-place of all them that died in perfect state of grace before Christ's time, heaven before being shut from men. It is called in Zachary "a lake without water," and sometimes "a prison," but most commonly of the Divines Limbus Patrum, for that it is thought to have been the higher part or brim of hell, the places of punishment being far lower than the same, which, therefore, he called Infernum Inferius, "the lower hell." Where this mansion of the Fathers stood, or whether it be any part of hell, Augustine doubteth; but that there was such a place, neither he nor any Catholic man ever doubted: as all the Fathers make it most certain, that our Saviour, descending to hell, went thither specially, and delivered the said Fathers out of that mansion.' Papists say that this place is now tenantless, as purgatory hereafter will also be." See PURGATORY.

LIMENIA, a surname of several ancient heathen deities, both male and female, such as Zeus, Artemis, Aphrodite, Priapus, and Pan.

LIMENTINUS, the god among the ancient Romans, who presided over the thresholds of their houses, to which they always attached a peculiar importance approaching to sacredness.

LIMINA MARTYRUM (Lat. thresholds of the martyrs), an expression sometimes used by Jerome to denote Christian churches.

LIMNATIDES, inferior divinities who presided over lakes in the ancient heathen mythology.

LIMNETES, a surname of several deities among the ancient heathens, as for example, Dionysus at Athens, and Artemis at Sicyon.

LIMUS, an article of dress worn around the loins by the ancient Roman papa, or officiating priest at the sacrifices.

LIMUS, a Grecian god corresponding to the Roman Fames, the personification of Hunger. According to Hesiod, Limus was sprung from Eris; and Virgil places Fames among the monsters at the entrance of the infernal regions.

LINDIA, a surname of Athena, derived from a town of the same name in Rhodes, where a temple was erected to her honour.

LINEA, an article of clerical dress, mentioned in the Life of Cyprian, the precise nature of which is not known. Baronius conjectures it to have been the bishop's rochet, but of this there is no proof, and the only thing that can be said is, that it was probably some garment made of linen.

LINGA, the emblem of the fertility and productiveness of nature, being one of the principal forms, and indeed almost the only form, under which Shiva has been worshipped in Hindustan for at least a thousand years past. It is perhaps the most ancient object of worship adopted in India posterior to the period of the Vedas, which inculcate almost exclusively the worship of the elements, particularly fire. It is doubtful how far the Vedas sanction the worship of the Linga, but it forms the chief subject of several of the Puranas. According to Creuzer, the Trimurti as the first element in the faith of the Hindus, and the second was the Linga. The extent to which the Linga-worship prevails throughout India is thus noticed by Professor H. H. Wilson in the 'Asiatic Researches':—"Its prevalence throughout the whole tract of the Ganges, as far as Benares, is sufficiently conspicuous. In Bengal, the temples are commonly erected in a range of six, eight, or twelve, on each side of a Ghat, leading to the river. At Kahua is a circular groupe of one hundred and eight temples, erected by the Raja of Bardwan. Each of the temples in Bengal consists of a single chamber, of a square form, surmounted by a pyramidal centre; the area of each is very small, the Linga, of black or white marble, occupies the centre; the offerings are presented at the threshold. Benares, however, is the peculiar seat of this form of worship: the principal deity, Visweswara, is a Linga, and most of the chief objects of the pilgrimage are similar blocks of stone. Particular divisions of the pilgrimage direct visiting forty-seven Lingas, all of pre-eminent sanctity; but there are hundreds of inferior note still worshipped, and thousands whose fame and fashion have passed away. If we may believe Siva, indeed, he counted a hundred Parārdhyas in Kasi, of which, at the time he is supposed to tell this to Devi, he adds sixty crore, or six hundred millions, were covered by the waters of the Ganges. A Parārdhya is said, by the commentator on the Kasi Khanda in which this dialogue occurs, to contain as many years of mortals as are equal to fifty of Brahma's years."

There can be no doubt of the universality of this species of worship at the period of the Mohammedan invasion of India in the eleventh century. At that time there were twelve great Lingas set up in various parts of India, several of which were destroyed by the early Mohammedan conquerors. One of them, demolished by Mahmud of Ghizni, was a block of stone of four or five cubits long, and proportionate thickness. It was called the idol of Somnath, which was said by some historians to have been carried from the Kaaba on the coming of Mohammed, and transported to India. The Brahmanical records, however, refer it to the time of Krishna, implying an antiquity of 4,000 years,—a statement which must be considered as savouring of Oriental exaggeration. It is very probable, however, that the worship of Shiva, under the type of the Linga, prevailed throughout India as early as the fifth or sixth century of the Christian era.

One of the forms in which the Linga worship appears is that of the Lingayets, Lingavants, or JANGAMAS (which see), the essential characteristic of which is wearing the emblem on some part of the dress or person. The type is of a small size, made of copper or silver, and is commonly worn suspended in a case round the neck, or in the turban. The morning devotions of the worshippers of the Linga, as an emblem of Shiva, is thus described by Dr. Duff in his 'India and India Mission': "After ascending from the waters of the river, they distribute themselves along the muddy banks. Each then takes up a portion of clay, and, beginning to mould it into the form of the Lingam, the symbol of his tutelary deity, devoutly says, 'Reverence to Hara (a name of Shiva), I take this lump of clay.' Next addressing the clay, he says, 'Shiva, I make thy image. Praise to Salpani (Shiva, the holder of the trisula, or trident). O god, enter into this image; take life within it. Constant reverence to Mahesa (Shiva), whose form is radiant as a mountain of silver, lovely as the crescent of the moon, and resplendent with jewels; having four hands, two bearing weapons (the mace and the trident), a third conferring blessing, and the fourth dispelling fear; serene, lotus-seated, worshipped by surrounding deities, and seated on a tiger's skin. Reverence to the holder of the pinaca (a part of the Lingam). Come, O come! vouchsafe thy presence, vouchsafe thy presence: approach, rest, and tarry here. The Lingam, or symbol of Shiva, being now formed, he presents to it water from the Ganges, and various offerings, saying, 'Lave thy body in the Ganges, O lord of animals. I offer thee water to wash thy feet. Praise to Shiva. 'Take water to wash thy hands; smell this sandal-wood; take these flowers and leaves; accept this incense, and this flame; consume this offering of mine (consisting of plantains, cucumbers, oranges, plums, and other fruits); take one more draught of this stream; raise thy mouth, and now take betel-nut' (with various other roots and vegetables). He then worships, rehearsing the names and attributes of the god; and offers flowers all round the image, commencing from the east,—adding, 'Receive, O Shiva, these offerings of flowers. I also present these fragrant flowers to thy consort, Durga. Thus do I worship thee.' As an act of merit, he repeats, as often as he can, the names of Shiva; counting the number of times on his fingers. Again and again he worships and bows, beating his cheeks, and uttering the mystical words, bom, bom. He last of all throws the flowers into the water, prays to Shiva to grant him temporal favours and blessings; twines his fingers one into the other; places the image once more before him; and then flings it away." It may at first view appear inconsistent that Shiva, the god of destruction, should be worshipped under an emblem denoting life-giving productiveness, but this is explained by referring to the doctrine of Metempsychosis, which is a prominent feature of Hinduism, and according to which, to destroy is only to regenerate in a new form. The Linga was venerated also among the ancient Greeks and Romans under a different name. See PHALLUS.

LION-WORSHIP. In all ages the lion has been looked upon as the noblest of animals, the king of the forest, the most powerful of the beasts of prey. We find very frequent references to this animal in the Old Testament Scriptures. It was the symbol of the tribe of Judah, and in the writings of the Jewish prophets it is frequently introduced to give force and significance to their figurative language. There is the most satisfactory evidence that the lion anciently inhabited the deserts of Egypt, though it is no longer found there. To what extent it was an object of worship in Egypt may be seen from the following remarks of Sir J. G. Wilkinson: "The worship of the lion was particularly regarded in the city of Leontopolis; and other cities adored this animal as the emblem of more than one deity. It was the symbol of strength, and therefore typical of the Egyptian Hercules. With this idea, the Egyptian sculptors frequently represented a powerful and victorious monarch, accompanied by it in battle, though, as Diodorus says of Osymandyas, some suppose the king to have been really attended by a tame lion on these occasions. Macrobius, Proclus, Horapollon, and others, state that the lion was typical of the sun: an assertion apparently borne out by the sculptures, which sometimes figure it borne upon the backs of two lions. It is also combined with other emblems appertaining to the god Rê. In the connexion between the lion and Hercules may be traced the relationship of the sun and the god of strength.

"Macrobius pretends that the Egyptians employed the lion to represent that part of the heavens where the sun, during its annual revolution, was in its greatest force, 'The sign Leo being called the abode of the sun;' and the different parts of this animal are reputed by him to have indicated various seasons, and the increasing or decreasing ratio of the solar power. The head he supposes to have denoted the 'present time,' which Horapollon interprets as the type of vigilance: and the fire of its eyes was considered analogous to the fiery look which the sun constantly directs towards the world. In the temple of Dakkeh, the lion is represented upon the shrine or sacred table of the ibis, the bird of Hermes; and a monkey, the emblem of the same deity, is seen praying to a lion with the disk of the sun upon its head. Some also believed the lion to be sacred to the Egyptian Minerva; and Ælian says the Egyptians consecrated it to Vulcan, 'attributing the fore part of this animal to fire, and the hinder parts to water.' Sometimes the lion, the emblem of strength, was adopted as a type of the king, and substituted for the more usual representation of royal power, the sphinx; which, when formed by the human head and lion's body, signified the union of intellectual and physical strength. In Southern Ethiopia, in the vicinity of the modern town of Shendy, the lion-headed deity seems to have been the chief object of worship. He holds a conspicuous place in the great temple of Wady Owateb, and on the sculptured remains at Wady Benat; at the former of which he is the first in a procession of deities, consisting of Rê, Neph, and Ptah, to whom a monarch is making offerings. On the side of the propyæum tower is a snake with a lion's head and human arms, rising from a lotus; and in the small temple at the same place, a god with three lions' heads and two pair of arms, holds the principal place in the sculptures. This last appears to be peculiarly marked as a type of physical strength; which is still further expressed by the choice of the number three, indicative of a material or physical sense. The lion also occurs in Ethiopia, devouring the prisoners, or attacking the enemy, in company with a king, as in the Egyptian sculptures. According to Plutarch, 'the lion was worshipped by the Egyptians, who ornamented the doors of their temples with the gaping mouth of that animal, because the Nile began to rise when the sun was in the constellation of Leo.' Horapollon says, lions were placed before the gates of the temples, as the symbols of watchfulness and protection. And 'being a type of the inundation, in consequence of the Nile rising more abundantly when the sun is in Leo, those who anciently presided over the sacred works, made the water-spouts and passages of fountains in the form of lions.' The latter remark is in perfect accordance with fact,—many water-spouts terminating in lions' heads still remaining on the temples. Ælian also says, that 'the people of the great city of Heliopolis keep lions in the vestibules or areas of the temple of their god (the sun), considering them to partake of a certain divine influence, according to the statements of the Egyptians themselves, and temples are even dedicated to this animal.'

"The figure of a lion, or the head and feet of that animal, were frequently used in chairs, tables, and various kinds of furniture, and as ornamental devices. The same idea has been common in all countries, and in the earliest specimens of Greek sculpture. The lions over the gate of Mycenæ are similar to many of those which occur on the monuments of Egypt. No mummies of lions have been found in Egypt. They were not indigenous in the country, and were only kept as curiosities, or as objects of worship. In places where they were sacred, they were treated with great care, being 'fed with joints of meat, and provided with comfortable and spacious dwellings, particularly in Leontopolis, the city of lions; and songs were sung to them during the hours of their repast.' The animal was even permitted to exercise its natural propensity of seizing its prey, in order that the exercise might preserve its health, for which purpose a calf was put into the enclosure. And having killed the victim thus offered to it, the lion retired to its den, probably without exciting in the spectators any thought of the cruelty of granting this indulgence to their favourite animal."

Mithras, which is a solar god, was represented with a lion's head. In his mysteries the second degree was that of the lion. At a later period the armorial bearings of Persia have been a lion with the sun rising on its back, and the Shah distributes to his most honoured servants the order of the lion. Adad, the god of the Syrians, was seated upon the back of a lion, which represents his solar nature. In South America the first discoverers found at Tabasco an image of a lion, to which the natives offered human sacrifices, whose blood flowed into a reservoir, on the margin of which stood the statue of a man in stone, who was represented looking attentively at the blood.

Dr. Livingstone, in his 'Travels in Africa,' mentions a tribe who believe that the souls of their chiefs enter into lions, and, therefore, they never attempt to kill them; they even believe that a chief may metamorphose himself into a lion, kill any one he chooses, and then return to the human form; therefore, when they see one, they commence clapping their hands, which is their usual mode of salutation.

LITÆ, a personification of the prayers of penitence among the ancient Greeks. Homer mentions them as being daughters of Zeus.

LITANIES. This word was anciently used to denote all kinds of prayers, whether offered publicly in the church, or privately by individuals. Eusebius and Chrysostom, as well as other early writers, use it in this general sense. In a law made by Arcadius, in the fourth century, against Arians, that heretical sect was forbidden to make Litanies within the city, either by night or by day, evidently referring to the whole exercises of their religious assemblies, including hymns and psalmody, as well as prayers. Special prayers, under the name of Litanies, appear to have been used in the Eastern Church in the fourth and fifth centuries; while in the Western Church such prayers received the name of Rogations, which was afterwards exchanged for that of Litanies.

In this limited sense, Litanies are said to have been first introduced by Mamercus, bishop of Vienna, in France, about the year 450. It is probable, however, that they were in use before his time, and that the merit of the French bishop consisted in the application of them to Rogation days. The first council of Orleans, A. D. 511, established three days of solemn fasting, and ordered them to be kept with Rogations or Litanies. In the Spanish churches decrees in regard to the use of Litanies were passed by several councils of Toledo; and in A. D. 694, the seventeenth council held in that city ordained that Litanies should be used in every month throughout the year. By degrees they became more frequent, and at length these solemn supplications were employed on Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient stationary days in all churches.

Litanies were divided into two classes in former times, the Greater and the Lesser Litany. The Greater Litany was originated by Gregory the Great, who appointed it for the twenty-fifth day of April, under the name of the seven-formed Litany, because on that day he ordered the church to go in procession in seven distinct classes; first, the clergy, then the laymen, next the monks, after them the virgins, then the married women, next the widows, and last of all the poor and the children. French writers allege that the Litany of Mamercus, and not that of Gregory, was termed the Great Litany. As to the Lesser Litany, Bingham conjectures it to have been simply the Kyrie Eleison, or Lord have mercy upon us, which short form of supplication was used in all churches, and as a part of all their daily offices. The Greater Litany was sometimes termed EXOMOLOGESIS (which see).

It occasionally happened, as early as the time of Chrysostom, that the Christians went barefoot in processions into the open fields, where they made their Litanies, carrying crosses upon their shoulders as the badge of their profession. The laws of Justinian expressly appointed that these Litanies should not be celebrated without the bishop or the clergy, and that the people on these occasions should be dressed in a simple and plain manner. In the Litanies of the ancient church no prayers or invocations were made to saints or angels as in the modern Litanies of the Romish church.

The Litany of the Church of England, though not copied from any ancient form, is evidently of great antiquity. At one time it formed a distinct service, but afterwards it was combined with the morning prayer, though occupying a separate place in the Prayer-Book. Formerly it was appointed by the rubric that, "after morning prayer, the people being called together by the ringing of a bell, and assembled in the church, the English Litany shall be said after the accustomed manner," and it was also required that "every householder, dwelling within half a mile of the church, should come, or send some one at the least of his household, fit to join with the minister in prayers." The practice was formerly observed, and, indeed, still exists in some English churches, of holding morning prayer at eight o'clock, and the Litany and communion at ten.

LITAOLANÆ. The Bechuanas in South Africa have a curious tradition, that a monster of an immense size, at a very remote period of time, swallowed up all mankind, with the exception of a single woman, who conceived miraculously, and brought forth a son, to whom she gave the name of Litao-lanæ. This progeny of the woman attacked the monster, who swallowed him up alive, but being armed with a knife, he cut open an outlet for himself from the belly of the monster, and thus he and all the nations of the earth in him obtained deliverance. But though rescued from death, men sought to destroy their deliverer, who, however, defies all their threats. In this tradition there seems to be a remote allusion to the Deluge, and also to the Messiah.

LITERÆ CLERICÆ (Lat. clerical letters), a name given by Cyprian to letters written by a bishop in ancient times to a foreign church, and which were sent by the hands of one of the clergy, usually a subdeacon.

LITERÆ FORMATÆ (Lat. formed letters), letters of credence given by a bishop or pastor in the early Christian church, to such members of the church as proposed to travel to foreign countries. They were called Formatæ, or formed, because they were written in a peculiar form, with some particular marks or characters, so that they could be easily distinguished from counterfeits. It was the sole prerogative of the bishop to grant these letters, which were generally of three kinds:—1. Commendatory Letters, those which were granted to persons of quality, or to persons whose reputation had been called in question, or to the clergy who had occasion to travel into foreign countries. 2. Canonical Letters, those which were granted to all who were in the peace and communion of the church. 3. Dimissory Letters, those which were only granted to the clergy when they removed from one district to another.

LITHOMANCY (Gr. lithos, a stone, and manteia, divination), a species of divination performed by means of stones. The stone used for this purpose was washed in spring water by candle light, and the person engaged in divining, having purified himself, covered his face, repeated a form of prayer, and placed certain characters in a certain order. Then the stone was said to move of itself, and in a soft gentle murmur to give the answer. By this sort of divination Helena is said to have foretold the destruction of Troy.

LITURGIES. The Greek word leiturgia occurs frequently in the New Testament under the sense of public ministry, including all the ceremonies belonging to Divine service. It was probably used in the same signification by Chrysostom and Theodoret. Both in the Eastern and Western churches it became the practice to apply the word in a restricted meaning to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In many modern Protestant churches, it has come to denote the common prayer, and among Romanists the mass.

Mr. Riddle, in his 'Manual of Christian Antiquities,' divides the Liturgies which have been used in different churches into four families or classes. (1.) The great Oriental Liturgy, which seems to have prevailed in all churches, from the Euphrates to the Hellespont, and thence to the southern extremity of Greece. (2.) The Alexandrian or ancient Liturgy of Egypt, Abyssinia, and the country extending along the Mediterranean Sea to the West. (3.) The Roman, which prevailed throughout the whole of Italy, Sicily, and the civil diocese of Africa. (4.) The Gallican, which was used throughout Gaul and Spain, and probably in the exarchate of Ephesus until the fourth century.

The earliest known Liturgy is the Clementine, found in the Apostolical Constitutions, which are not supposed to date farther back than the fourth century, Epiphanius being the first author who mentions such a production by name. There is no evidence whatever that before that time a Liturgy, or set form of prayers, existed in the Christian church; but several ecclesiastical writers allege, that for three, if not for four centuries, the Lord's Supper was administered by a traditional form derived from the apostles, which, however, in consequence of the strict maintenance of the ARCANI DISCIPLINA (which see), was not allowed to be committed to writing lest the Christian mysteries should be revealed to the Heathen. In this way the fact has been attempted to be explained, that although the Clementine Liturgy is the model on which all posterior Liturgies were framed, it was never used by any church, even after the churches came to employ written Liturgies in public worship. This then, which is believed to be the most ancient Liturgy, is supposed to be the old traditional form used in all churches before that form was committed to writing in any one church. But when the several churches began to put their Liturgies into writing, they adopted such a step without being sanctioned by the decree of any general council, or without agreeing upon one specific form for all churches, as they did upon one common creed in the first four general councils. Each church, in fact, composed a Liturgy for itself.

Next in antiquity to the Clementine Liturgy is that of St. Basil, which can be traced, with some degree of certainty, to the fourth century. He is supposed to have been the first who compiled a communion-office in writing for the use of his own church. His Liturgy was not only used in Casarea, of which place he was archbishop, but it was received by several other churches, and used by them along with their own, not constantly, but on some particular occasions. Thus, in the Greek church, the Liturgy of St. Basil is used upon all the Sundays of Lent, except Palm-Sunday, upon the Thursday and Saturday of Passion-week, upon Christmas-eve, and the eve of the Epiphany, and upon St. Basil's-day. The use of this Liturgy by the patriarchs of Constantinople, and the churches under their care, is to be explained by the fact, that from a period before the council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, the patriarch of Constantinople became possessed of the jurisdiction which had anciently belonged to the exarch of Casarea. "This was the form," says Mr. Riddle, "which soon prevailed throughout the whole exarchate of Casarea and the patriarchate of Constantinople, where it has remained in use ever since. This was the form which was received by all the patriarchate of Antioch, translated into Coptic, revised by the patriarchs of Alexandria, and admitted into their church, used alike by the orthodox and heretics. At this day, after the lapse of near fifteen hundred years, the Liturgy of Basil prevails, without any substantial variety, from the northern shores of Russia to the extremities of Abyssinia, and from the Adriatic and Baltic Seas to the farthest coast of Asia. In one respect this Liturgy must be considered as the most valuable that we possess. We can trace back the words and expressions of the greater portion to about the year 370 or 380. This is not the case with any other Liturgy. The expressions of all other Liturgies we cannot certainly trace in general beyond the fifth century."

The Liturgy of Basil, however, as used in the Greek church, contains some interpolated passages, as is admitted on all hands; and when it was introduced into the patriarchate of Alexandria, it seems to have undergone several alterations, intended, as is probable, to accommodate it to the ancient Alexandrian or Egyptian Liturgy, which was attributed to the Evangelist Mark. The Liturgy which is in daily use in the Greek church is that of Chrysostom, in which the order following immediately after the dismissal of catechumens is identical with that of Basil. Another liturgy bearing the name of the Apostle James is still used also in the Greek church, but only on the festival of St. James's day. This Liturgy, which was anciently used in the patriarchate of Antioch, bears a close resemblance to the Clementine Liturgy. It is believed to have been the ancient Liturgy of the church of Jerusalem, of which James, the brother of our Lord, was the first bishop or pastor. One passage which occurs in it, and in no other Liturgy, seems to give strong confirmation to this supposition. Thus in the beginning of the prayer for the church universal, it is said, "We offer also to thee, O Lord, for thy holy places which thou hast glorified with the Divine presence of thy Christ, and the appearance of thy most Holy Spirit; but chiefly for glorious Sion, the Mother of all churches."

The great Oriental Liturgy includes the Liturgies of James, of Basil, and of Chrysostom. But another Liturgy of great antiquity, and differing from the Oriental only in the order of its parts, was used throughout the patriarchate of Alexandria. Though attributed to Mark, and bearing his name, it was probably of no earlier date than the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century. It was enlarged by Cyril of Alexandria, and known among the Monophysites by his name, while the orthodox still continued to use the name of St. Mark. This Liturgy was received by the churches of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, and accordingly, there occurs in the general intercession these remarkable words, "Raise the waters of the river to their just height," which evidently refer to the waters of the Nile. In this Liturgy, as in the others already noticed, there are various obvious interpolations.

In the Abyssinian church, a peculiar liturgy in the old Ethiopic language is used, which resembles considerably the Alexandrian liturgy, but fixes its locality by mentioning the Abuna or Patriarch by name, and also the King. There occur in it, besides, the names of a number of their own saints, and a petition that the prayers of the angels may be heard in our behalf. The Nestorians also had a Liturgy of their own, in which a passage is introduced favouring their peculiar views in regard to the person of Christ. Thus in the eucharistic prayer, these words occur, "He took the form of a servant, perfect man, of a reasonable, intelligent, and immortal soul, and human flesh subsisting, and joined it to himself, uniting it with himself in glory, power, and honour." The last clause in the mouth of a Nestorian was intended to deny the personal union of the Divine and human natures in Christ. The Monophysite churches of the East have also an ancient Liturgy, which has fewer interpolations than any of the other Liturgies extant; it has one peculiarity, however, that after the words of institution in making the oblation, the prayer is directed to the Son, and not to the Father. The Copts have an entire Liturgy or Communion office, in which every petition is directed to the Son.

Of the Western Liturgies the Gothic or Gothico-Gallican was used in that part of Gaul which was anciently called Gallia Narbonensis, including the provinces of Narbonne, Languedoc, Provence, and Savoy. The Gallican Liturgy was used in the other provinces of Gaul until the time of Charlemagne, when it was exchanged for the Roman by a decree of that prince. Mr. Palmer, the author of the 'Origines Liturgicæ,' thinks that this ancient liturgy originated with the church of Lyons, which was intimately connected with the churches of Asia and Phrygia. Nearly allied to the ancient Gallican was the Mozarabic Liturgy, which was used probably from the fifth century in the Spanish churches. This Liturgy is attributed by Isidore to the Apostle Peter. It was abolished in Spain by Gregory VII. about 1080. The ancient Gallican form seems to have been adopted in the early British church. From the time of Patrick, A. D. 432, the Irish are thought to have used the Roman Liturgy, and, about a century after, the ancient British Liturgy was introduced.

The Roman Liturgy has been generally attributed to Gregory the Great in the latter part of the sixth century; some writers, however, allege that he merely revised an old liturgy, which was then in use in the Latin church. The Ambrosian Liturgy indeed is supposed to have been prepared by Ambrose, archbishop of Milan, so early as the fourth century, and when Gregory's Missal was appointed to be used in all the Western churches, the church of Milan insisted on maintaining an independent position, and persisted in using its own liturgy, taking shelter under the high authority of St. Ambrose. Some Romish writers allege their Canon or Liturgy to be more ancient than the time of Gregory, and attribute its composition to Pope Gelasius, who flourished about the end of the fifth century. Others ascribe it to Musæus, a presbyter of Marseilles, about the year 458, and others still to Vocotinus, bishop of Castille, in Mauritania, about 460. And yet it is very unlikely that the Church of Rome should have adopted a Liturgy prepared by a French presbyter, or an African bishop, while the churches of their own respective countries refused for centuries to acknowledge it. But if the Missal was not wholly composed by Gregory, at all events he introduced several alterations in it; more especially he added the Lord's Prayer, which had not been used before in the Canon of that church. The probability is, that the Missal even though it were established as a certainty to be the sole production of Gregory the Great, has since that time undergone considerable alterations. And down to the date of the council of Trent in the sixteenth century, the Roman Canon was used in various forms, and accompanied with different rites and prayers in different churches.

The Anglo-Saxon Liturgy, which differed from that of the British Church, was formed from the Sacramentary of Gregory, which was brought over by the monk Augustine and his companions at the end of the sixth century. "As, however," observes Mr. Riddle, "each bishop had the power of making some improvements in the Liturgy of his church, in process of time different customs arose, and several became so established as to receive the names of their respective churches. Thus gradually the 'Uses' or customs of York, Sarum, Hereford, Bangor, Lincoln, Aberdeen, &c., came to be distinguished from each other." The Roman Liturgy continued to be used with occasional modifications in England until the Reformation; in France, Italy, and Germany, from the days of Charlemagne until the present time; and in Spain from Gregory VII. until now.

LITURGIES (JEWISH). The modern Jews have three Liturgies, the German, the Portuguese, and the Italian, but all in Hebrew. The liturgical service used in the synagogue worship is said to be of great antiquity. The most solemn and indispensable part of it consists of the Shemoneh Esrah or the Eighteen Prayers. The Kiriath Shema, or reading of the Shema, is also regarded as an important part of Divine service. It must be repeated twice a-day, and is generally attempted to be recited by a Jew as a confession of faith in his last moments. Those present with the dying man will repeat the first verse, and "Jehovah is God," till he expires, that he may be said to die in the faith.

LITURGY (ENGLISH). See COMMON PRAYER (BOOK OF).

LITURGY (LIVERPOOL), a Liturgy which was published at Liverpool in 1652. It was the composition of some Presbyterians who thought proper to lay aside extemporaneous prayer for a set form. Mr. Orton styles it scarcely a Christian Liturgy, and says that the name of Christ is hardly mentioned in the Collect, and the Spirit quite banished from it.

LIVER, a word which occurs in Exod. xxix. 13, in the directions there given for the sacrifice at the consecration of the Jewish priests. Calmet supposes that the ancients were in the habit of eating the liver covered with or wrapped in the caul, and he thinks it probable that in offering sacrifice, the liver was in the same manner enfolded in the caul before it was laid upon the altar. Professor Bush translates the expression, instead of "the caul above the liver," as it is in our version, "the lobe over or by the liver," meaning thereby the larger lobe of the liver including the gall-bladder. In Ezek. xxi. 21, among several modes of divination practised by the king of Babylon, it is said, "he looked in the liver." This was the portion of the intestines of a sacrificial victim which diviners chiefly inspected. (See CAPUT EXTORUM.) Divination by the liver was termed Hepato copia, and so important did the augurs account this part of the victim, that their attention was directed to it in the first instance, and if it appeared very unhealthy, no observations were made on the other parts, as it was judged unnecessary, the omen being accounted decidedly unfavourable.

If the liver exhibited its natural healthy colour and condition, or if it was double, or there were two livers, and if the lobes inclined inwards, the signs were highly favourable, and success in any proposed object was deemed to be insured; but nothing but dangers and misfortunes were foreboded when there was too much dryness, or a band between the parts, or if it was without a lobe, and still more when the liver itself was wanting, which is said to have sometimes happened. The omens were likewise considered full of evil when the liver had any blisters or ulcers; if it was hard, thin, or discoloured; had any humour upon it; or if, in boiling, it became soft, or was displaced. The signs which appeared on the concave part of the liver concerned the family of the person offering the sacrifice; but those on the gibbous side affected his enemies; if either of these parts were shrivelled, corrupted, or in any way unsound, the omen was unfortunate, but the reverse when it appeared sound and large. Æschylus makes Prometheus boast of having taught man the division of the entrails, if smooth and of a clear colour, to be agreeable to the gods; also the various forms of the gall and the liver. Among the Greeks and Romans it was considered an unfortunate omen if the liver was injured by a cut in killing the victim.

LIVING, a term often used in England to denote a BENEFICE (which see).

LOANGO (RELIGION OF.) See FETISH-WORSHIP.

LOCALES, a name anciently given to ecclesiasties, who were ordained to a ministerial charge in some fixed place. Thus in the council of Valentia in Spain, a decree was passed that every priest before ordination should give a promise that he would be localis. Ordination at large, indeed, was not regarded as valid, but null and void.

LOCHEIA, a surname of Artemis, as being the guardian of women in childbirth.

LOCI COMMUNES (Lat. common places), a body of divinity published by Melancthon in 1521, being the first Protestant System of Theology which appeared in Germany. It was held in such high repute in the sixteenth century, and even long after, that it was regarded as a model of doctrine for professors and students, as well as for all who desired a clear systematic view of Divine truth. This celebrated work passed through sixty editions in the lifetime of the author, and was the means of greatly advancing the cause of the Reformation.

LOCULUS, a name given to a coffin among the ancient Romans, which was frequently made of stone. Sometimes it was formed of stone from Assos in Troas, which consumed the whole body, with the exception of the teeth, in forty days. Hence it was called Sarcophagus or flesh-consumer, a name which came to be applied to a coffin of any kind, or even a tomb.

LOEMIUS, a surname of Apollo, as delivering from a plague. Under this name he was worshipped at Lindus in Rhodes.

LOGOS (Gr. Word), a term applied by the Evangelist John to the second Person of the Blessed Trinity. The intention of the sacred writer in using such an epithet in speaking of Christ was probably twofold; first, to denote His essential presence in the Father, in as full a sense as the attribute of wisdom is essential to Him; secondly, to denote His mediatorship as the Interpreter or Word between God and His creatures. It has been a favourite conjecture with many writers, that the idea of the Logos was borrowed by John from the Platonic philosophy, or that it was the result of a combination of the Alexandrian-Jewish theology with the Christian doctrine. This supposition, however, is at utter variance with the fact, that the notion of the Logos commended itself not only to those Christian teachers in the early church who were in favour of Platonism, but also to those who were disposed to look with suspicion upon every doctrine derived from that quarter. It was admitted by church-fathers of all views, and even of the most opposite tendencies. Nay, even some heretics received it only to pervert it for the purpose of doing away with the notion of the Son's personality. Such was the error of Paulus of Samosata and Marcellus; who from the fleeting and momentary character of a word spoken, inferred that the Divine Word was but the temporary manifestation of God's glory, in the man Christ Jesus. And it was to counteract this tendency that the Fathers speak of Him as the permanent, real, and living Word.

At a very early period, the doctrine of the Logos gave rise to much controversy. Thus the Monarchians either refused to receive the doctrine, or those who did consent to admit it, understood by the Logos simply a divine energy, the divine wisdom or reason which illuminates the souls of the pious. In opposing this heretical view, both the Western and the Eastern churches looked upon the Logos from a different stand-point. In the latter, the doctrine of the subordination of the Persons in the Blessed Trinity was established in connection with the hypostatical view of the Logos. The efforts of the former, on the other hand, were directed to the establishment of the unity of the Divine essence in connection with the distinction of the hypostases. Origen, in accordance with his strong tendency to allegorical explanations of Scripture, alleged both the designations of the Logos, and the name Logos itself, to be symbolical. He strove to banish all notions of time from the notion of the generation of the Logos. It was in his view an eternal now, and the generation a timeless eternal act. Origen, in all probability, was indebted for these notions to his education in the Platonic school. To maintain the principle of subordination, he affirmed, that we are not to conceive of a natural necessity in the case of the generation of the Son of God; but as in the case of the creation, we must conceive of an act flowing from the Divine will. And further, in opposition to the Monarchians, he held the personal independence of the Logos; while they considered the name of God the Father to be a designation of the primal divine essence, and all besides this to be something derived. Sabellius, however, taught that the Father, Logos, and Holy Ghost are designations of three different phases, under which the one divine essence reveals itself. The Logos is first hypostatized in Christ, but only for a time. The divine power of the Logos appropriated to itself a human body, and by this appropriation begat the Person of Christ, and after having accomplished the great object of his manifestation, the Logos will return back again into oneness with the Father, and thus God will be all in all.

In the Western church, again, Tertullian looked upon the Logos from a totally different point of view, and maintained the doctrine of one divine essence, shared in a certain gradation by three persons most intimately connected. "The Son, so far as it concerns the divine essence," says Neander, "is not numerically distinct from the Father; the same essence of God being also in the Son; but he differs in degree, being a smaller portion of the common mass of the divine essence. Thus the prevailing view in the Western church came to be this: one divine essence in the Father and the Son; but, at the same time, a subordination in the relation of the Son to the Father. Here were conflicting elements. The process of development must decide which of the two should gain the preponderance. This, then, constituted the difference between the two churches:—that while, in the Eastern church, the prominence given to the distinctions in the Triad did not leave room for the consciousness of the unity; in the Western church, on the other hand, the unity of essence, once decidedly expressed, caused the subordination element to retire more into the back-ground."

LOGOTHETES, an officer in the Greek Church, who is intendant of the Patriarch's household, and another who is a kind of inspector-general of the church.

LOKI, the evil principle of the ancient Scandinavians, whom they regarded also as a deity. The Edda calls him "the calumniator of the gods, the grand contriver of deceit and fraud, the reproach of gods and men. He is beautiful in his figure, but his mind is evil, and his inclinations inconstant. Nobody renders him divine honours. He surpasses all mortals in the arts of perfidy and craft." He has had many children, besides three monsters who owe their birth to him, the wolf Fenrir, the Midgard serpent, and Hela or Death. The Edda contains an account of the exploits of Loki, his stratagems against the gods, their resentment, and the vengeance which they sought to inflict upon him, seizing and shutting him up in a cavern formed of three keen-edged stones, where he rages with such violence, that he causes all the earthquakes that happen. There, we are told, he will remain till the end of the ages, when he shall be slain by Heimdall, the door-keeper of the gods.

LOLLARDS, the name given to various Christian fellowships, which arose at first around Antwerp in the Netherlands, about the commencement of the fourteenth century. The object of these fellowships was the revival of serious practical piety, and at their origin, as we learn from Gieseler, they associated together for the purpose of waiting upon patients dangerously sick, and burying the dead. They were held in high estimation, and increased rapidly in numbers. Gregory XI., in 1377, issued a bull for their protection, acknowledging that there were among them such as lived humbly and honestly, in pureness of faith, decent raiment, poverty and chastity, and devoutly frequented the places of worship. Boniface IX., in a bull dated 1394, declares concerning them, in terms of high commendation, that "they receive into their domiciles the poor and wretched, and to the utmost of their power practise other works of charity, inasmuch as when required, they visit and wait upon the sick, minister to their wants, and also attend to the burial of the dead." Acting thus in a spirit of true beneficence and charity, the Lollards, like the Beghards and Be-guines, diffused a healthful influence all around them. Gradually, however, they seem to have degenerated, and in course of time they are said to have laid themselves open to the charges of an aversion to all useful industry, along with a propensity to mendicancy and idleness, an intemperate spirit of opposition to the church, and a sceptical and more or less pantheistical mysticism. From the cells in which they lived, the Lollards were sometimes called CELLITES (which see). So strongly did they commend themselves to public notice by their deeds of charity that Charles, duke of Burgundy, in 1472, obtained a bull from Pope Sixtus IV. by which they were ranked among the religious orders delivered from the jurisdiction of their bishops; privileges which were extended still farther by Julius II. in 1506.

LOLLARDS, a term of reproach applied to the followers of Wycliffe in the fourteenth century. This eminent forerunner of the Reformation in England was born in 1324, at a small village near Richmond, in the county of York. He was educated at the university of Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his talents, and the zeal and diligence with which he prosecuted his studies, both in philosophy and theology. In the former department he subsequently signalled himself as an ardent defender of the Realists in opposition to the Nominalists, who had revived since the time of William Occam. His mind was chiefly directed to religious matters, more especially in connection with the existing corruptions. He had studied the prophecies of Joachim, which was at that time a favourite work with those who longed after the regeneration of the church. With a mind naturally earnest and practical, he applied himself to the subject, and gave to the world his views in a treatise, "On the last times of the Church," the first work in which he appeared before the public. In the commencement of his career as a Reformer, Wycliffe found a sympathizing friend in Islep, archbishop of Canterbury, who showed him much favour, and promoted him to an honourable office in connection with the university of Oxford. His kind patron, however, soon after died, and a man of a very different stamp having succeeded him, Wycliffe was displaced, and the monks who had been expelled from the college were restored. Thinking himself wronged, Wycliffe appealed to the Roman chancery, but in the meantime the course of events called forth his reforming tendencies into such prominence, that he was not likely to receive any countenance from the Roman see. The English parliament, in 1365, resolved to resist the claim of Pope Urban V. who attempted the revival of an annual payment of 1,000 marks as a tribute or feudal acknowledgment, that the realm of England was held at the pleasure of the Pope. His claim was founded upon the surrender of the crown by King John to Pope Innocent III. The payment had been discontinued for thirty-three years, and now that Urban again urged the claim, a keen controversy arose. The mendicant friars, and particularly the Franciscans, who had long distinguished themselves as valiant defenders of Rome, called upon King Edward to pay the tribute, alleging that if he failed to accede to the Pope's demands, the sovereignty of England was forfeited.

In these circumstances Wycliffe boldly met the challenge of the friars, and published a treatise, in which he not only asserted the right of the king supported by his parliament to repudiate the Pope's claim for quit rent or tribute, but maintained also that the clergy, neither as individuals nor as a general body, were exempted from civil jurisdiction. In conducting his argument in this remarkable production, one great principle lay at the foundation of the whole, that the Sacred Scriptures formed the ultimate standard of all law. The ability and stern independence with which he had defended the rights of the crown against the aggressions of Rome made Wycliffe an object of warm admiration among his countrymen, and Edward III., in recognition of the valuable service which he had rendered to the nation, appointed him one of the royal chaplains. In 1372 he was made Doctor of Theology, and his influence was rapidly increasing. Many a withering exposure of the corruptions of the church now issued from his pen. The mendicant monks in particular called forth from him the most bitter invectives. Nor were his writings neglected by his countrymen. They were eagerly perused by multitudes, and men of all ranks hailed him as the dauntless and unflinching enemy of those flagrant ecclesiastical abuses which were fast undermining the influence of the priesthood, and were likely soon, if not reformed, to render religion itself an object of mockery and contempt. For some time the government of England had attempted by negotiation to obtain from the Pope a redress of some of the most prominent ecclesiastical grievances. All efforts of this kind, however, were utterly ineffectual, and it was at length resolved, in 1374, to send an embassy composed of seven persons to Pope Gregory XI. to confer with him on this subject. Wycliffe was one of the seven commissioners nominated by the crown for this purpose. The conference took place at Bruges, and lasted two whole years without attaining to any great extent the object for which it had been held. It had a powerful influence, however, upon the thoughtful mind of Wycliffe, and did much to prepare him for the responsible position which he was destined in the providence of God to occupy as the morning star of the Reformation. His eyes were now opened to the true character of the papacy, and from this time he spoke and wrote against its worldly spirit, and its injurious effects both upon individuals and communities. Its corruption he chiefly traced to its cupidity.

After his return to England Wycliffe was presented to the rectory of Lutterworth in the county of Leicester, officiating also as teacher of theology at Oxford. As a pastor he laboured indefatigably, seeking by ardent and prayerful study of the Bible to instruct the people in divine things. The Romish priesthood had long been accustomed to give the sermon a subordinate place in public worship, but Wycliffe restored it to its due importance as a means of supplying the religious wants of the people. With him originated the idea of travelling preachers, men who went about barefoot in long robes of a russet colour, preaching salvation through the cross of Christ. These men styled themselves "poor priests," and were subsequently called Lollards, a name similar to that of the BEGHARDS (which see). These men associated themselves together for the purpose, says Wycliffe, "of following to the utmost the example of Christ and his apostles; of labouring where there was the most need as long as they still retained the vigour of youth, without condemning other priests who faithfully did their duty."

By these exertions for the diffusion of the Gospel among all classes of the people, Wycliffe attracted some friends, but many enemies. A numerous body, especially of the begging monks, as he himself intimates, sought his death. No means were left untried to check the spread of his opinions and to destroy his rapidly advancing popularity and influence. In 1376 they extracted from his lectures, writings, and sermons, nineteen propositions which, as being in their view heretical, they forwarded to Rome for papal condemnation. These had reference chiefly to the unlimited power of the Pope; the secular possessions of the church; the rights of laymen over priests; the power of the keys, and the conditional validity of excommunication. In consequence of the representations thus made to him, Gregory XI., in 1377, issued three bulls against Wycliffe, which he sent to England by a nuncio, one of them being addressed to King Edward III. The propositions forwarded to his Holiness by the priests were condemned with various qualifications. The Pope called the special attention of the king to the doctrines promulgated by the Reformer, as being not only opposed to the Catholic faith, but subversive of good order in the country. He complained that such opinions should have been allowed to gain ground among the people, and commanded that Wycliffe should be forthwith thrown into chains and imprisoned; that he should be examined as to his doctrines, and the answers reported to Rome, after which directions for his further treatment should be waited for from that court. The papal bulls, however, met with no favour in England, except from the bishops.

The death of Edward III. and the succession of his son, Richard II., tended to strengthen the cause which Wycliffe had so ably espoused. The parliament was now decidedly in favour of a determined resistance to the pecuniary demands of the Pope. Two noblemen of great power and influence in the country, John Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and the marshal Henry Percy, had ranged themselves on the side of the Reformer, and came openly forward as his avowed patrons and supporters. He had a numerous band of adherents also among the people, and these were every day on the increase. In such circumstances it was found to be impossible to execute the papal bulls literally; but the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London summoned Wycliffe to appear before them at a court which they set up at Lambeth. The Reformer attended, accompanied by his two noble patrons, and the court was obliged to be satisfied with the explanations which he gave of the nineteen propositions.

One of the greatest services which Wycliffe conferred upon the cause of true religion in England, was the publication of his translation of the Bible in 1380. Being ignorant of both the Hebrew and Greek languages, his translation was founded upon the Vulgate, but even under this disadvantage, the preparation of a vernacular version of the Sacred Writings was at the time an inestimable blessing to the people, enabling them to read in their own language the words of eternal life. The priests were indignant that the laity should thus have it in their power to draw their religious opinions directly from the Bible, and with the utmost virulence they assailed the reputation of the undaunted Reformer. But the opposition of the clergy only roused him to go forward in exposing the errors both in doctrine and practice which had crept into the church. In 1381, he appeared as the opponent of transubstantiation, contending against every mode of a bodily presence of Christ, and maintaining that the bread and wine are nothing more than symbols of Christ's body and blood, with the additional explanation that in the case of believers they were active symbols, placing those who partook of them with real, living faith, in the position of an actual union with Christ. The theses which the Reformer published on this point, were couched in these terms, "The right faith of a Christian is this, that this commendable sacrament is bread and body of Christ, as Christ is true God and true man; and this faith is founded on Christ's own words in the Gospels." The sympathy, however, which he had met with in attacking other abuses and errors failed to attend him in this contest. The chancellor of the University of Oxford summoned twelve doctors to consider the point, and with their concurrence he published a solemn judgment declaring the theses put forth by Wycliffe on the doctrine of transubstantiation to be heretical; and the preaching of these views was forbidden on penalty of imprisonment and excommunication.

Undeterred by the opposition which assailed him and his doctrines, Wycliffe went forward steadily in the accomplishment of his great mission as a church reformer. Every day he became more violent in attacking the mendicants, declaring that their whole mode of life was at variance with the life of Christ, and that instead of giving themselves up to idleness and inaction, they ought rather to employ themselves in preaching the gospel of Christ wherever duty called them. This interference with the vows of the friars gave great offence to the Duke of Lancaster, who had been one of the Reformer's early patrons and friends; but neither the favour nor the frowns of the great could persuade this earnest-minded champion of the truth to deviate by one hair's breadth from the path of rectitude. A council was convened by the Archbishop of Canterbury to examine into the heresy of Wycliffe; but its proceedings were interrupted by the occurrence of an earthquake, which gained for it the name of the earthquake-council. By this council a number of Wycliffe's propositions were condemned either as heretical or erroneous; and through the influence of the archbishop, King Richard was induced to issue a command to put all persons under an arrest who taught Wycliffite doctrines.

The spread of the reformed opinions taught by Wycliffe received considerable impulse from a papal schism which took place about this time, two rival popes being busily engaged contending for the mastery. Rome and Avignon were issuing their fierce fulminations against each other. The question, who was the true Pope, was agitating the whole of Christendom, and in a paper on the schism, Wycliffe says, "Trust we already in the help of Christ, for he hath begun already to help us graciously, in that he hath clove the head of antichrist; and made the two parts fight one against the other."

mation was now at hand. While hearing mass on the day of the Holy Innocents in 1384, in his own church at Lutterworth, he was suddenly seized with an attack of apoplexy, which rendered him speechless, and after lingering a short time he was cut off, and his useful life brought to a sudden close. Considering the age in which he lived, this eminent man had remarkably clear views of Divine truth on some points, mingled no doubt with not a few errors. The great Protestant principle, of Christ the only author of salvation, in opposition to the worship of saints, occupied a prominent place in his theological system. But at the same time he admits, that those saints ought to be worshipped who are known to be such from the Word of God. He believed that in the early church two orders of the clergy were sufficient, priests and deacons; in the time of Paul, bishop and presbyter were the same. Scripture in his view was the rule of reformation, and every doctrine and precept ought to be rejected which does not rest on that foundation. He held that conversion is solely the work of God in the heart of a sinner; that Christ is the all in all of Christianity; that faith is the gift of God, and the one essential principle of spiritual life is communion with Christ. In the estimation of this faithful servant of the Lord Jesus, the sublimest calling on earth is that of preaching the word of God. The true church he maintained to be Christ's believing people, and their exalted Redeemer the best, the only true Pope, but the earthly Pope is a sinful man, who might even be condemned on the great day. With far-seeing sagacity he predicted that a monk would yet arise from whom should proceed the regeneration of the church.

The death of Wycliffe showed the immortal power of his principles. His followers, if not strong in numbers, were earnest and energetic in their efforts, and having set themselves to the work, they met with such amazing success, that to use the words of D'Aubigné, "England was almost won over to the Reformer's doctrines." In 1395, a petition was presented to Parliament praying the House to "abolish celibacy, transubstantiation, prayers for the dead, offerings to images, auricular confession, the arts unnecessary to life, the practice of blessing oil, salt, wax, incense, stones, mitres, and pilgrims' staffs." "All these," the petitioners declared, "pertained to necromancy and not to theology." The clergy were alarmed by this bold step on the part of the Wickliffites or Lollards, and urged upon the king to interpose. Richard took up the matter with great promptness, forbade parliament to entertain the petition, and having summoned into the royal presence the most distinguished of its supporters, he threatened them with death if they continued to defend the reformed doctrines. At this critical moment, however, when the hand of the king was lifted up to smite the followers of Wycliffe, a sudden rebellion arose which hurled him from his throne, and consigned him to a prison where he ended his days.

Richard was succeeded on the throne by his cousin, the son of the famous Duke of Lancaster, who had been the friend and patron of Wycliffe. The Lollards, therefore, naturally expected to find in the new king a warm supporter of their principles. In this, however, they were bitterly disappointed. To gratify the priests, a royal edict was issued, ordering every incorrigible heretic to be burnt alive, and accordingly, a pious priest, named William Sawtree, was committed to the flames at Smithfield in March 1401. Encouraged by the royal countenance, the clergy drew up the well-known Constitutions of Arundel, which forbade the reading of the Bible, and asserted the Pope to be "not of pure man, but of true God, here on earth." Persecution now raged in England, and a prison in the archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth, which received the name of the Lollards' tower, was crowded with the followers of Wycliffe, who were doomed to imprisonment for alleged heresy; and Lord Cobham, who had caused Wycliffe's writings to be copied and widely circulated, having been formally condemned to death, was burnt at the stake in December 1417. The prisons of London were now filled with Lollards, and multitudes who escaped the vengeance of the persecuting clergy were compelled to hold their religious meetings in secret, and to bear with silent unrepining submission the obloquy and contempt to which they were exposed. From this time until the Reformation their sufferings were severe. Their principles, however, had taken deep root in England, and during the fifteenth century the Papal influence gradually decreased, preparing the way for the Reformation, which in the succeeding century established the Protestant faith as the settled religion of the country.

LOLLARDS OF KYLE, an opprobrious name applied to the supporters of Reformed principles in the western districts of Scotland during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Robert Blacater, the first archbishop of Glasgow, prevailed on James IV. to summon before the great council, about thirty persons, male and female, belonging to the districts of Kyle, Carrick and Cunningham, who were accused of holding doctrines opposed to the Catholic faith. This memorable trial took place in 1494. They were charged with condemning the worship of the Virgin Mary, the worship of saints, relics, images, and the mass. The king himself presided at the trial, and the result was, that the Lollards were dismissed with an admonition to beware of new doctrines, and to adhere steadfastly to the faith of the church.

LONGINUS'S (St.) DAY, a festival of the Romish church observed at Rome on the 15th of March. According to the legend, Longinus was an emancipated slave, a soldier in the Roman army, and almost blind. He is said to have been the soldier who pierced the side of our Saviour with his spear as he hung upon the cross; and while the blood flowed from the wound, some of it fell upon his eyes and immediately he recovered his sight. This miracle is alleged to have led to his conversion to Christianity; when forsaking his military profession, and being instructed by the apostles, he lived a monastic life in Cæsarea of Cappadocia, and was the means, both by his conversion and example, of converting many to the Christian faith. He is alleged to have been a faithful, devoted, and consistent believer, and to have closed his career by suffering martyrdom in the cause of his Divine Master.

LORD, a title very frequently applied in the Sacred Scripture to the Supreme Being. Two Hebrew words are thus translated in the Old Testament. Adonai, the Lord, is exclusively applied to God. The Hebrew word Jehovah is also very often translated in our version by the English word Lord, in conformity with the ordinary custom of the Jews in reference to the ineffable name, which they never pronounce. When the term Lord in our Bibles answers to the Hebrew word Jehovah, it is always printed in small capitals for the sake of distinction. See ADONAI, JEHOVAH.

LORD'S DAY, a name given to the first day of the week, which has been observed among Christians by Divine authority as a day set apart for religious services, more especially in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ from the dead. At a very early period in the history of the Christian church, this day was appropriated to public worship instead of the Jewish Sabbath. The first intimation of the change occurs in Acts xx. 7, where we find the church assembled on the first day of the week; and in Rev. i. 10, this sacred festival is expressly termed "the Lord's Day." The early Christian writers make frequent mention of this as a day of meeting among Christians. Thus we are informed by Justin Martyr, that "on Sunday all the Christians living either in the city or country met together" for reading the Scriptures, prayer, and the breaking of bread. That they considered it as possessing a holy character, is plain from the circumstance that they uniformly spoke of it as the Lord's Day, and regarded it as a weekly festival on which fasting and every appearance of sorrow was to be laid aside as inconsistent with the character and design of the day. It was wholly dedicated to the exercises of religious worship, which are termed accordingly, by Tertullian, "the solemnities of the Lord's Day." And not only was public worship performed on this day, but it was kept holy throughout, and the thoughts and feelings of believers were required to be in accordance with its sacredness. Thus Clement of Alexandria says, "A true Christian, according to the commands of the gospel, observes the Lord's Day by casting out all bad thoughts, and cherishing all goodness, honouring the resurrection of the Lord which took place on that day." "This day," says Eusebius, "Christians throughout the world celebrate in strict obedience to the spiritual law. Like the Jews, they offer the morning and evening sacrifice with incense of sweeter odour. The day," he adds, "was universally observed as strictly as the Jewish Sabbath, whilst all feasting, drunkenness, and recreation was rebuked as a profanation of the sacred day." Ignatius says, that all who loved the Lord kept the Lord's day as the queen of days—a reviving, life-giving day, the best of all our days. Such epithets abound in the ancient homilies of the fathers.

The mode in which the early Christians spent the Lord's Day is thus described by Dr. Jamieson in his 'Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians: "Viewing the Lord's Day as a spiritual festivity, a season on which their souls were specially to magnify the Lord, and their spirits to rejoice in God their Saviour, they introduced the services of the day with psalmody, which was followed by select portions of the Prophets, the Gospels, and the Epistles; the intervals between which were occupied by the faithful in private devotions. The plan of service, in short, resembled what was followed in that of the vigils, though there were some important differences, which we shall now describe. The men prayed with their heads bare, and the women were veiled, as became the modesty of their sex, both standing—a posture deemed the most decent, and suited to their exalted notions of the weekly solemnity,—with their eyes lifted up to heaven, and their hands extended in the form of a cross, the better to keep them in remembrance of Him, whose death had opened up the way of access to the divine presence. The reading of the sacred volume constituted an important and indispensable part of the observance; and the more effectually to impress it on the memories of the audience, the lessons were always short, and of frequent recurrence. Besides the Scriptures, they were accustomed to read aloud several other books for the edification and interest of the people—such as treatises on the illustration of Christian morals, by some pastor of eminent reputation and piety; or letters from foreign churches, containing an account of the state and progress of the Gospel. This part of the service,—most necessary and valuable at a time when a large proportion of every congregation were unacquainted with letters, was performed at first by the presiding minister, but was afterwards devolved on an officer appointed for that object, who, when proceeding to the discharge of his duty, if it related to any part of the history of Jesus, exclaimed aloud to the people, 'Stand up—the Gospels are going to be read;' and then always commenced with, 'Thus saith the Lord.' They assumed this attitude, not only from a conviction that it was the most respectful posture in which to listen to the counsels of the King of kings, but with a view to keep alive the attention of the people—an object which, in some churches, was sought to be gained by the minister stopping in the middle of a Scriptural quotation, and leaving the people to finish it aloud. The discourses, founded for the most part on the last portion of Scripture that was read, were short, plain, and extemporary exhortations,—designed chiefly to stir up the minds of the brethren by way of remembrance, and always prefaced by the salutation, 'Peace be unto you.' As they were very short—sometimes not extending to more than eight or ten minutes' duration,—several of them were delivered at a diet, and the preacher was usually the pastor of the place, though he sometimes, at his discretion, invited a stranger, or one of his brethren, known to possess the talent of public speaking, to address the assembly. The close of the sermon by himself, which was always the last of the series, was the signal for the public prayers to commence. Previous to this solemn part of the service, however, a crier commanded infidels of any description that might be present to withdraw, and the doors being closed and guarded, the pastor proceeded to pronounce a prayer, the burden of which was made to bear a special reference to the circumstances of the various classes who, in the primitive church, were not admitted to a full participation in the privileges of the faithful. First of all, he prayed, in name of the whole company of believers, for the catechumens—young persons, or recent converts from heathenism, who were passing through a preparatory course of instruction in the doctrines and duties of Christianity,—that their understandings might be enlightened—their hearts receive the truth in the love of it—and that they might be led to cultivate those holy habits of heart and life, by which they might adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour. Next, he prayed for the penitents, who were undergoing the discipline of the church, that they might receive deep and permanent impressions of the exceeding sinfulness of sin,—that they might be filled with godly sorrow, and might have grace, during the appointed term of their probation, to bring forth fruits meet for repentance. In like manner, he made appropriate supplications for other descriptions of persons, each of whom left the church when the class to which he belonged had been commended to the God of all grace; and then the brethren, reduced by these successive departures to an approved company of the faithful, proceeded to the holy service of communion."

From the time that Christianity became the established religion of the Roman Empire, laws were frequently passed by the state in reference to the careful observance of the Lord's Day. "No sooner was Constantine come over to the church," says Cave, "but his principal care was about the Lord's day; he commanded it to be solemnly observed, and that by all persons whatsoever. And for those in his army who yet remained in their paganism and infidelity, he commanded them upon Lord's days to go out into the fields, and there pour out their souls in hearty prayer to God. He moreover ordained, that there should be no courts of judicature open upon this day; no suits or trials in law: but, at the same time, any works of mercy, such as emancipating slaves, were declared lawful. That there should be no suits nor demanding debts upon this day, was confirmed by several laws of succeeding emperors. Theodosius the Great, (A. D. 386,) by a second law ratified one which he had passed long before, wherein he expressly prohibited all public shows upon the Lord's day, that the worship of God might not be confounded with those profane solemnities. This law the younger Theodosius some few years after confirmed and enlarged; enacting, that on the Lord's day (and some other festivals then mentioned) not only Christians, but even Jews and heathens, should be restrained from the pleasure of all sights and spectacles, and the theatres be shut up in every place. And whenever it might so happen that the birthday or inauguration of the emperor fell upon that day, he commanded that then the imperial solemnity should be put off and deferred till another day. Subsequently these matters were arranged by councils."

Those churches which in early times were composed chiefly of Jewish converts, while they observed the first day of the week as the Lord's Day, retained also their own Sabbath on the seventh day. It was the practice of Christians not only to exclude fasting from the observances of the Lord's Day, but also to maintain the standing position in prayer. To fast in token of sorrow on this day of joy, and to kneel while commemorating the day on which our Lord arose, was accounted a breach of Christian propriety, which uniformly called forth the disapprobation of the church and the anathemas of her councils. See SABBATH.

LORD'S PRAYER, the prayer which Jesus Christ taught his disciples as recorded in Mat. vi. 9—13, Luke xi. 2—4. We have no evidence from the writings of the Apostles that this prayer was used as a form in public worship in their times; neither does any reference to it in this view occur in the earliest Christian writers immediately succeeding the age of the Apostles. When we pass, however, from the Apostolic Fathers to the writers of the second and third centuries, we find the public use of the Lord's Prayer in the church fully established by the testimonies of Tertullian, Cyprian, and Origen, who devoted each an entire treatise to the exposition of this prayer. Tertullian, in express terms, declares it to have been prescribed by Christ as a form for all ages of the church, and he alleges that it contains the substance of all prayer, and is an epitome of the whole gospel. Cyprian follows in nearly the same strain, acknowledging Tertullian as his guide and instructor; and describing the Lord's Prayer, he calls it "our public and common prayer." Origen also affirms this to have been a prescribed form, containing all that the true Christian ever has occasion to pray for. Numberless authorities to the same effect might be adduced from writers of the fourth and fifth centuries. By Chrysostom, it is styled "the prayer of the faithful," its use being restricted to the faithful in full communion with the church, and denied to catechumens, on the ground that believers only were able in the true spirit of adoption to say, "Our Father, which art in heaven." The full mystical meaning of this prayer was not explained to any until after their baptism, each of its petitions being considered as having reference to the Christian mysteries or esoteric doctrines of the church, which, according to the ARCANI DISCIPLINA (which see), were carefully concealed from the catechumens.

The doxology at the conclusion of the Lord's Prayer, which is now found in the Gospel of St. Matthew, is generally supposed by critics not to have formed part of the original text of the Evangelist, not being found in the earliest and best MSS. of that Gospel, according to the testimony of Mill, Wetstein, Bengel, and Griesbach. It is found in the Apostolical Constitutions, and may probably have been thence transferred to the text of the Gospel. The ancient liturgies of the Greek Church contain a doxology to the Lord's Prayer, recognizing the doctrine of the Trinity as implied in the prayer, "Thine is the kingdom, power, and glory, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, both now and for ever, world without end." This doxology has been ascribed to Basil and to Chrysostom.

In the Apostolical Constitutions, believers are enjoined to repeat the Lord's Prayer three times every day; a practice which was afterwards established by the laws of the church. Newly baptized persons were also required to repeat this prayer along with the Creed, immediately on coming out of the water. In the case of infant baptism, the sponsors at first repeated the Lord's Prayer and Creed on behalf of the child; but afterwards this was dispensed with, and the officiating minister alone repeated the formularies. The first writer who mentions the Lord's Prayer as having been used in the dispensation of the Lord's Supper is Cyril of Jerusalem. Augustine also alludes to this practice. The Ordo Romanus prefixes a preface to the Lord's Prayer, the date of which is uncertain. It contains a brief exposition of the prayer. All the Roman breviaries enjoin that Divine service should commence with the repetition of the Lord's Prayer; but this custom can be traced no farther back than the thirteenth century, when it is said to have been introduced by the Cistercian monks. The practice of using the Lord's Prayer before commencing sermon in public worship receives no countenance from the writings of the ancient Christian Fathers. In reference to the use of this prayer as a form, Augustine says, "We are free to ask the same things that are desired in the Lord's Prayer, sometimes in one manner of expression, and sometimes in another." And Tertullian, speaking expressly of prayer, and of the Lord's Prayer particularly, says, "There are many things to be asked according to the various circumstances of men;" and again he says, "We pray without a monitor (or set form) because we pray from the heart."

The obvious design of our blessed Lord in presenting his followers with this short, beautiful, and comprehensive model of prayer, was to teach them to pray in the Spirit. There is no express reference in it to the work and the name of Christ. This omission, however, is easily accounted for. Jesus was now exhibiting for the first time, clearly and without a figure, the true nature and design of the kingdom of God. But the facts in the providence of God on which the kingdom rested, the events in the history of the Redeemer which were yet to happen, and which were to be evolved by the free agency of man, He refrains from explaining. The great doctrines, however, as to the work of Christ, and the efficacy of His atonement, are contained in this prayer by implication, though not directly. The one grand idea to which the whole prayer tends is, the ardent longing of the believer for the coming of the kingdom of God. This thought runs through the whole prayer, from its preface to its conclusion, just as the unfolding of the nature of the kingdom runs through the whole of the sublime sermon on the mount. The Lord's Prayer then, viewed in this aspect, may be divided into two parts, the one referring to the relation of God to man, and the other of man to God. The one portion of the prayer breathes a wish that God Himself would establish His kingdom in the hearts of men, and the other breathes a wish that all the obstacles to the establishment of this kingdom in the hearts of men, may be removed; while the conclusion expresses a firm hope and belief founded on the nature of God, that the prayer will be heard and answered.

LORD'S SUPPER, a solemn Christian ordinance instituted by our blessed Lord on the night of his betrayal, and designed to commemorate his Mediatorial sufferings and death. An account of its first institution is thus given by the Evangelist Matthew, "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." Jesus had just celebrated his last Passover on earth, his concluding act of observance of the Jewish ceremonial law. The type had served its purpose, and now gave way to the antitype. Accordingly, the Passover having been in past ages a standing representation of that death which he was about to endure, Jesus proceeded to institute a corresponding ordinance, that of the Lord's Supper, to be a standing memorial in all future ages of the same solemn event. Having feasted on the typical Passover, Jesus took the remains of the Paschal bread, and of the Paschal wine, and consecrated them anew as the elements of that great feast which his people were henceforth to observe in commemoration of himself as their Passover sacrificed for them.

No name is given to this Christian feast by the Evangelists who record its institution, but it is styled by the Apostle Paul in 1 Cor. xi. 20, "the Lord's Supper," as having been appointed by Christ on the night in which he was betrayed by Judas into the hands of the Jewish chief priests and elders. The name by which this sacrament has been designated in all ages of the church, and among all its various sections, is the COMMUNION (which see). It has also been termed the Eucharist, as being a symbolical expression of thanksgiving for redeeming mercy.

The strict connection between the Lord's Supper and the Jewish Passover was so strongly recognized by the early converts from Judaism to Christianity, that, as Epiphanius has shown, they continued for many years to observe both festivals, and even in the Christian church generally, the Lord's Supper was celebrated with peculiar solemnity at the festival of Easter, which corresponded to the Passover. That the two ordinances, however, were in reality separate and distinct from each other, is plain from the fact, that the Apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. xi., makes no mention of the Passover, while he minutely describes the nature and institution of the Lord's Supper, speaking of it as a customary rite in these words, "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come."

The question has been raised, Whether Christ himself partook of this holy ordinance at its first institution. No light is thrown upon this point either by the narrative in the Gospels, or by that in First Corinthians. Considerable diversity of opinion, accordingly, has existed on the subject even from early times. Chrysostom and Augustine maintain the affirmative, but it appears very unlikely that Jesus, though he partook of the typical feast of the Jewish passover, would partake of a feast which was not designed for Him but for His people. He speaks of the bread as "broken for you," meaning for his disciples, and in regard to the wine, he says, "Drink ye all of it." Both the sacramental elements and the sacramental actions have throughout a reference to the Supper as a feast, not for him, but upon him, a feast of which He was the object to be partaken of, and in no sense a partaker.

Another inquiry has been started, as to which theologians have been in all ages divided in opinion, namely, Whether Judas the traitor partook of the Lord's Supper. The Apostolical Constitutions affirm that he was not present on the solemn occasion. The advocates of this opinion rely chiefly on John xiii. 30, "He then having received the sop went immediately out: and it was night." Those who hold the contrary opinion appeal to Luke xxii. 11, "And ye shall say unto the goodman of the house, The Master saith unto thee, Where is the guestchamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?" and also to the saying of our Lord when he delivered the cup into the hands of his disciples, "Drink ye all of it," implying, as is supposed, that the twelve disciples all partook of the sacramental elements. The prevailing sentiment of the church in all ages has been that Judas was both present at the sacramental feast, and partook of the elements along with the other disciples.

It is somewhat strange that, in consulting the writings of the Apostolical Fathers, no mention is found of the Lord's Supper by Barnabas, Polycarp, or Clement of Rome, but only in the writings of Ignatius is there any reference to the subject, and even supposing the passages to be genuine, which has been doubted, the allusions are slight and very general. Most of the early apologists for Christianity also are silent as to this ordinance. Justin Martyr, however, has given two descriptions of the ordinance in nearly the same words, "On Sunday," he says, "we all assemble in one place, both those who live in the city and they who dwell in the country, and the writings of apostles and prophets are read so long as the time permits. When the reader stops, the president of the assembly makes an address, in which he recapitulates the glorious things that have been read, and exhorts the people to follow them. Then we all stand up together and pray. After prayer, bread, wine, and water, are brought in. The president of the meeting again prays according to his ability, and gives thanks, to which the people respond, Amen. After this, the bread, wine, and water, are distributed to those present, and the deacons carry portions to such as are necessarily detained from the meeting. Those who are able and willing contribute what they please in money, which is given to the president of the meeting, and is appropriated to the support of widows and orphans, the sick, the poor, and whomsoever is necessitous." In the dialogue with Trypho the Jew, which is usually ascribed to Justin, we find such expressions as these, "the offering of the bread of thanksgiving, and of the cup of thanksgiving," "the eucharistic meal of bread and wine," but no account is given of the mode in which the ordinance was celebrated. Irenæus, in his controversial writings, contends that the eucharist should be regarded as a sacrifice, in opposition to the Gnostics, who alleged that all sacrifices had ceased. He takes care, however, to distinguish it from the Jewish sacrifices, alleging it to be of a higher and nobler character than these mere typical ordinances. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Tertullian, and Cyprian, all make frequent references to the Lord's Supper as a standing ordinance in the church. The Apostolical Constitutions, however, which is the oldest liturgical document extant, and forms the foundation of all the liturgies both of the Eastern and Western churches, affords the most important information in reference to the Lord's Supper, as observed in the early Christian church. We are indebted to Dr. Jamieson for the following admirable view of the whole service among the primitive Christians: "The peculiar service of the faithful was commonly introduced by a private and silent prayer, which was followed by a general supplication for the church and the whole family of mankind, and then each of the brethren came forward to contribute a free-will offering, according to his ability, to the treasury of the church, the wealthy always being careful to bring part of theirs in articles of bread and wine. Out of this collection both the sacramental elements were furnished; the one consisting, from the first, of the common bread that was in use in the country, and the other of wine diluted with water, according to the universal practice of the ancients. Preliminary to the distribution of these, two ceremonies were always observed with the greatest punctuality,—the one emblematical of the purity that became the ordinance, the other of the love that should reign among all the disciples of Christ. The deacons brought a basin of water, in which the presiding ministers washed their hands in presence, and on behalf, of the whole congregation—a practice founded on the words of the Psalmist,—'I will wash my hands in innocence, and so I will compass thine altar;' and then, on a given signal, the assembled brethren, in token of their mutual amity and good will, proceeded to give each other a holy kiss, ministers saluted ministers, the men their fellow-men, and the women the female disciples that stood beside them. At this stage of the service another prayer of a general nature was offered, at the conclusion of which the minister, addressing the people, said, 'Peace be unto you,' to which they responded in one voice, 'and with thy spirit.' Pausing a little, he said, 'Lift up your hearts to God,' to which they replied, 'We lift them up unto God;' and then, after another brief interval of silence, he proceeded, 'Let us give thanks to God,' to which they returned the ready answer, 'It is meet and just so to do.' These preliminary exhortations being completed, the minister offered up what was called the great thanksgiving for all blessings, both temporal and spiritual, especially for the unspeakable love of God as manifested in the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and for that holy ordinance in which, in gracious adaptation to the nature of man, he is evidently set forth as crucified and slain; concluding with an earnest desire that intending communicants might participate in all the benefits it was designed to impart, to which all the people said aloud, 'Amen.' As the communicants were about to advance to that place appropriated for communion,—for up to that time it was unoccupied,—the minister exclaimed, 'Holy things to holy persons'—a form of expression equivalent to a practical prohibition of all who were unholy; and the invitation to communicants was given by the singing of some appropriate Psalms, such as the passage in the 34th, 'O taste and see that God is good;' and the 133d, beginning 'Behold! how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!' The elements having been consecrated by a prayer, which consisted chiefly of the words of the institution, the minister took up the bread, and breaking it, in memorial of Christ's body being broken, distributed to his assisting brethren beside him, and in like manner the cup, both of which were carried round by the deacons to the communicants in order; and while they presented them in this simple form, 'the body of Christ,' 'the blood of Christ,' each communicant, on receiving them, devoutly said, 'Amen.' The manner in which they received the element was, by taking it in the right hand, and placing the left underneath to prevent any of it from falling. The act of communion being finished, a thanksgiving hymn was sung, and an appropriate prayer offered, after which the brethren again gave each other the salutation of a holy kiss, and having received the blessing of their pastor, were exhorted to 'Go in peace.'"

The Lord's Supper was originally instituted in the evening, or at night, and in the apostolic age it seems to have been sometimes observed during the night, and at other times during the day. Justin Martyr makes no mention of the precise time of its celebration. Tertullian speaks of Easter Eve as a special period for the administration of this ordinance. This practice continued throughout the fourth and fifth centuries, and even as far onward as to the ninth century. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries it was transferred to the evening, and then to the afternoon of the day before Easter, and afterwards to the morning of the same day. The celebration of the communion on Christmas eve continued to a late period. To this ancient custom of observing this ordinance by night is probably to be traced the modern practice of burning lighted tapers on such occasions. As early as the fifth century nine o'clock in the morning became the canonical hour, and it was arranged that the Lord's Supper should be celebrated on Sundays and high festivals at this hour, and at twelve o'clock on other occasions. In the primitive church it was an universal custom to administer this ordinance on Thursday on Easter week, that being the day of its original institution; and some even contended that the ordinance ought to be restricted to an annual celebration of this day, though the prevailing sentiment of the church was in favour of frequent communion. Weekly and even daily communion appears to have been practised to a considerable extent in the early church. The first day of the week, indeed, often received the name of dies panis, the day of bread, with evident allusion to the observance of the sacrament on that day. That daily communion was practised by the apostles has been sometimes inferred from Acts ii. 42, 46, "And they continued stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers. And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart."

The Lord's Supper was instituted at first in the upper room of a private house, and from a passage of the Acts of the Apostles just quoted, it would appear that the communion was celebrated by the early followers of Christ in the houses of believers. But from I Cor. xi. 20, it is plain that the Corinthians must have had a separate place devoted to the observance of this rite, and to the exercises of public worship. In times of persecution, the early Christians observed the Lord's Supper wherever it could be done with safety, in secret places, in the cemeteries, in dens and caves of the earth. But whenever practicable, they celebrated this solemn ordinance in the buildings appropriated to public worship, and the consecration of the elements in private houses was expressly forbidden by the council of Laodicea.

Nothing is said in the New Testament as to the person by whom the Lord's Supper is to be administered. Our Lord himself was the first who dispensed the ordinance, and it is probable that the same office was afterwards discharged by the apostles. We learn from the writers of the second and third centuries, that it was the special office of the bishop or president of the assembly to administer the eucharist. According to Justin Martyr's account of the rite already quoted, the president of the brethren pronounced the form of prayer and praise over the elements, and the deacons distributed them among the communicants who were present, and conveyed them to those who were absent. Ignatius informs us that the ordinance could not be administered in the absence of the bishop. In the Apostolical Constitutions the dispensation of the eucharist is ascribed at one time to the chief priest, at another to the bishop. He is directed to stand before the altar with the presbyters and deacons, and to perform the office of consecration. For a long period it was forbidden to a presbyter to consecrate the elements if the bishop was present, that duty belonging to the bishop alone. But in the middle ages the bishops seldom officiated at the table of the Lord. The general rule in the primitive church was, that the bishop consecrated the elements, assisted by the presbyter, that the presbyter distributed the bread, and the deacon presented the cup. In the absence of the bishop the duty of consecration devolved upon the presbyter, and in such a case both the bread and the cup were distributed by the deacons. Sometimes the deacons took upon themselves the office of consecrating the elements, but this practice was forbidden by repeated ecclesiastical councils.

During the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the early Christian church, none but believers in full communion with the church were allowed to be present; and all who were present partook of the ordinance. The consecrated elements were also sent by the hands of the deacons to such of the brethren as from sickness or imprisonment were unable to attend. The custom at length arose which, for a long period, prevailed in the ancient church, of administering the sacrament to infants. (See COMMUNION, INFANT.) Nay, even the ordinance was frequently administered to the sick when in the delirium of fever, and to penitents when on their deathbeds. Some were accustomed also to carry home a portion of the consecrated bread, and to lay it up for future use in a chest appropriated for the purpose, and when they had no opportunity of attending the morning service, they partook of a portion of the bread, and if a Christian stranger came to share in their hospitality, one of the first acts of kindness was to produce a portion of the sacramental bread, and break it between them, thereby hallowing their social intercourse, by joining together in a solemn ordinance, which they held in the most profound reverence, and the observance of which they regarded as necessary to their happiness both here and hereafter.

In the ancient Christian church, as we have seen, all the faithful were communicants, and the rule of St. Ambrose was regarded as admitting of no exception: "All Christians ought on every Lord's Day to partake of the Lord's Supper." It was not until the sixth century that the distinction came to be recognized between communicants and non-communicants. From this it afterwards became customary to keep consecrated bread, called EULOGIA (which see), for the purpose of offering it to such persons as chose to partake of it, instead of uniting in regular communion with the church. These persons were called Half-way communicants. After the general introduction of infant-baptism, the eucharist continued to be administered to all who had been baptized, whether infants or adults. The African church were accustomed to administer the ordinance to the dead, and even to bury with them some portion of the consecrated elements. Communicants in the early church wore a peculiar dress when partaking of the sacrament, probably white raiment; and the women wore white veils, called dominicalia. All the faithful were required to bring certain oblations or presents of bread and wine. The bread was wrapped in a white linen cloth, and the wine was contained in a vessel called ama or amula. These offerings were brought to the altar after the deacon had said, "Let us pray," and while the assembly were engaged in singing a hymn suited to the occasion. This custom was abolished in the twelfth century.

On the authority of Augustine we learn that during the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the communicants stood with their faces towards the east. The clergy first received the elements, then the men, and last of all the women. The communicants advanced to the table two at a time. They took the bread and the cup in their hands, and repeated after the minister the sacramental formulary, concluding with a loud Amen. The men received the elements with uncovered hands previously washed; the women made use of the dominical. From the ninth century the bread began to be put into the mouths of the communicants by the officiating minister, to prevent them from carrying it home. The practice of kneeling during the consecration, and distribution of the elements, was first introduced in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and did not become general till a period considerably later.

In regard to the nature of the bread which ought to be used in the Lord's Supper, a keen controversy was long carried on between the Greek and Latin churches, the former contending for the use of leavened, and the latter of unleavened bread. From the seventh century the Church of Rome began to use unleavened bread, a practice which was discontinued by Protestants at the Reformation, with the exception of the Lutherans. The eucharistic bread of the Romanists is styled the HOST (which see).

The wine which our Lord used in the Supper was, of course, the common wine of Palestine, but the ancient churches universally mixed water with the sacramental wine. The Armenians used wine alone, and the Aquarians water alone, but both were regarded as heretics. The proportion of water mixed with the wine varied at different times, being sometimes one-fourth, at other times one-third. The Western church mixed cold water only; the Greek church did the same at first, but afterwards added warm water just before the distribution. In the third or fourth century it became customary in the Eastern church to hold up the consecrated elements before the people, in order to excite their veneration for the sacred mysteries of the sacrament. In the middle ages the host of the Latin church came to be worshipped in consequence of the dogma of transubstantiation being believed. This dogma was introduced into Gaul in the twelfth century, and into Germany in the thirteenth.

Both elements were universally administered to both clergy and laity until about the twelfth century, when in the Western church the cup began to be gradually withdrawn from the laity. (See CHALICE.) The Greeks retain substantially the ancient custom, and Protestants universally give the sacrament to both clergy and laity in both kinds. A certain form of words was used from early times in delivering the elements to the people, to which the people answered, Amen. The words spoken by the officiating minister were simply, "The body of Christ," and "The blood of Christ," to each of which expressions the people subjoined, Amen. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions speaks of the form in this manner: "Let the bishop give the oblation, saying, 'The body of Christ,' and let the receiver answer, Amen. Let the deacon hold the cup, and when he gives it, say, 'The blood of Christ, the cup of life,' and let him that drinks it, say Amen." In the time of Gregory the Great, we find the form somewhat enlarged, thus, "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thy soul;" and before the time of Alcuin and Charlemagne it was augmented into this form, "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thy soul unto everlasting life."

In the primitive Christian church, the Lord's Supper was retained in the simplicity of its original institution, and the ordinance was regarded as a memorial of the sufferings and death of Christ, and a means of strengthening the faith and increasing the love of his followers. In course of time highly figurative language began to be used, which implied, if understood literally, the bodily presence of Christ. During the Eutychian controversy, the notion was broached by some, that there was a union between Christ and the elements similar to that between the divine and human nature in the person of Christ. It was not, however, until the ninth century that the doctrine was promulgated of a real change of the substance of the elements in the Lord's Supper. (See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.) This, of course, naturally led to the worship of Christ in the sacrament. (See HOST, ADORATION OF THE), and the kindred dogma, that the Eucharist is a true and proper sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead, or the souls in purgatory. (See MASS.) At the Reformation, in the sixteenth century, these dogmas of Rome were renounced by the Protestant party; but Luther, still cleaving to the literal interpretation of our Saviour's words, "This is my body," introduced the doctrine of CONSUBSTANTIATION (which see), signifying that although the elements remain unchanged, the real body and blood of Christ are received by the communicants along with the symbols. Zwingli, however, disapproving alike of the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation and the Lutheran doctrine of Consubstantiation, maintained that the bread and wine were no more than a representation of the body and blood of Christ, and that there was nothing in the ordinance but a memorial of Christ. The Helvetic Reformer, however, in thus explaining the matter, has perhaps scarcely described the true nature of the Lord's Supper as it is understood by most Protestant churches. The elements are, doubtless, recognized as symbols or signs, but to the true believer they are something more, for they are seals of the covenant of grace, ratifying and confirming all its blessings as given over by Christ to his people, and received on their part by the exercise of a living faith.

LORETTO (HOLY HOUSE AT), a house at Loretto, a small town in the States of the Church in Italy, which is held in great veneration by Romanists, as being the place where the Virgin Mary was born, and also the infant Jesus. The story of this wonderful house is implicitly believed by many Romanists. The outlines are briefly these: Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, found it at Nazareth about three centuries after the incarnation. It was carried by angels through the air in May 1291, and laid down by them on a little eminence in Dalmatia, where it attracted great attention, and performed miracles of healing. Doubts having arisen as to its character, the blessed Virgin, surrounded by angelic spirits, appeared to a priest, named Alexander, when on a sickbed, and informed him that in that house she was born, lived, received the message of Gabriel, and conceived the Son of God. She further told the priest, that the apostles had converted this house into a church; that Peter had consecrated its altar; that because insulted in Nazareth by infidels, and neglected by Christians, it was carried over by angels to Dalmatia; and that as a miraculous proof of all this, his health should be immediately restored. On awakening, Alexander found himself restored to health. The Dalmatians, however, were not long permitted to enjoy the gift of the house. On the night of the 10th December 1294, some shepherds, who were watching their flocks, beheld a house surrounded by uncommon splendour flying across the Adriatic, which separates Dalmatia from Italy. The holy house rested in a district called Lauretum, and hence the name, "The House of Loretto," which it retains to this day. Soon it became very famous as a place of pilgrimage, to which thousands resorted for devotion and miraculous cures. The number of pilgrims, however, greatly diminished in consequence of the bands of robbers which infested the neighbourhood; and the house again moved to a small hill near the road where the faithful might have access to it without being exposed to robbers. This new miracle greatly increased the reverence in which the house was held. The hill on which it now stood was the joint property of two brothers, who quarrelled about the rent they were to receive. Accordingly this miraculous house was once more transferred, and placed in its present site, a very short distance beyond the property of the unworthy brothers. And there the house remains till the present day.

The House of Loretto is thus described by one who visited the spot: "This holy house, that can thus fly or walk at pleasure, is about thirty-two feet long, thirteen feet wide, and eighteen feet high, with a chimney and small belfry. The walls are of stone. There is in it a small altar, the one dedicated by Peter; and on it is an antique wooden cross. On the right of the altar is an image of the Virgin Mary, with the infant on her arm, with the hair of each divided after the manner of the people of Nazareth. This image is surrounded with golden lamps, by whose constant glare and dazzle it is somewhat concealed. The Virgin and Son are most gorgeously decorated, and are brilliant with precious stones. This holy image was carried to France in 1706, but it was brought back with pious pomp: and welcomed by the discharge of cannon and the ringing of bells, it was borne to the holy house on a rich frame, car-

"And the miracles wrought by this holy house are numerous and wonderful. It is hung round by 'the votive offerings in gold, silver, wax, and other materials,' presented by those on whom miracles were performed. Pietro Barbo was there miraculously healed, and was informed by the Virgin that he would be elected Pope! He was so elected, and assumed the name of Paul II. He issued a bull, dated November 1, 1464, in which he speaks of 'the great wonders and infinite miracles' wrought by means of the Holy Virgin in this house. This house has been the pet of many a Pope, who have expended treasures upon it! And there it stands at the present hour, 'the most celebrated sanctuary in Italy'—hung round by votive offerings of great value, visited by pilgrims from all parts of the world, and with a regular establishment of priests, sustained at an enormous annual expense, mainly collected from the beggar pilgrims. There also is the 'holy porringer,' in which pap was made for the infant Saviour, and which imparts wonderful sanctity to every thing that is put into it!" The Litany to the "Lady of Loretto" may be found in the "Garden of the Soul," and in most other Romish prayer-books.

LOTS (CASTING OF), a mode of determining an uncertain event by an appeal to the providence of God, which is made by casting or throwing something. Among the ancient Hebrews, the lot was resorted to frequently in disputes about property. It was in this manner that the land of Canaan was divided by Joshua, and frequent allusions occur throughout the Old Testament to this mode of settling disputed matters. Thus in Prov. xvi. 33, it is said, "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord;" and in xviii. 18, "The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty." From these passages it is not improbable, that the lot was employed in courts of justice in the days of Solomon. In criminal cases, as in Josh. vii. 14—18, we find the sacred lot called Urim and Thummim, resorted to in order to discover the guilty party. In many matters of great public interest, as in the election of Saul to the kingdom, appeal was often made to the lot. It is also referred to in Esther iii. 7, "In the first month, that is, the month Nisan, in the twelfth year of king Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, that is, the month Adar;" and Bishop Patrick remarks on the passage, "It was customary in the East, by casting lots into an urn, to inquire what days would be fortunate, and what not, to undertake any business in. According to this superstitious practice, Haman endeavoured to find out what time in the year was most favourable to the Jews, and what most unlucky. First he inquired what month was most fortunate, and found the month Adar, which was the last month in the year, answerable to our February. There was no festival during this month, nor was it sanctified by any peculiar rites. Then he inquired the day, and found the thirteenth day was not auspicious to them. (v. 13.) Some think for every day he drew a lot; but found none to his mind until he came to the last month of all, and to the middle of it. Now this whole business was governed by Providence, by which these lots were directed, and not by the Persian gods, to fall in the last month of the year; whereby almost a whole year intervened between the design and its execution, and gave time for Mordecai to acquaint Esther with it, and for her to intercede with the king for the reversing or suspending his decree, and disappointing the conspiracy."
